Mr. President, we are told by Herodotus that King Cambyses became enamored of his own sister and desired to make her his wife. He was informed that the laws did not permit a brother to marry his sister. He called his royal judges into consultation and submitted to them the proposition whether the laws permitted a man to marry his sister. The judges decided that the laws did not permit a man to marry his sister; but they informed the king further that they had discovered another law, that the king could do as he pleased. Have we made no improvement upon that day? Is this a Government like that of the Persian king? If we have anything to boast of in this country it is that we have limited the powers of government, and one of the highest and most sacred limitations upon the powers of government is that they shall protect the contracts made by agreement between parties and founded in valuable consideration, and they shall not impair them or destroy them. Ah, there is not one law for a contract to which individuals are parties, and another law for contracts where the Government is a party. The law of contracts is the same, I care not whether the parties to the contract are artificial persons or natural persons, or whether they are individuals or whether they are governments. It is the glory and the boast of the character of our institutions that no government has a right to change and modify or alter or destroy a contract, a debt contract, a simple contract debt founded upon valuable consideration, whether the parties to that contract be corporations, individuals, or the Government, and no court has ever held so. And I say now to the gentlemen, I said two weeks ago, I challenge them to produce any case where a court in America has ever held that under these words of reservation the Legislature could change or alter a contract founded in consideration of private agreement or public agreement either, to which I mean the public is a party in the shape of the Government. You have not produced such a case. Every case you have brought here is a case changing the charter, changing the corporate franchises and privileges, and modifying them. You have never produced a case, and you never will produce a case, where the courts have held that the legislative power can change, alter, or modify a contract either by reservation or otherwise. This is a Government of granted powers. It derives all the powers it possesses from the people through the Constitution. It has no power to impair the obligation of a contract, and it cannot acquire that power by reserving it.

I adhere to my proposition, but I concede that the charter granted directly from the Government stands on a different footing.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, I desire to detain the Senate but a few moments. There are two branches of this question, one which the Senator from Georgia has just remarked upon—the question of power. There is another question, one of policy. Upon the latter branch of the subject I desire to say a few words on account of something like criticism upon the position I have assumed that was made by the Senator from Vermont. The position I took, among others, was that there were great commercial objects to be attained by the building of the Central Pacific Railroad, benefits to transportation, not merely to the Territories and the Pacific coast and Western States, but also to the Government, and I contended that there was nothing in the former policy of the Government which would justify a heavy tax being laid upon the transportation between the Western States and the Pacific coast. I desire, fortifying the position which I took and showing that I did not mean thereby to condone a debt or anything of that kind, to show what the policy of the Government has been in this respect toward other enterprises of the same character, that it never has considered the gifts or the loans which it made for the benefit of commerce as sums to be counted upon as a miser does upon his hoard, that a spirit of just liberality toward all sections of the Union up to this moment at any rate has characterized the course of Congress in these matters; and when I ask, in view of the facts which I shall state, I have no doubt familiar to every Senator who knows the course of our legislation, that something of the same spirit shall be used, something of the same regard for the great commerce of this road carried on between Chicago and San Francisco, I think I may well say to Senators that I do not make any unreasonable demand. I will refer to one or two instances, among others to the act which passed Congress:

For improving the navigation of the Mississippi River at Des Moines or Lower Rapids, according to such plan as the Secretary of War shall, on the report of the board of engineers, approve, $300,000.

This was the first in a series of appropriations for a work which cost $4,000,000 to build a canal for the benefit of commerce, and there was attached to that grant a proviso—

That any canal that may be constructed around said Des Moines, or Lower Rapids of the Mississippi River, shall be and forever remain free to the navigation and commerce of said river, and no tolls shall ever be collected thereon.

Now, compound that amount according to the principle which it is announced that it is just to apply to the debt owed by the Pacific Railroad Companies, which was incurred exactly for the same object, for the benefit of commerce, and the interest for the first year would be $200,000 at only 5 per cent., and the next year $210,000, and so it would go on by arithmetical progression until the year 1900 or any other time that may be arbitrarily fixed, and it would amount to an enormous sum. And yet that was not the calculation that was made by Congress. The whole amount of the original appropriations was freely given and no account was made of interest whatever ever to come back to the coffers of the United States for the benefit of commerce in that regard. I was in Congress at the time that measure passed and I voted for it, for I have always believed in being liberal to the commerce of the country in providing it facilities and not bearing it down by oppressive exactions.

With reference to this very Des Moines Rapids Canal, allow me to say that Congress has to make an annual appropriation for the expense not only of repairs but to work the locks of the canal with employes all along it. How absurd the proposition would seem to come in here and ask that the engineers and firemen and brakemen of the Central and Union Pacific Railroads should be paid by the Government as the men who work the machinery of this canal are annually paid by the Government of the United States, and this with all the principal and interest is thrown into the gulf for the benefit of commerce.

Take as another illustration the instance of the Louisville and Portland Canal, which was a canal built by a private company for private gain. They had a debt of $1,200,000, as near as my recollection runs back to the debates of the day when Congress assumed that debt. After having appropriated upon this private work belonging to individuals, the title not being in the Government, nearly a million dollars more—

Mr. THURMAN. But the Government made money out of that canal.

Mr. SARGENT. The Government has made money out of the Central Pacific Railroad and the Union Pacific Railroad, and that is just the point I make.

Mr. THURMAN. Not in the same sense. The Government by its stock in the Louisville Canal made more money than it ever expended on the canal.

Mr. SARGENT. The Government assumed the indebtedness of that canal and paid off its bonds to the extent of $1,200,000 and never got a dollar of it back into the Treasury. I challenge an examination of the record on that point, because I remember the debate distinctly, as I participated in it in the House of Representatives. I have not looked at it since that time, but I remember it distinctly. I say that amount was given for the benefit of commerce on the Ohio River and of the people in that region. Compound the amount, as you say—

Mr. THURMAN. Why does not the Senator bring in a bill to sponge out this debt of these meritorious companies.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not propose to do anything of the kind. I do not ask the Senate to do anything of the kind. There is the rapidity of logic; the Senator jumps from one extreme to the other. He supposes because we complain that his bill is harsh and holds the rod over these companies who are placed in the attitude of a culprit, that therefore we are in favor of freeing them from their obligations. I am not asking, and I have not asked, for any such proposition. I say, however, this was not the spirit in which Congress has dealt with enterprises of this kind heretofore, and that it is not just to the people of the Pacific whom I represent. I stand here in the interest of my own constituency, and in the same spirit in which I was in favor of this legislation from the beginning—for I wrote the original Pacific Railroad act and urged it through Congress—I say you should not make the road a curse instead of a blessing to the Territories which it traverses and the people who are living there, and who are dependent upon it for their facilities in carrying on enterprises. These which I have referred to are small benefits which the Government has conferred on commerce, and it never thought of compounding interest and counting it out as a miser and doling it dollar by dollar.

I have a table here running nearly from the foundation of the Government, but it is sufficient to go back ten years. Congress has appropriated $38,000,000 in the improvement of the facilities of commerce during the last ten years. Will some ready reckoner compound the interest upon that amount? Compound it at 5 per cent. a year for thirty years and see how much the Government has lost, out of how much the Government has been cheated. The Government has gained, as it did by the Louisville Canal, as it did by the Des Moines

Rapids Canal, as it did by the Pacific Railroad, by developing the resources of the country, by making tax-paying communities, by enhancing the wealth in all its boundaries. In 1867 the amount of $4,486,281.70 was appropriated for purposes of this kind. In 1868 $1,601,530 was appropriated. In 1869 $2,200,000 was appropriated. In 1870 $4,256,400 was appropriated. In 1871 $5,023,000 was appropriated; in 1872, $5,195,000; in 1873, $5,918,900; in 1874, $5,444,000; in 1875, $6,643,517.50; in 1876, $5,025,000; and there has just been reported a bill in the House of Representatives making an appropriation of $7,000,000 more, a large amount of which undoubtedly will be appropriated by Congress for purposes of this kind. What did Senators say with reference to the improvement of the Mississippi River by means of the Eads jetties? Five and a half million dollars were appropriated for that purpose. That is the original cost of the work. Does anybody complain? It gives an outlet to the commerce of the great Mississippi Valley, benefits the State of the Senator from Ohio. California is far off. I do not know that I can stir the soul of the Senator from Vermont, or that of the Senator from Ohio with any emotion that I feel with regard to the people of the Pacific, but I say the Pacific Railroad is our Mississippi River. Do the Senators object to the five and a half millions that were paid to clear away the sand-bars at the mouth of the Mississippi River by means of the Eads jetties or to the annual appropriation we have to make of $150,000 to maintain the work over and above the price? In the language of the Senator from Connecticut, "I trow not."

Now, then, I say that something of the same spirit should be shown when a bill is before Congress the effect of which is to put an annual charge of $4,600,000 upon the commerce of the Pacific States which goes overland by the railroads, for that is the effect of the measure. I admit that there is a hoard of savings which has been made by the construction and the operating of the road, but how soon will $4,000,000 per annum exhaust it? Two, three, or four years hence will exhaust it, in one day, and then the companies will have all their reserve used up, and if they have availed themselves of the privilege which is given by the original legislation of 10 per cent. dividend it will be soon used up, in two or three years; and then comes the direct dragging burden upon the commerce that goes over the road. Somebody has got to pay it, and who? Those who travel upon the road; those who send merchandise over it; ay, sir, and the Government which sends its transportation over it, although the Government has acted in such a mean and improper spirit in that matter that when it could by its own contract with the companies get one-half of its transportation applied upon the debt, instead of doing that it has sent the goods which it wanted to send to San Francisco around the Isthmus or by some other method. I suppose this was by inattention of the Departments. Whatever the reason was, the Government has sent a vast amount of transportation by the Isthmus, one-half of which it could have applied presently upon this debt instead by giving the companies the opportunity to carry it. I say the effect of such a measure will be that the communities there which are now springing forward into a state of comparative prosperity and are able to work low grade ores because they can get cheap machinery for mines that are little productive, because they have the facilities furnished by the railroad, will be compelled to stop under the increased exactions which may be brought about by this legislation.

That is the motive under which I stand here and say that if with justice and fairness to the Government a rate of sinking fund can be fixed which will avoid these disasters, it ought to be done. That is the business aspect of this proposition which I principally insist upon.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I want to say two or three things in reply to the Senator from California. He says we ought to treat these companies liberally. So I say, I ask him if the companies have not been treated liberally? The Government advanced them moneys which the Government borrows and on which we are paying interest annually.

Mr. SARGENT. I am not complaining of past treatment.

Mr. HOWE. We defer the payment of that interest until the expiration of the loan. Simple interest on the moneys that we disburse annually, calculated up to the time that we require them to repay that interest, would more than build the roads. We have therefore laid upon the people of the country a tax more, very much more, than the construction of the roads. Is not that liberality?

The Senator says now that we have been very liberal to commerce in other sections, and he points at the appropriations we have made for the benefit of commerce. That is one thing; the railway companies are another. If I do not misunderstand the whole scope of this attempted legislation, it has nothing to do with commerce, nothing to do with fares, nothing to do with rates of transportation. It does not propose to reduce or to increase the revenues of the companies one dollar. It is a simple question what the companies ought to do with reference to their debt. They are already running upon rates of transportation which they have fixed themselves, and which nobody now proposes to interfere with. The Senator from California, least of all, proposes to legislate in regard to that. The Senator makes a sort of sectional appeal to us.

Mr. SARGENT. Not at all.

Mr. HOWE. In one sense.

Mr. SARGENT. I had no such purpose at all. I simply claim for my section that which we have meted out uniformly to Wisconsin, which by this list that I have gone over received a sum as large, I am glad to say, as any section of the country, and more.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, in no improper sense did the Senator make a sectional appeal, and I was going to reply to it by saying that there is no sectional interest involved in this question. He has called this railroad the Mississippi River of the Pacific slope. I beg to remind him that it is just as much the Mississippi of the East as it is of the West. Just so far as commerce is interested in this question, it is the commerce of the East as much as the commerce of the West. If we repress commerce by this legislation, we repress a commerce which is the common interest of the whole country. That is the way I look at it.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I desire to occupy the Senate but a few moments, and more with a view to ascertain the true construction of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine than for any other purpose.

When the Senator from Maine first introduced his proposition it seemed to me to be a wise one, and I entertained that judgment until it was so severely attacked by the honorable Senator from Ohio who has charge of this bill. He told us yesterday that the amendment was prussic acid to this bill, that it is the poisoned drop that is to be the death of this legislation. If that be true, I shall join hands with the Senator from Ohio and vote against the amendment of the Senator from Maine. But all the arguments are not arguments which commend themselves to my judgment, and the colloquy which has just occurred between the Senator from California and the Senator from Wisconsin more than confirms me in the justice of the amendment.

There is a provision in this charter that no one in this debate has said we could not lay our hands upon, namely, the provision that when the earnings of these companies shall exceed 10 per cent. on the cost of the railroads Congress may lay its hands on the corporations and reduce the rates of compensation for the great commerce which threads its pathway from ocean to ocean and from continent to continent. If this question is to be opened up in another direction, so that whatever laying hands there is to be on these corporations shall be in the direction of more exactions in order to hasten the payment of this debt, then with what face can we say to these railway companies, "You shall reduce the rates of compensation charged upon freight and traffic that goes over your great lines of railway?" I believe in that view that it is important that whatever we deem necessary and essential to protect the interests of this Government should be fixed here and now with reference to this debt, so that if the earnings of these railways shall in the future increase we shall then exercise the power that we have a right to exercise in the interest of the commerce of this people in compelling these railway corporations to reduce their rates of compensation.

There is a growing evil, I will tell the honorable Senator from Ohio, in some sections of the country which these railways traverse, which are deeply interested in some Government regulation upon this question. It has been more than hinted at heretofore with reference to the suspected violations of one of the provisions of the law of 1864. If we are to open up this question constantly for the purpose of drawing into the Treasury of the United States hereafter, as we may choose, further sums in order to hasten the payment of this debt, how can we with any face go to these corporations with a law compelling them to reduce their rates of traffic or rates of fare?

I make these suggestions more for the purpose of receiving an answer from the honorable Senator from Ohio than for the purpose of making absolute assertions of my own. The proposition of the Senator from Maine, as I understand it, takes not away one whit from the efficiency and force of the bill as reported by the Judiciary Committee. That bill stands with all its power and in all its relations as though that amendment had not been presented. That bill, as I understand it, provides a maximum sum that we are to require from these corporations, namely: they are to pay, or the Government is to retain, the one-half of the transportation; in addition to that, it is to retain in one case $1,200,000, and in the other $150,000 or so much of that sum as with certain other sums shall make up 25 per cent. of the net earnings of these railway corporations. The amendment as modified by the Senator from Maine provides that there shall be, in addition to that, a minimum sum, namely, $600,000 at least, from each company, which shall be applied to this purpose. Certainly to that extent it is an improvement upon the bill proposed by the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not an improvement in the interest of the companies who, as they say, may have a dry year and nothing to carry.

Mr. ALLISON. But may I ask the Senator from Vermont, because I only want information on this point, is there in the bill as reported from the Judiciary Committee a minimum sum fixed, or is there any such provision as may make it impossible, or rather improbable, that these railway companies will pay into the Treasury a single dollar save and except that sum retained for half transportation, which the estimate of the Judiciary Committee fixes at $421,000?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly not. There is no minimum sum because the companies by their directors, and presidents, and counsel, pressed upon us the danger of any legislation which should fix a minimum sum, because they said "great floods, drouths, everything which will affect the products of a people, and so the operations of a railroad, may find us a year when after paying the interest on the first mortgage, and sometimes perhaps without it, there will be no net earnings, upon the construction of the Judiciary Committee bill; and in such a case, unless you wish to ruin us, you should not compel us to borrow money to put in." That had force with us, and trying to act impartially between the companies and the rights of the people, we made no minimum. Now the Senator from Maine says they shall have a minimum.

Mr. ALLISON. Then in that respect I find I was not mistaken, because even in such years of drouths and floods and rains and storms, or whatever, under the proposition of the Senator from Maine, there must be $600,000 paid into the Treasury on account of this proposition.

Mr. BLAINE. In addition.

Mr. ALLISON. In addition. Therefore, and this is what I desire to call the attention of the honorable Senator from Ohio to, if this is a reasonable proposition with reference to the debt, why should it not stand as long as these companies comply with it? That is a proposition which addresses itself, it seems to me, to the common sense and common judgment of anybody.

Upon the question as to the reasonableness of this proposition, I have had some investigations made for my own conduct with regard to the vote I should give upon this very subject. If I understand the Judiciary Committee bill its minimum will be about as stated by the honorable Senator from Ohio, namely, it would leave somewhere in the neighborhood of twenty millions of principal due from each of these companies at the end of twenty-two years or twenty years, as the case may be; but the capacities and capabilities of the bill under the proposition of the Judiciary Committee are far beyond that. That the Senator from Ohio will see if he makes a careful calculation. He submits in the report accompanying the bill that the sum of $1,900,000 from each of these companies would be paid into the Treasury under the provisions of the bill. It will not require the sum of $1,900,000 on the part of these companies to pay principal and interest back and forward of the entire debt of both these companies to the United States. That sum will more than pay it and would leave a balance, as I understand the calculation, due to these companies upon the basis of the decision of the Supreme Court at the end of the time.

Mr. THURMAN. Now, if my friend will allow me to interrupt him, suppose it would do just that thing, it will not pay the first mortgage and the debt of the United States, and the first mortgage will be entitled to be first paid.

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly; but is it wise or is it desirable to so tax the commerce of this country as that it shall be required to pay not only the principal and interest of this debt to the Government of the United States, but also to pay the first mortgage due at the end of this time?

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Iowa, if the Senator in charge of the bill acquiesces, if he would not be willing to give way for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. ALLISON. I shall leave that to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. PADDOCK. There is a disposition to debate this question somewhat further and I suggest to my friend, the Senator from Ohio who has charge of the bill, that we had better adjourn.

Mr. THURMAN. Oh, no.

Mr. ALLISON. I cannot give way for such a motion without the consent of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. PADDOCK. I will not press the motion unless both Senators acquiesce in it.

Mr. ALLISON. I only mean to occupy a moment longer. With reference to the suggestion made by the honorable Senator from Ohio in regard to the first-mortgage bonds, I must say that I do not share the apprehensions of my friend from Wisconsin with reference to what will be the effect upon these railway corporations at the end of twenty years. I have no doubt that this very day, if these corporations could be purchased by railway companies that both he and I know of, they would gladly take these roads at a considerable advance upon what is their present nominal value, debts and all. It is probably true that a railway could be built alongside of the track now held and owned by the Union Pacific Railway Company for $18,000 or $20,000 per mile. It is also true that a track could be laid between here and Baltimore alongside of the Baltimore and Ohio Railway for $20,000 a mile; but who is going to lay that track or invest money in any such enterprise? The whole capital stock of the New York Central Railway is $128,000,000, including its bonded debt, as shown by Poor's Manual, which I have here before me. The cost of that railway undoubtedly to-day would not be more than 50 per cent. of that sum; yet, does any one believe that capitalists would invest money in a rival enterprise to that great railway extending from the lakes to tide-water?

No, Mr. President, when these mortgages mature there is no question of the fact that there will be found somebody willing to pay not only the first mortgage for these great railways, but to pay the second as well, because in the very nature of things by that time, so far as the country adjacent to them is concerned, they will practically have the control of the traffic.

But the Senator from Maine has offered this amendment, modified now so as to cover, it seems to me, every possible objection that can be made to it, unless it be that we intend here year by year to make further exactions of these companies for the purpose of facilitating the time when this debt will be paid. If the honorable Senator in charge of this bill will make a calculation he will see that the $1,900,000 which he estimates in his report will considerably more than pay this debt, principal and interest, at the time of the maturity of the bonds. If this is to be done in the future it will be done to the detriment of the great populations that are compelled to use these roads for local and through traffic. It will be done at the expense of high rates of fare and high rates of transportation. Representing as I do a constituency somewhat interested in this question, I do not feel myself willing to make such exactions from these companies as will require them in turn to tax largely the people from Chicago to San Francisco who may be compelled to use this railway.

Mr. President, I only offer these suggestions with a view of seeing whether or not there are objections to this amendment which are not apparent in my mind.

Mr. PATTERSON, (at five o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. THURMAN. I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion for a moment till I say a word, and then he may renew it.

Mr. PATTERSON. Certainly for a moment, but I do not want to lose the floor.

Mr. THURMAN. I ask the Senate to sit this bill out to-night, because, in my judgment, debate upon it is substantially exhausted, and because, according to my experience, we shall have to sit it out no matter on what day we take the vote. I think it is time that this bill were out of the way. Of course that is a matter for the Senate to decide for itself with reference to its own convenience. I have this, however, to say, that if the Senate is unwilling to sit the bill out to-night, I do hope that those who still wish to speak on the bill will speak to-night, and then give me to-morrow morning a short time—for I shall not need much, at least I shall not take much—to speak in the close of the debate, and then let us come to a vote.

Mr. SPENCER. Suppose we agree to vote at one o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. THURMAN. Not at one o'clock; that would cut me off entirely.

Mr. SPENCER. Then say three o'clock.

Mr. THURMAN. There is always this difficulty about fixing a time at which we can come to a vote—

Mr. PATTERSON. But it has been done.

Mr. RANSOM. It is always done; it always has been done.

Mr. PADDOCK. I ask the Senator from Ohio if there is any such state of pressing business before the Senate as to require that it shall be subjected to discomfort and annoyance in reference to this matter by a refusal to adjourn at this time? I do not understand that the public business is suffering by reason of the procrastination of this debate. It seems to me that it may be well enough to adjourn until to-morrow and give the Senate the opportunity of further consideration.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not hear a word the Senator says; yes, I did catch one word of the Senator from Nebraska, "any such pressing haste." If the Senator will look at the debates of the British Parliament whose way is over every quarter of the globe more or less, he will not find in twenty years a debate in the house of commons that lasted two days. But the debate on this bill has lasted now nearly one month, and at the last Congress it lasted for weeks. Four-fifths nearly of the Senators on this floor have spoken on the bill, so that there has not been a word said on the bill scarcely for the last week that was not a repetition of what had been said before.

Mr. PADDOCK. If the Senator will give way—

Mr. THURMAN. I do not wish to be interrupted just now. Yet there is complaint about hurrying this bill; complaint that there is a forcing of this bill, as if there were some tyranny or oppression in asking the Senate at last to vote upon a bill that has been discussed now nearly one month in this Senate, and that was discussed weeks during the session last winter.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Ohio if he objects to debate when debate does not procrastinate the determination of the question. The business of the Senate is in such a condition that there certainly is no urgency which requires of the Senate to subject itself to discomfort in order to procure a premature determination of this question; and it would be premature, I say, to force a vote when there are other Senators who wish to discuss the measure. There is no business before the Senate pressing upon us that I know of.

Mr. THURMAN. There is no business here! If the measures come before the Senate that are likely to come before it and are considered by the Senate, the middle of August will not see an end of this session. It will only be by pushing aside other business or deciding it without sufficient debate, that the Senate can adjourn before the middle of August if all the great measures which are now pending in one or the other of the two Houses shall have to be decided. Nothing! Is there nothing in the tariff bill, which may pass the House for aught we know? Is there nothing in the bill for the reorganization of the Army? Is there nothing in the proposition to amend the Constitution in regard to the election of President? Is there nothing in the bill to regulate the count of the presidential vote? Is there nothing in the appropriation bills? Is there nothing in all these that we can idle our time here in mere speech-making? According to the idea of the Senator from Nebraska—

Mr. PADDOCK. Mr. President—

Mr. THURMAN. I am perfectly willing to hear my friend from Nebraska. I always listen to him with pleasure, and I will agree to sit here till nine o'clock to-night to listen to him if he wants to speak so long.

Mr. PADDOCK. My friend is very kind and very courteous. I do not often interrupt the Senator; but I wish to make this inquiry of him: Is there any measure of public concern reported from any important committee of this body before the Senate to-day for consideration that makes it necessary for the Senate to sit the whole night here in order to consider the question? I for one have a remark or two to make upon this bill, and I prefer to make it to-morrow if it is exactly to the convenience of the Senate that I should do it to-morrow as well as to-day.

Mr. THURMAN. I certainly have no objection to the Senator from Nebraska speaking on the bill; indeed, I hope to hear him speak upon it; but when he says there is nothing before the Senate, let me tell him that if this bill or any bill on this subject is to become a law it must be sent to the House of Representatives in due time for the House to consider it. As I understand, the tariff bill is made the order of the day for next Monday in the House. So I have been informed. I understand from the gentleman who has that bill, I believe, in charge that he intends to allow one month's debate upon it in the House of Representatives. If that be so, and this bill should be sent there too late to be taken up and passed this week, as it probably will be if it goes over to-day, then it is postponed in the House for one month. I do not want to risk any such thing as that. I know that there is business in the other House as well as here, and that that House is to consider this question as well as the Senate. Of course I am under the direction of the Senate. All that I can do is my duty. That I propose to do. If the Senate overrules me I cannot help it. If it is the purpose of the Senate to adjourn now until to-morrow, it may do so; but for my own part my judgment is that we ought to sit this bill out.

Mr. SPENCER. Let us take the question on adjournment.

Mr. PATTERSON. I renew my motion now.

Mr. BLAINE. I wish to make a suggestion to the honorable Senator from Ohio before the vote is taken on the motion to adjourn. In the case of a bill of this magnitude, which has been so long under discussion and on which there are several amendments pending and more to be offered, I suggest to the Senator whether it might not be well to have a five-minute debate upon it, and have general consent that to-morrow we proceed with the bill under the five-minute rule. Of course I would except the honorable Senator in charge of the bill.

Mr. SARGENT. And the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. PADDOCK.]

Mr. BLAINE. And the Senator from Nebraska, who desires to speak more at length. The Senator from Ohio will observe that in regard to the measures of which he spoke, not one is here for our action. If we should close the debate on this bill and come to a final vote to-night, there is not one of those measures which would be here for the consideration of the Senate to-morrow.

Mr. THURMAN. There is an appropriation bill on the Calendar.

Mr. BLAINE. That is a very slight bill, a deficiency bill. There is not one regular appropriation bill ready. We can adjourn and have an understanding that to-morrow at five o'clock, or half past five, or four, I do not care what the hour is, so that we agree, we shall vote; but what is the need of subjecting ourselves to discomfort for nothing? I do not wish to interfere with the Senator who has charge of the bill at all. I know his responsibilities in this matter.

Mr. THURMAN. Here are Senators whose business calls them home. Here is the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHRISTIANCY] who is called home, and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] is called home. I do not know when we can get so full a Senate as we have to-day.

Mr. BLAINE. We shall have it to-morrow, and we can apply the five-minute rule and finish the bill in good time.

Mr. THURMAN. If we are to adjourn upon any such understanding, the Senator sees the difficulty about that. Let us suppose, for instance, that the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. CHAFFEE] should be offered. That is not an amendment that can be considered under a five-minute rule. Nobody would be satisfied with five minutes' discussion of that amendment. What are you going to do about it?

Mr. BLAINE. I think the Senator suggested that the debate had been already exhausted.

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, on the bill as it has been presented to the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is the motion to adjourn pending?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is pending.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is it debatable?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is not, but debate is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask for a vote on the question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PATTERSON,] that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. On that motion I ask for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WALLACE, (when his name was called.) On this question of adjournment I am paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES.] If he were here, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 29, nays 36; as follows:

YEAS—29.
Allison,	Dennis,	Kellogg,	Sargent,
Barnum,	Dorsey,	Lamar,	Saunders,
Blaine,	Eaton,	Matthews,	Spencer,
Bruce,	Ferry,	Mitchell,	Teller,
Cameron of Wis.,	Gordon,	Morrill,	Windom.
Chaffee,	Hill,	Paddock,
Conover,	Ingalls,	Patterson,
Dawes,	Jones of Florida,	Rollins,
NAYS—36.
Anthony,	Cockrell,	Hereford,	Morgan,
Armstrong,	Coke,	Johnston,	Oglesby,
Bailey,	Davis of Illinois,	Kernan,	Plumb,
Bayard,	Davis of West Va.,	McCreery,	Randolph,
Beck,	Edmunds,	McDonald,	Ransom,
Booth,	Eustis,	McMillan,	Saulsbury,
Burnside,	Garland,	McPherson,	Thornton,
Butler,	Grover,	Macey,	Voorhees,
Christiancy,	Harris,	Merrimon,	Wadleigh,
ABSENT—11.
Cameron of Pa.,	Hoar,	Kirkwood,	Whyte,
Conkling,	Howe,	Sharon,	Withers.
Hamlin,	Jones of Nevada,	Wallace,

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. ALLISON. Before the vote is taken I desire to know which is the pending amendment, as the Senator from Maine proposed two amendments.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is upon the first amendment indicated by the Senator from Maine.

Mr. THURMAN. If there is any Senator, I repeat, who wishes to speak, I do not desire to occupy the floor at this time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suggest to my friend to let us take the vote on this first amendment, which I believe the mover himself does not expect to be adopted. When the next amendment comes up, that will be perfectly in order, and the Senator I suggest had better speak then, and we shall get rid of the pending amendment first.

Mr. THURMAN. Do I understand that the Senator from Maine proposes to abandon this amendment and then to offer the amendment drawn out as he has suggested it?

Mr. BLAINE. I proposed to do that, but the Senator from Ohio would not permit me.

Mr. EDMUNDS. He does not object to your withdrawing it.

Mr. THURMAN. Then let us vote upon that amendment, and vote it down, as a matter of course.

Mr. ALLISON. The yeas and nays have been ordered upon it.

Mr. BLAINE. The yeas and nays were ordered upon it. Let the vote be taken on the amendment I offered. If that should be adopted I will offer the proviso there is in the other amendment. If it shall be rejected then I shall immediately offer the amendment which I suggested, adding the proviso to that.

Mr. THURMAN. Very well.

Mr. ALLISON. Can I not move to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered upon the amendment of the Senator from Maine?

Mr. SARGENT. There would be really nothing gained by the Senator doing that.

Mr. BLAINE. If I am permitted, I will simply withdraw one amendment and offer the other.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well, let the Senator withdraw that amendment.

Mr. SARGENT. I shall not agree to that.

Mr. BLAINE. Does the Senator from Ohio agree to that?

Mr. THURMAN. No.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I move to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered, so that we can have a rixa voce vote upon the amendment without taking up the time of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator cannot move to reconsider that vote. That will not amount to anything.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to inquire what the question is before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question before the Senate is upon the first amendment offered by the Senator from Maine.

Mr. BLAINE. I will explain it with the permission of the Senate. In section 12 I shall move to strike out all after the word "mentioned" in line 4 and insert:

But so long as said Central Pacific and Union Pacific Railroad Companies shall faithfully comply with the provisions of the said acts of 1862 and 1864 and of this act, relating to payments to the United States on account of the bonds advanced, and of the sinking funds to be established as aforesaid, such compliance shall be deemed and taken as sufficient to meet the obligations of said companies on account of such bonds prior to the maturity thereof.

Now I wish to add to that the following proviso:

Provided, That the annual payment from each railroad company, in addition to the half-transportation account and the 5 per cent. of net earnings presently applicable to the interest on the bonds, shall never be less than $600,000, including the other half of the transportation account applicable to the sinking funds herein established; and that nothing in this act shall be construed to waive any claim of the United States against either of said railroad companies, from whatever source arising.

I propose to offer that as one whole substantive amendment when the pending amendment is got out of the way.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Maine if he offers that as a substitute for his first amendment.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator from Ohio has two or three times refused to permit the amendment to be withdrawn, and of course the Senate will have to go through the trouble of voting upon it.

Mr. THURMAN. I am very indifferent as to what is done. The Senator from Maine can move his proviso to the present amendment. The amendment is only an amendment in the first degree, and that would only be an amendment in the second degree. It is perfectly competent for him to do that without any consent or withdrawal or anything else. But in order to "speed the plow," I consent so far as I can give it (it requires unanimous consent) that the Senator may withdraw the pending amendment and then he can offer the amendment that he has just stated.

Mr. BLAINE. I am much obliged to the Senator.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. By unanimous consent, the first amendment of the Senator from Maine is withdrawn.

Mr. BLAINE. I now add the proviso because I want it to come in in a different part of the section. I offer it now to come in at the end of section 12 of the bill. I do this out of deference and respect to the Senator from Vermont, who thought there were some very valuable things in that section; and I am always anxious to oblige the Senator from Vermont. I move to amend section 12 by adding thereto the following:

But so long as said Central Pacific and Union Pacific Railroad Companies shall faithfully comply with the provisions of the said acts of 1862 and 1864 and of this act relating to payments to the United States on account of the bonds advanced, and of the sinking funds to be established as aforesaid, such compliance shall be deemed and taken as sufficient to meet the obligations of said companies on account of such bonds prior to the maturity thereof: Provided, That the annual payments from each railroad company, in addition to the half-transportation account and the 5 per cent. of net earnings presently applicable to the interest and the bonds, shall never be less than $600,000, including the other half of the transportation account applicable to the sinking fund herein established; and that nothing in this act shall be construed to waive any claim of the United States against either of said railroad companies, from whatever source arising.

I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I simply want to inquire of the Senator from Maine if the meaning of that amendment is that payment of what is here called for shall be a compliance with the obligation of the company to the Government.

Mr. BLAINE. Certainly.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I understood from the Senator from Ohio that it would not be sufficient to meet the obligation of the companies to the Government; that there would be some $20,000,000 or $30,000,000 besides that would not be provided for. Now, will not this be an abatement of the claim of the Government against the companies to that extent?

Mr. BLAINE. This expressly excludes that conclusion, for it says "until the maturity of the bonds." It is limited to that. It only provides until the maturity of the bonds. It is the calculation of the Senator from Ohio who has charge of the bill that there will be only $35,000,000 left due from both roads. I stated it at $20,000,000 for each, but the Senator corrected me and said $35,000,000 for both. It will be, as compared with the value of the security the Government holds, a mere pittance.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. PADDOCK] intimated a desire to speak. Is he prepared to go on now?

Mr. PADDOCK. I expressed a preference not to go on to-night.

Mr. THURMAN. I cannot hear what the Senator says. I only want to give way if he desires the floor.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to inquire if there is any requirement of courtesy or precedence that would make it necessary for me to proceed now?

Mr. THURMAN. It is a matter of courtesy.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The gentleman in charge of a bill is generally allowed the last word.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator from Nebraska please repeat what he said; I did not hear a word of it?

Mr. PADDOCK. Mr. President, if I should conclude to make a remark after the Senator ceases, I think it would be proper enough that I should do so, and allow him to conclude afterward. I do not think I shall say anything that will interfere with his arrangements.

Mr. THURMAN. I said to the Senator, but I am afraid I was not heard, there is so much conversation in the Chamber, that if he desired to speak now I did not want to take the floor. I give him precedence if he desires to speak now. I do not want to say anything until after he shall have concluded.

Mr. PADDOCK. The Senator is very kind, indeed. I acknowledge his courtesy. I desire that the debate shall be postponed until to-morrow. I think no delay, so far as the final result is concerned, will come from that postponement. I am not exactly in a condition to proceed to-night. Therefore I am content to waive the precedence that my friend is willing to accord to me, and, so far as I am concerned, if it is agreeable to the Senate, to sit and listen to the Senator. If I may have any remark to make afterward I will make it. Then, if the Senator wishes to conclude the debate, as it is his right to do, I certainly shall have no objection.

Mr. INGALLS. Before the Senator from Ohio proceeds, I wish to address to him a single interrogatory to which I shall not ask an immediate reply, but shall be contented if he answers it before he closes the debate.

The amendment offered by the Senator from Maine seemed to me to be so reasonable, so equitable, and so just, that I have been at a loss to understand why it was opposed with so much vigor and strenuousness by the Committee on the Judiciary. They having the full power to submit a proposition for the consideration of the Senate, it seemed to me that it ought to be one which would command the assent of all those who favored an adjustment of this long outstanding litigation. In the course of the remarks made this afternoon by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] this same idea was brought before the Senate, and he addressed an interrogatory to the Senator from Ohio asking him if this bill was not what the Government desired to enforce against these companies, what would content them, and if any measure could be devised that would be a final settlement satisfactory to both the Judiciary Committee and to the Government, why it was not presented. The answer made by the Senator from Ohio was in my mind the most significant statement that has been made during this whole debate. He said the reason why a different and more strenuous measure was not presented was because he could not get it through the Senate.

Now, I desire the Senator from Ohio to answer before he gets through his remarks what measure would be satisfactory to him if he could get it through the Senate, and whether or not that statement was not a direct intimation that whenever there is a Senate that he can handle or that any subsequent Judiciary Committee can handle, there is not an intention to renew this agitation for the purpose of imposing still further terms and exactions upon these corporations? If that is not the case, if that is not the intention and purpose of the refusal of the Senator from Ohio to accept this amendment, what did he mean by saying that the only reason why he did not propose a different measure was because he could not get it through the Senate?

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, after the intimation that has been made, that there will be speeches following what I have to say now, I shall not perhaps speak as fully as I might otherwise have been inclined to do.

Mr. VOORHEES. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me to understand the course of proceeding? I do not want to interfere with the debate at all, but to inquire whether the debate is to be closed this evening or not?

Mr. THURMAN. I hope so.

Mr. VOORHEES. After what the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. PADDOCK] said and the concession that the Senator from Ohio appears to be making now, it does not seem clear whether we are to remain here to close this debate, or whether we are to concede what the Senator from Nebraska asks, that it go over until to-morrow. The Senator from Ohio seems to be proceeding to make the closing argument somewhat out of order. That is what confuses me and prompts me to make the inquiry.

Mr. THURMAN. I am compelled to speak now because nobody else will speak and save me the trouble. I wish somebody else would, for I have no desire to make a speech if anybody else will. I said yesterday that I would ask the Senate to-day to sit this bill out.

Mr. VOORHEES. Of course we all understand that the Senator from Ohio will close the debate; but after the request the Senator from Nebraska made for a postponement of the subject until to-morrow, and inasmuch as the Senator from Ohio has not definitely answered the request of the Senator from Nebraska, I beg leave to ask whether the Senator from Ohio is going to ask for a sitting to-night.

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly, I want to sit the bill out to-night.

Mr. President, I shall speak, even as briefly as I shall, under great disadvantages, and I must crave the attention of the Senate to what I may have to say, in order that I may avoid repetition, and may thereby shorten the time of my speech and weary them and myself the less. I say I speak under great disadvantages.

Mr. FERRY. May I make a suggestion to the Senator from Ohio? He seems to be a little embarrassed in dividing his speech in two. I voted to adjourn just now. I did so because one or two Senators had expressed their desire to speak upon this question, and were not prepared to speak. The Senator from Nebraska has expressed as much, and it has always been the courtesy of the Senator to yield to any such intimation. I therefore appeal to the Senator from Ohio to allow this question to go over until to-morrow. ["No!" "No!"]

Mr. SPENCER. Let us have an understanding at what hour we shall commence to vote.

Mr. FERRY. The Senator from Nebraska has not spoken upon this question. I do not desire to speak. I am not speaking in my own behalf, but I am speaking in behalf of the Senator from Nebraska and in behalf of any other Senator who rises upon this floor and states that he desires to speak to a question, but is not prepared to speak—not simply not prepared to speak, but not in a condition to speak to-night; and, it seems to me, the courtesy of the Senate ought to be extended to him as it would to any other Senator. For that purpose I move that the Senate adjourn, in order to test the Senate on that question.

Mr. THURMAN. I did not know that I yielded the floor to the Senator to do that.

Mr. FERRY. If the Senator is as technical as that, be it so. I asked him to yield to me to make a suggestion. I made the suggestion, and followed it up with a motion to adjourn. If the Senator states that he did not yield for that purpose, I will not take any advantage.

Mr. THURMAN. I certainly never so expected that the Senator would do such a thing.

Mr. FERRY. Very well, I do not make the motion.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I shall speak under very great difficulties. In the first place, I speak to a body fatigued by a long session; in the second place, I speak to Senators who are perhaps thinking much more of food for the stomach than food for the head. It was a remark long ago made by Cardinal de Retz, speaking of the old French Parliament, that he never knew any man eloquent enough to hold that body in session when dinner-time had arrived. That time has now arrived, and I should not be in the least surprised to find myself in a short time speaking—if it were not for a commendable habit that I have of being reasonably brief—to empty seats. I certainly should be in that category if I were to speak long, and therefore I shall try to speak briefly so that I may have some auditors at least until I shall have done.

Now, Mr. President, the pending question before the Senate is the amendment of the Senator from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE.] I have said once, or perhaps twice, that this bill is not framed upon the idea contained in that amendment. That amendment goes upon the idea that we ought to make an act that shall be unchangeable for twenty years; that we should assume in this year of grace, 1878, to be able to frame a law which shall require no alteration, no amendment in the course of twenty years. It goes further than that, a great way further than that. It goes upon the idea of repealing pro tanto the reserved power in these charters to alter, amend, or repeal those acts.

Mr. President, one of the things for which these railroad companies have been striving these many long years has been to get rid of that very reserved power; but this is the first time that they have ventured—no, not they; I beg pardon for saying that—this is the first time that any one in the Senate of the United States or, I believe, in the House of Representatives, has ventured to champion such an idea. Their officers and lawyers, in their arguments before the Judiciary Committee last November and December, urged upon us strenuously enough that we should make some kind of bargain with the companies, and they would be extremely liberal if we would only give up the right to alter, amend, or repeal their charters. Those arguments, taken in short-hand, will show that it is the cherished object of these corporations to get rid of that power of control which Congress possesses over them. They would give for that far more than the Senator from Maine asks from them. They would give far more than the Judiciary Committee bill asks from them, upon any interpretation, if Congress would surrender that power to alter, amend, or repeal. That, therefore, is involved in the amendment which is now under consideration. Congress, for good and sufficient reasons, I am willing to admit for the purposes of this argument, saw fit in 1862 to pass an act chartering railroad companies whose roads should extend over one-half of this continent, and chartering them in perpetuity, chartering them with an existence that should endure as long as the Republic itself should endure, chartering them with powers such as never were conferred on any other railroad corporations on the face of this globe, endowing them as no other corporations ever were endowed. And then, in 1864, it saw fit to nearly double the endowment, and to increase their powers and their privileges immensely beyond what they had been before. But in view of that fact, in view of the immense power and extent and wealth that these corporations would have, in view of the fact which human experience has shown and nowhere more than in the United States, the power of concentrated capital, wielded in the employment of thousands and tens of thousands of men, the Congress wisely retained the power to alter, add to, amend, or repeal those charters. It did it for the very purpose for which such reservations are made, in the language of the Supreme Court of the United States. It did it because, in the language of that court—

The object of the reservation, and of similar reservations in other charters, is to prevent a grant of corporate rights and privileges in a form which will preclude legislative interference with their exercise, if the public interest—

Not the private interest of these corporations, as my friend from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] suggests, but against their interest if necessary and against their will—

If the public interest should at any time require such interference. It is a provision intended to preserve to the State control over its contract with the corporations.

That is the language of the Supreme Court, and that was the law of this land when the Congress of the United States in 1862 and again in 1864 said the Congress of the United States shall have control over this contract with these corporations. And now, sir, it is to get rid of that control, to fritter it away, to overthrow and destroy it, to annihilate the very thing for which the people of this country for thirty years have been contending, and which they have put into nearly thirty constitutions of the States—it is to get rid of that, to trample it under foot, to render it a nullity, to construe it away, to make it not worth the paper on which the words are printed, that amendments like that now under consideration are offered, and arguments such as we have heard in the Senate are made.

Mr. President, I have said, and I repeat it, that, rather than see Congress give up that power of control over these two great corporations, I would see every dollar of the debt that they owe the Government lost forever. I would rather see this bill sunk into the depths of the sea, never to be resurrected, than to see Congress yield for one day its power over these two corporations or any others over which it has the power. Why, sir, my friend from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] said this evening that no government could exist that asserted such a power as this. That is a strange assertion.

Mr. EATON. I did not say that.

Mr. THURMAN. What did you say?

Mr. EATON. I said that no government could exist among civilized men that would, without cause, exercise that power of repeal, and I say it again.

Mr. THURMAN. "That would without cause exercise it?"

Mr. EATON. Yes.

Mr. THURMAN. That is all very true; but then comes the question, what is cause?

Mr. EATON. There is none.

Mr. THURMAN. Oh! then comes the question what is the cause? The Senator makes the cause a default in the company. I make the cause the interest of the Republic. I say, in the language of the Supreme Court, that the words are there in order to give us control whenever the public interest, not the interest of these corporations, not the default of these corporations, but whenever the public interest shall require us to exercise it.

Mr. VOORHEES. May I—

Mr. THURMAN. No, let me go on. Ah, but the existence of such a power is inconsistent with civilized government, is it? Has not such a power existed in England ever since there was a Parliament? Has not England exercised it? Has not England compelled her monarchs to revoke the charters and monopolies they had granted, again and again? Has not the house of commons refused grants of money to carry on the government until those monopolies were destroyed? Ah! sir, is it not the law in nearly every State in this Union that the Legislature may alter, amend, or repeal the charters it grants? I think there is some civilization in England. I think there is some civilization in the United States. I think there is some civilization in my own State. I think, therefore, that the idea which seems to haunt some of our friends on this floor, that here is an assault on liberty, as if monopolists were the friends of liberty; that here is some attack on property, as though there could be an attack on property in exercising the rights which are plainly reserved to Congress in words as plain as can be found in any lexicon of any language, may be dismissed from consideration.

Mr. VOORHEES. I rise for the purpose of asking whether the Senator from Ohio declines to allow me to ask a question? If he does, I only want him to say so.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not know what the question is.

Mr. VOORHEES. Of course you do not; but I want to know whether the Senator, as he did a while ago, declines to allow me to propound it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Indiana for the purpose of asking a question?

Mr. THURMAN. If it is pertinent to what I am saying now, I do.

Mr. VOORHEES. I presume I would not ask an impertinent question.

Mr. THURMAN. No, but everybody knows perfectly well—

Mr. VOORHEES. I yielded to the Senator to-day myself when I had a written speech.

Mr. THURMAN. Go on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio yields.

Mr. VOORHEES. All I desired to say in the way of a question was this: the Senator from Ohio announced with the utmost emphasis that sooner than yield this power, which he claims over these companies, he would sink and forfeit and lose all the pecuniary interests that are coming to this Government. I ask the Senator from Ohio whether, when the power has been asserted by Congress over these companies to the full extent that the Judiciary Committee thinks is proper to secure the Government in all its rights, and the companies comply with the demands thus made, and while they are thus complying, he thinks the power of the Government over them is abandoned? In other words, when the Government has made its claim of power and the companies are faithfully complying, whether, in his judgment as a lawyer, the power of the Government is not operating on them? In other words, I say that when we put forth a claim of power and assert it by legislative action, and these companies comply with and meet every demand we make, the amendment which the Senator from Maine offers, saying that while that is done we will make no new demand, does not release the power of Congress over these companies, but really asserts and continues it at the standard we now erect.

Mr. THURMAN. That is a brief question. I am delighted at its brevity.

Mr. VOORHEES. I hope it is pertinent.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not know but that it was; I will not quarrel with my friend about that, but I can answer it much more briefly than he stated it. If we were to pass a law saying to them "Pay us five cents in the dollar in installments of a cent a year on your indebtedness, and if you do that we will give up all the rest," the Senator might just as well say they were acting under the power of Congress. To be sure they would be acting under the power of Congress if we were to make such a bargain as that with them. We may do anything we please in that way, and we may say they are acting under the power of Congress, although it be to sponge out almost the whole of their indebtedness to the Government, and although it be to leave their creditors to the mercy of the men who are managing these great corporations, and who have in the past and who will in the future, if we do not interpose, manage them with an eye single to their own interest and not to that of the people to whom they owe so much.

Mr. VOORHEES. I am sure, however, this bill is not going to affect injuriously the debt they owe us.

Mr. THURMAN. No, this bill is not; but this bill was never framed on the idea of making a bargain with these companies for twenty years or any other number of years. If it had ever entered into the heads of the Judiciary Committee that we were to make a law unchangeable as one of the Medes and Persians for twenty years, I say to my friend from Indiana we should have reported a very different bill indeed. If we are to surrender for twenty years to these companies that power which we have over them in respect to their duties not simply to the Government, for the Judiciary Committee bill takes no more care of the Government than it does of any other creditor; if we are to surrender that power which Congress has to compel these companies so to administer their affairs as not to become bankrupt, so to administer their affairs as not to put their net earnings all in the pockets of their shareholders and leave their creditors without payment; if we are to surrender that power of control of administration, then I say we should require a much better bargain than this bill would make.

Why, Mr. President, let us see how this bill will operate. I have before me some calculations made by the chief of accounts of the Treasury Department, perhaps the best expert in Washington. He ought to be, for he is chief of accounts in the great money Department of the Government. I put this question to him:

Question 1. Taking "net earnings," as defined in section 1 of the Judiciary Committee bill, and establishing the 5 per cent. of net earnings and the half-transportation account in the future as follows, namely, Union Pacific, $700,000 annually—

That is the 5 per cent. and the half transportation, payable to the Government under existing law—and Central Pacific, $500,000 annually, together $1,200,000 annually, what additional sum would each company have to pay into the sinking fund to make a sum equal to 25 per cent. of its net earnings?

That was a proper question, because under our bill we propose not to take more than 25 per cent. of their net earnings, either for present payments under the law as it now exists or for a sinking fund. What answer does he make?

Answer. Taking the ordinary and regular net earnings of the two companies to be as follows, namely—the additional sum required from each company would therefore be $100,000 from the Union Pacific and $800,000 from the Central Pacific Company.

I will not read all the details, but he goes into the matter in detail—

That is in addition to the half-transportation account which is put into the sinking fund, to which the companies are now entitled. That would make in the case of the Union Pacific, on an average of the last six years' business, a payment of $521,000 into the sinking fund, and for the Central Pacific a payment of about $1,000,000 into the sinking fund. The reason that the payment into the sinking fund by the Union Pacific is so much less than by the Central Pacific is that the transportation account over the Union Pacific is more than double what it is over the Central Pacific.

Mr. ALLISON. Allow me to ask a question right on that point. He says the sum is $100,000 for the Union Pacific.

Mr. THURMAN. On this basis, yes.

Mr. ALLISON. Would that make $800,000 for the Union Pacific? The half transportation is put in in addition.

Mr. THURMAN. Four hundred and twenty-one thousand dollars.

Mr. ALLISON. He makes this calculation on the same basis which would make a total payment of the sum of $521,000 on the part of the Union Pacific Railroad?

Mr. THURMAN. Exactly.

Mr. ALLISON. That is not enough.

Mr. THURMAN. I agree that it is not enough.

Mr. BLAINE. The calculation must be wrong.

Mr. THURMAN. I leave that to the Senator from Maine and to the chief of accounts of the Treasury Department to show whether it is wrong; but here are the figures.

Mr. BLAINE. There cannot be $700,000 difference between what should be estimated for one company and what should be estimated for the other, unless you can show a much larger difference between the half-transportation account of the companies than I have yet discovered. There is no $700,000 difference between the half-transportation accounts of the two companies.

Mr. THURMAN. Here are the figures, and the Senator can calculate for himself whether they are right or not. It is sufficient for my purpose that here they are. I agree that would not be enough, and it would be an utter absurdity in us to tie up our hands for twenty years, and say that we will receive no more from the Union Pacific than about half a million of dollars a year into the sinking fund; and therefore I am totally opposed to the amendment of the Senator from Maine. What does he say? He is willing to raise it $100,000 more, and make it $600,000 instead of $500,000. I am totally unwilling to do that. He does not propose to raise it even that much because it is $521,000, and he would raise it to $600,000, $79,000 difference. Raising it $79,000 is the last tail to his amendment. It raises it $79,000. That is all there is in that tail. It raises it $79,000 in regard to the Union Pacific, and as to the Central Pacific it does not raise it a dollar. So all the great benefit of that proviso to the amendment of the Senator from Maine is to make an increase of the amount which the Union Pacific road shall pay into the sinking fund of $79,000 a year, in case its net earnings and half-transportation account should in the future be the average of what they have been for the last six years. That will not do at all.

I have said that this estimate is upon the basis of $1,200,000 a year as the sum of the 5 per cent. and the half transportation. The Judiciary Committee estimated it at $1,166,000; I take $1,200,000 as a round sum; but the committee said in its report that in their opinion the amount would be much larger, that both the 5 per cent. and the half transportation would be much larger, but they could not undertake to estimate it. Now, this chief of accounts has undertaken to estimate it by considering the increase of the net earnings and the half transportation ever since these roads were opened, and making the calculation in that way—that is, ascertaining the rate of increase in the past and assuming the same rate in the future—he comes to the conclusion that, upon the basis of what is likely to be the increased business of these two companies, the increased half transportation and the increased net earnings upon which we should get 5 per cent., that additional sum which each company would have to pay into the sinking fund under the Judiciary Committee bill to make a sum equal to 25 per cent. of its net earnings so defined would be, for the Union Pacific $573,216 and for the Central Pacific $1,465,730.

But you will remember that our bill contains a further limit that that shall not exceed $1,200,000 in the case of the Central Pacific. Therefore, on the estimate of what will be the business based on the rate of increase of business in the past, the calculation to be made for the Union Pacific would be $573,000 and for the Central Pacific $1,200,000. To this amount thus payable by the Union Pacific you have to add the half transportation, which would bring it up to a million of dollars at the least annually to be paid by that company into the sinking fund, and the amount to be paid annually by the Central Pacific would perhaps reach the sum of a million and a half of dollars. That is likely to be the effect of this bill if it should pass, and the result of it in the outcome upon the debt would be as follows:

At the maturity of the debt the companies will still owe under present laws, that is if they should not be changed, according to the best estimate that can be made of the product of the 5 per cent. and the product of the half transportation, $109,000,000. The estimate of the Judiciary Committee was $120,000,000, and of the Railroad Committee $122,000,000. The chief of accounts estimated it at $109,000,000, because, as I have said, he estimates the 5 per cent. of net earnings and the half-transportation account higher than the estimate of the committees under the Judiciary Committee bill, upon the committee's estimate of $1,166,000, or in round numbers $1,200,000, as the amount of the 5 per cent. and the half transportation, the sum that would be due to the Government at the maturity of the bonds, the average time of which is October 1, 1897, would be $75,000,000. That is what the two companies would owe to the Government at that time upon the estimate made by the Judiciary Committee of the 5 per cent. and of the half transportation, if the bill should pass; but upon the estimate made by this expert, this chief of accounts, allowing for the increased business in the future at the ratio at which it has increased in the past, or something like that, the amount that would remain due would be $36,000,000. Under Senate bill No. 812, the bill of the Railroad Committee, the Government would sponge out fifty-three million and odd, losing that by mere computation of interest, and the companies would still owe at the maturity of the bonds $67,000,000.

Mr. President, it seems to me that this statement of itself shows that this is not a subject upon which the hands of Congress ought to be tied, so that, no matter what may be the consequences in the future, no matter how these companies may mismanage their affairs, no matter, on the other hand, how prosperous they may be, we shall be so tied up that we can do nothing for the protection of their creditors.

Mr. ALLISON. What shall I understand is the amount due on the basis of the Judiciary Committee bill?

Mr. THURMAN. The Judiciary Committee made an estimate that the half transportation and the 5 per cent. would amount to $1,166,000 annually for the two companies, which I put in round numbers at $1,200,000. Upon that basis the amount, if the Judiciary Committee bill should be passed, which would remain due at the maturity of the bonds, would be $75,000,000; but upon the basis of $1,700,000, which is the calculation this expert makes as the average of the 5 per cent. and the half transportation in the future for twenty years, the debt would be reduced to $36,000,000. It grows out of the difference between the estimated amount of that which is presently payable and also the very different amounts which go into the sinking fund. For instance, if the Judiciary Committee's calculation is correct, there would only be $100,000 in addition to the half transportation to go into the sinking fund for the Union Pacific. If this expert's calculation is correct of the business of the future, there will be $573,000.

Mr. ALLISON. As I stated, I took the report of the Judiciary Committee and had estimates made beginning from the issuance of these bonds to their maturity; and estimating for the 5 per cent. and the half transportation at $650,000, the sum of $800,000 per annum will liquidate the entire interest of the Union Pacific, and a million of dollars the interest and only the interest of the Central Pacific.

Mr. THURMAN. I can show the Senator I think in a moment that that calculation can hardly be exactly right, because on the committee basis the estimate of what is to be paid and is presently applicable, with the amount which the companies are to pay in addition to that and with interest upon it, would not more than meet the interest on the Government loan. Indeed, it would fall short of doing that. But upon the basis of the chief of accounts the interest would be repaid and nearly twenty millions of the principal.

Mr. MITCHELL. I should like to ask the Senator a question for information. Upon what basis does he make the estimate of the half-transportation account and the 5 per cent. on its actual amount in the past year?

Mr. THURMAN. I have said several times—I am sorry my friend did not hear me—that it is on an average of six years past in respect to one of the companies and four years in regard to the other.

Mr. MITCHELL. But the estimate made by the expert in the Treasury Department is on an estimate of what these items probably will be in the future.

Mr. THURMAN. Yes; and estimating the increase already, and making a very moderate estimate, too, he says that, in his judgment—and I am inclined to think he is right—the 5 per cent. of net earnings and the half transportation, instead of being $1,200,000, as the Judiciary Committee estimate, will be about $1,700,000, a half million more, and I think he is right. As I said before, these roads are only in their infancy; every year they will be tapped by new roads, branch roads, some constructed by themselves, others constructed by others. Every one of these branch roads brings business; it is all grist to their mill; and as to rival roads, they are in no danger from rival roads for twenty years to come. Rival roads do not succeed very well. If the Southern Pacific, for instance, were completed, owned by the very same men who own the Central Pacific, I should like to know where the rivalry would be. I should like to see rivalry there. But where is to be the rival of the Union Pacific? It will have none; certainly none if my friend from Oregon shall get a branch road built from Portland to the Union Pacific, and thus kill the Northern Pacific stone-dead for many a long year. Then the Union Pacific will not have much trouble.

Mr. MITCHELL. Suppose your friend from Oregon should succeed, in connection with his colleague and others, in getting the Northern Pacific through, what then?

Mr. THURMAN. If he should get the Northern Pacific through, it is so many hundred miles away from the Union Pacific that I do not think it will be much of a rival to the latter or do it much harm.

Mr. President, I have but a few words more to say in answer to some things that have been said, and then I will not delay the Senate longer. I do not propose to argue the question of the power of Congress at length any more. I have not argued it at much length heretofore. If the report of the Judiciary Committee, if the speeches that have been made in support of that power are not sufficient to convince a Senator, nothing can, though one should rise from the dead. I have only to repeat one point that I made last Thursday. The reservation of a power to alter, amend, or repeal, makes it impossible that the exercise of that power can be the violation of a contract, can be the impairment of a contract. It is a simple impossibility, for what you do the contract itself says that you may do, and, therefore, you cannot impair the obligation of the contract by doing that very thing which the contract authorizes.

Mr. BLAINE. Is there no limit?

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, there are limits. There are certain limits in the Constitution of the United States. You shall not take private property for public use without making just compensation. Nobody pretends that you can do that under any power to alter, amend, or repeal a charter. There are a great many other things. You shall not commit murder, and you cannot do that under the power reserved.

Mr. MITCHELL. If the reservation is part of the contract, thereby enabling Congress to interfere by amendment, can Congress or can it not, under the theory of the honorable Senator, provide by law, by an amendment to the charter, that this interest, which is not required to be paid until the maturity of the bonds, shall be paid to the Government semi-annually from the present time? On the theory of the honorable Senator does not that follow inevitably?

Mr. THURMAN. It does not follow inevitably at all.

Mr. MITCHELL. Why?

Mr. THURMAN. And yet I will not say that Congress might not do that very thing. I know very well that our friend from Georgia [Mr. HILL] has said several times—I think I have heard it several times—that this contract of loan is a sort of side-show, that you can do anything you please with everything in the world but this contract of loan. As I understand my friend from Connecticut, [Mr. EATON,] you cannot touch the franchises any more than you can touch the contract of loan. He goes the whole figure. The Senator from Georgia says, "Oh, yes, you can do all you please with the franchises, whatever you please with them, but you shall not touch my little offspring out here that is called a loan." I should like the Senator from Georgia, who is a strict constructionist, to find in the Constitution of the United States any power of the Government of the United States to turn out and be a common money-lender, for that is the ground on which he puts it. I grant the United States can provide for a loan of money out of the Treasury, but it must be in the exercise of some power that is conferred upon Congress. Congress, for instance, has a right to build light-houses; it has a right to build forts; it has a right to build ships; it has power to declare war and make peace. In the exercise of any one of these powers it might be necessary to lend money in order to help a party to build a road or a fort, to build a ship of war, to build an arsenal, to cast cannon, or make fire-arms, or the like; and when it is in the power of Congress to make a loan, which it must derive under the military power, or the post-office power, or some other like power, or it does not possess it at all; when it has that power, then, in furtherance of that object and in the exercise of the power it may make a loan of money to the corporation that it charters to build a road; but that is not a separate thing from the charter; that is one of the considerations on which the company agree to take the charter. Who knows that this company ever would have accepted this charter and gone to work under it if Congress had not agreed to make this loan? It is one of the considerations that Congress held out to them to do the business. It was not simply the repayment of the money that was expected; not at all; but it was the advantage of a thirty years' loan not reimbursable principal or interest until the end of the thirty years, in order that the roads might be built. That was one of the considerations that Congress held out to them, and that was one of the considerations they had a right to insist upon.

Mr. MATTHEWS. Will my colleague allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly.

Mr. MATTHEWS. If my colleague is right, I should like him to answer why then we cannot change the terms of that thirty-year loan and make it a loan due presently, the entire principal; and why also we cannot change the law of 1864 so as to restore to the United States its priority of lien in reference to that loan as against those who claim under the act of 1864?

Mr. THURMAN. The last part of that question astonishes me. We cannot destroy the vested right of the first-mortgage bondholders to their lien any more than we can take away the right to my house and give it to my colleague, or his house and give it to me. The Constitution of the United States contains no delegation of power to do any such thing as that; nor is there any reservation here that pretends to such a right as that. And as to the question of whether or not we could make this interest payable in presenti to the Government, I have already said to the Senator from Oregon that I was not prepared to say we could not.

Mr. MATTHEWS. I did not say the interest; the principal, not the interest. Why not make the whole loan payable?

Mr. THURMAN. What difference does it make?

Mr. MATTHEWS. It does not make any in my judgment.

Mr. THURMAN. I said the other day, and I repeat it, I shall not stand up here to argue hypothetical cases; I shall not stand up here to argue what is not in this bill. When we propose to make that principal payable presently, or when we propose to make that interest reimbursable presently, it will be time enough for us to discuss that question; but there is not one word in this bill that does any such thing.

The Senator from Connecticut said he would show that this bill impaired the obligation of a contract, and he gave a great string of general principles. I do not know whether they were right or wrong, for when I heard of "general principles" I did not pay the attention I am accustomed to pay to whatever he says; but I listened in vain for him to show one particular in which this bill impaired the obligation of any contract whatever, unless indeed what he said in the close of his speech meant that there was an impairment of a contract, and that was that to require them to put some money into a sinking fund, instead of putting it into their own pockets, was impairing the obligation of a contract. There I must differ with my friend. I find no impairment of the obligation of a contract in any such thing as that.

Mr. PADDOCK. The Senator will allow me—

Mr. THURMAN. Not at this moment. I could pile these desks, not mountain-high but a great deal higher than the Senate would like to see them, with instances of legislation of precisely the character in principle of that which requires these sinking funds to be created. While my friend from Connecticut was speaking, it just occurred to me to look at the national-bank act and see what Congress has done under this reserved power to alter, amend, or repeal in that case, and I will take only a few instances and not the most striking, for I have not time to do it. Let us see. Remember that the banking act contains the reserved right to alter, amend, or repeal. A certain limit to the amount of national-bank notes was fixed by the original act, the act of February 25, 1863, and the act of June 3, 1864. Under these acts the banks had a right to so many circulating notes. What did Congress do of its own mere power and will on the 12th day of July, 1870? It cut those notes down to $354,000,000; said they should not exceed that amount, although in order to get them down to that amount the banks had to retire notes which, under the law as it stood before, they had a perfect right to issue and use for their own profit.

Again, there was a distribution of that currency under the act of 1863, the bank charter. Under that distribution it was said that some States got much more than a fair share of it, especially the New England States, particularly Massachusetts, and I believe the State of Connecticut and others. What did Congress do in 1870? It declared in the act of the 12th of July, 1870—

That to secure a more equitable distribution of the national-banking currency there may be issued circulating notes to banking associations organized in States and Territories having less than their proportion as herein set forth. And the amount of circulation in this section authorized shall, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, as it may be required for this purpose, be withdrawn, as herein provided, from banking associations organized in States having a circulation exceeding that provided for by the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide for a national-banking currency secured by pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof,'" approved March 3, 1865, but the amount so withdrawn shall not exceed $25,000,000.

There under the express provisions of the charter the banks in New England and New York—for I believe it only touched the New England States, and perhaps only two or three of them, and New York—were compelled to give up twenty-five millions of their currency to which they had a perfect right under the law as it then stood, and until Congress altered it, and Congress did not ask the consent of the banks at all; it exercised the power of taking those notes away from those corporations under the reserved power to alter, amend, or repeal.

But, sir, that is not all. Look at an act passed on the 19th of February, 1869, which declared—

That no national-banking association shall hereafter offer or receive United States notes or national-bank notes as security or as collateral security for any loan of money, or for a consideration shall agree to withhold the same from use, or shall offer or receive the custody or promise of custody of such notes as security, or as collateral security, or consideration for any loan of money.

Then it makes it a penal offense. Before the passage of that act it was perfectly lawful to do that thing; it was one of the chartered rights of the companies to do that thing. Every one of them had that right, and the very best kind of security would be these very notes; yet Congress came in and in the exercise of its legislative power, without asking the consent of the corporations, said "You shall no longer exercise this right, and, if you attempt to do it, it shall be a misdemeanor and you shall be punished criminally."

I might read many more alterations that have been made, but it is unnecessary to take up the time of the Senate in doing it. There is one great alteration in the reserves which these banks are to keep. We compelled them at one time to put 5 per cent. of their circulation into the Treasury of the United States as a security and we prescribed what reserves they shall keep; and all this is done under the reserved right to alter, amend, or repeal. Done why? Done to secure the public, done to secure their creditors, done not because the banks assented to it, done not for their interest, done not for their pleasure, done not with their assent, but done in despite of them, because the public good required it and the duty of the Government to protect their creditors required it.

Now, Mr. President, a few words more and I will relieve the Senate from anything further. I do not understand how Senators on this floor who think the Judiciary Committee bill an unconstitutional, an unjust, or an impolitic measure, can vote for the amendment of the Senator from Maine. It is argued here that this is an unconstitutional measure; it is argued that it is one which shocks the moral sense, violates the Constitution, endangers liberty, makes the hair of every strict constructionist stand on end, if he has any hair on the top of his head, [laughter,] makes it bristle "like quills upon the fretful porcupine." All this, and yet the same gentlemen who argue that way say "Let us make this law like a law of the Medes and Persians, unchangeable for twenty years." The worse the law is the longer shall be its duration, the more unconstitutional it is the firmer shall it be fixed upon the country! Well, Mr. President, that is a kind of reasoning I do not comprehend. I can understand how anything like a motion to amend this bill may be made by an enemy of the bill in order to kill it. It is said in parliamentary law that any amendment, however absurd, is admissible, because the mover of it may want its adoption in order to kill the bill; and in this Senate Chamber I say to my friend who presided so long in the other House [Mr. BLAINE] there is no law that requires an amendment to be germane to the subject. He may move the Decalogue to this bill, or a declaration of war, under the rules of the Senate, and therefore I will not say that if a person is determined to defeat this bill he may not vote any amendment upon it that he pleases and can get the Senate to adopt; but how he can do it and be logical, how he can do it and go before his constituents and say "I did this in good faith; I was in favor of that amendment; I thought the bill was outrageous; I thought it violated the Constitution of the country; I thought it was an assertion of omnipotent power by Congress that made liberty itself tremble on the Dome of the Capitol; I thought all that about it, but I thought the best thing we could do was to make it permanent for twenty years!"—that is a thing I cannot understand. That does not apply to the Senator from Maine, I admit, for the Senator from Maine agrees, I think, that the bill is constitutional and he thinks it is a reasonable bill, too, and so it is or would be in his opinion if it should receive his amendment; but if it should get his amendment on it, it would be the most unreasonable bill I ever saw, in my humble opinion and with due deference to his better judgment.

Mr. President, I have spoken long enough, twice as long as I intended to speak, and I am perfectly willing now to submit this subject to the Senate.

I wish to say in conclusion—and I do not know that I shall trouble the Senate with anything further—indeed after the very able speech made by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee [Mr. EDMUNDS] this morning I am hardly excusable for having said what I have, but having this bill in charge, having bestowed great care upon it, having bestowed long study and much labor upon it, I thought it my duty to make some remarks in the close of the discussion. I wish, I repeat, to say in conclusion that I have no feeling on this subject and can have no feeling but that which becomes a Senator. My judgment is not in the least degree swayed by interest. There is no interest in Ohio adverse to these companies that does not exist in Georgia or Maine or any other State in the Union, and there is no interest adverse to them, unless to make them discharge their duties and pay their debts is an adverse interest. I do not know a citizen of Ohio who owns a dollar of stock in either one of these companies. I do not know a citizen of Ohio who owns a bond of one of these companies; I do not know a citizen of that State who is a creditor of one of these companies in any way; I do not know a citizen of my State who is a stockholder or creditor of any rival company to these companies. If there could be a constituency that stands perfectly impartial between the Government and these corporations, it is the constituency that I have the honor in part to represent. All they ask of them, all they ask of their Representatives in Congress is to see that justice is done. And in order that justice may be done they ask that their cherished principle, for which they long contended and which they carried by triumphant majorities and crystallized in the constitution of the State, that every charter granted by the Legislature shall be subject to alteration, amendment, or repeal, in the discretion of the Legislature—they do ask that this great principle which they think essential to the preservation of liberty, essential to the preservation of purity in legislation, essential to the rights and prosperity of the people, essential to guard against the dangers that history taught them had so often befallen a people from the existence of monopolies, shall be maintained. They are unwilling that this great principle shall be frittered away and reduced to nothing, shall become a shadow instead of a living and potent reality. That they are unwilling to do. In all that I sympathize fully with them. And if I have expressed myself warmly on this subject, it is because I do so sympathize, and this it is that has led me to say again and again, not by way of bravado, not as my friend from Connecticut seems to think, by way of dictating the bill of the Judiciary Committee as the ultimate result of human wisdom, (for I have never intimated any such thing, nor do I know any other member of the committee who has done so,) but it is that sentiment as well as the sentiment of justice and of our duty to the people of the United States that have made me speak perhaps somewhat warmly on the subject, and to declare as I did declare, and now repeat, that rather than see that power of Congress, reserved to it over these corporations, suspended for one day I would see this bill defeated and every dollar of the Government debt forever lost.

Mr. BLAINE. I did not desire to interrupt the Senator from Ohio while he was speaking; but there is one point upon which before he leaves his seat I should be glad to have an answer from him. I understood the Senator, as I did the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] this morning, to maintain that my amendment if adopted would divest Congress of all power over the corporations; that the power to amend, alter, and repeal would be gone. Did I so understand the Senator?

Mr. THURMAN. Why, quoad the debt it is gone.

Mr. BLAINE. Quoad the debt, but the Senator did not limit himself in that way when he was speaking of it.

Mr. THURMAN. I did not. I do not intend to limit myself.

Mr. BLAINE. Then, what I want to ask the Senator is, where will that power be when the debt is all paid? Will the payment of the debt extinguish the power? Will the power to alter, amend, or repeal this charter be extinguished when the debt to the Government is finally and fully paid?

Mr. THURMAN. Not the least bit of it.

Mr. BLAINE. Then why or where does my amendment interfere with the power?

Mr. THURMAN. For this reason: suppose—

Mr. BLAINE. But the Senator did not make the least exception. He made the assertion broadly that my amendment destroyed the power to repeal, alter, or amend.

Mr. THURMAN. I certainly spoke secundum subjectam materiam, as the lawyers say.

Mr. BLAINE. I think the Senator will find that the language he used does not justify that conclusion.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator asks me a question, but he will not give me a chance to answer.

Mr. BLAINE. Oh, I will sit down and let the Senator answer at length.

Mr. THURMAN. I say that the amendment proposed by the Senator would take away from Congress all control over these roads in respect of the Government debt for twenty years, except those provisions which are contained in the acts of 1862 and 1864, and in this act, and that therefore, no matter what shall be the condition of affairs hereafter, no matter how much their revenues should increase and they might be better able to indemnify the Government and save their creditors, or on the other hand, no matter what might be their misconduct, our hands will be tied. I was speaking of the debt; but I do not presume to follow it out to its consequences, as the Senator from Vermont did this morning; but I do say that every word that the Senator from Vermont said as to the scope and effect of the amendment, if it were adopted, is worthy of the most serious consideration of the Senate.

Mr. BLAINE. Then the Senator limits his remark to that. Now, another thing. When the Senator went on to describe with minuteness just how this amendment would operate he failed, as I think, to keep his argument on all fours, because after he had given the table from the expert in the Treasury Department showing that there would be $30,000,000 left at the maturity of the bonds from both roads he went on to say, "but we all underrate the immense development of these roads." He gives it as his opinion that the development would far outrun any of the calculations submitted. I agree with him. I think so myself. I think his bill takes a sliding scale of 25 per cent. of the net earnings that will far more than pay the debt to the Government within the time. All the arguments I have made heretofore have been based upon taking the Senator's own calculation and his own figures. As I had no time myself to make any calculations, I was compelled to take those of the Judiciary Committee, and I was very willing to do so, because I supposed they had been made with care. But the Senator takes occasion himself to assure us, after those calculations were given in the last remarks he made, that the development of this road, still in its very infancy he says, is to be so enormous that it will far outrun any calculation made upon it. I should like to propound this query to the Senator: Suppose that you could lay down to-day exactly this ground, that this company shall pay every year enough to absorb the interest and part of the principal and that right along from now for the next twenty years there should be enough paid every year to wipe out the entire debt before its maturity; would the Senator agree to make that conclusive and final quoad the pecuniary obligation of the road?

Mr. THURMAN. I tell the Senator I would not agree under any circumstances to suspend the power of Congress over these corporations for one day, and if he would make the amount to be paid into the sinking fund $5,000,000 a year, or $10,000,000 a year, I would not agree to surrender the power of Congress.

Mr. BLAINE. Not over the debt?

Mr. THURMAN. No, not over anything.

Mr. BLAINE. Then I ask the Senator if these railway companies would bring all the money here to-morrow that is owed to the Government and offer it in payment, would he still insist on the power?

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly. We are talking of the roads.

Mr. BLAINE. Over the debt. I was speaking solely of the debt. The Senator says that if they would agree to pay $10,000,000 a year he would not make a conclusive bargain as respects the debt. It seems to me that weakens if it does not destroy the whole position of the Senator. It does seem to me, with entire respect for the Senator, that he has seemed to place himself in the position of the man in the story who was so contrary that he would not allow himself to do as he had a mind to. The Senator said if the companies would come here and offer $10,000,000 a year he would not put a provision in and say "We will not legislate on that, as conclusive on the debt; we will not agree that we will not demand $11,000,000 next year." That is the spirit of this legislation. That is the whole spirit of the Senator from Ohio. He brings in a bill here, elaborately studied, thoroughly prepared. He demonstrates to us that its provisions will pay the debt within the time. Nay more, he says to us the roads are in their very infancy, they will outrun this far and far beyond. Then I say to the Senator do not let us have these railroads here perpetually in Congress. Do not let us invite the presence of the lobby which so disturbs the dreams of the Senator from Vermont. Let us say to the railroad companies that if you will do this which will in good faith pay the debt it shall be final on that point. The Senator from Ohio declares that there is no case where he will make such a conclusion. Lest I should have possibly misunderstood him in the original argument, he tells us now that if the railway companies come here and offer to pay $10,000,000 a year he would not agree to accept the offer as final and conclusive respecting the debt; he would not agree that we should not immediately demand $11,000,000 per annum from the companies, though $10,000,000 per annum would pay the entire debt at least twelve years before it is due.

Such, then, is the spirit in which this measure is offered, and when they have prepared it and we were willing to make it a finality if the companies will obey it and faithfully comply with it, the Senator from Ohio says no. It seems to me that the Senator puts himself in the attitude of simply not being willing to make any offer that he thinks the companies would agree to and live under. A Senator [Mr. GORDON] suggests that I should address the Senator from Ohio a question as to whether $20,000,000 a year would satisfy him. It would not of course, because that would take away the immense privilege of punching and worrying the railroad companies next year. Would the Senator from Ohio give up the precious privilege of punching, and knocking, and harrying, and pounding, and twisting a railroad for the pittance of $20,000,000 a year to be paid into the Treasury of the United States? Not he! The Senator says he would rather lose it all, he would rather lose every dollar of the debt, he would rather bury it in the depths of the sea, than surrender the power of overhauling these railroads for a single year. And yet the Senator told us only five years ago on this floor that there ought to be an end to "this tampering" with the subject! Let us stop, said he then, and not leave this thing at "loose ends," let us have a finality with this question, let us have no stock-gamblers here investing nine cents on the legislation of Congress about the railroads to make twenty-one cents clear profit; there should be an end to all "tampering" of that kind, the Senator declared but five short years ago.

And now the Senator declares that what he said then does not apply to this proposition, but that if the railway companies would come here and offer twenty millions on the top of it he would not forego the pleasure of punching the railroad through legislative channels, allowing anybody to speculate if they chose! That is the intentment and the inference to be derived from the Senator's proposition. That is consistent legislation! We who offer to take the Judiciary Committee at its word are accused of being willing to give over the powers of this Government. When the Senator from Vermont had pictured a tremendous disaster, a catastrophe in the shape of a destruction of the securities of the road, a default of all the bonds, and finally the first mortgage in peril and our hands were thereby tied, I simply made an amendment and provided after they had paid all that was due under the 5 per cent. and all that was due under the half transportation that there should also be a minimum of $600,000 per annum from each company. Then the Senator said in answer to the Senator from Iowa, I believe, that I had put too hard a condition on the roads. First, I was going to allow it to go without any sort of security, and when I make it perfectly apparent that it could not be so, he says that I place too hard a condition on the roads. Now, I have come to the conclusion that so far as my humble ability lies I have not the power either to please the Senator from Ohio or the Senator from Vermont, for I would not vote for twenty millions a year. Even that would not please me, and I could not vote for it to please them.

I say with all due respect, Mr. President, that if this legislation be intended in good faith, from my stand-point, if it be intended that these roads shall go about their business and quit the lobby and discharge their duties and pay their debt to the Government and to their other creditors, the way to do it is to say that they shall not be disturbed so long as they "faithfully comply" with the terms and conditions laid down by us. This gigantic railway company is a pet corporation. What would Senators find in the whole legislation of the United States to dwell on as to the overshadowing danger and monopoly of corporations if it were not for the Union Pacific Railroad? I asked yesterday if there was another in the whole United States! I asked the honorable Senator from Vermont, whose knowledge is so minute of all laws, public and private statute and common and civic and criminal and ecclesiastical, and he has not told me what other corporation we could vent our spleen upon; that we could air our vocabulary upon. What other one is there that can be trotted out here as the specimen monopoly if we let go this company? If we let go this company on their simply paying their honest debts, we will be as bad as the young man in London who succeeded to his father's chancery practice, and when the father asked the son about the famous case of Smith vs. Jones the son said, "I settled that yesterday amicably and fairly to both parties." "Oh! you young blockhead," said he, "I have lived on that suit for the last twenty years." It is proposed to make capital of the agitation of this railroad case for the next twenty years. This is to be an agitation always handy for political purposes, always to be drawn on and always to be dragged in and to the extent that the Senator from Ohio himself says that he would not give up that precious privilege if they would offer to pay $10,000,000 per annum to the Treasury of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING.] If he were here, he would vote "yea" and I would vote "nay."

Mr. EDMUNDS, (when the name of Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, was called.) The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CAMERON] and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. McMILLAN] are paired upon the present question. The Senator from Minnesota would vote against the amendment and the Senator from Wisconsin would vote "yea," as I am informed.

Mr. CHAFFEE, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.] If he were here, I should vote "yea" and he would vote "nay."

Mr. DAWES, (when his name was called.) I am paired upon this bill with my colleague, [Mr. HOAR,] who is necessarily absent from the city. I do not know exactly whether he would vote on this amendment with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] and the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] but to be on the safe side I decline to vote. I should vote "yea" if he were here.

Mr. EUSTIS, (when his name was called.) On this amendment only I am paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] If he were present, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. HARRIS, (when his name was called.) Upon this amendment I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. DORSEY,] If he were present, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. HOWE, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES,] who, if here, would vote for the amendment and I should vote against it.

Mr. JOHNSTON, (when the name of Mr. WITHERS was called.) I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. WITHERS] has been detained at home. He is confined to his room. I understand that he is paired with the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS,] but that the pair with the Senator from Kansas does not apply to the amendments to the bill, but only applies to the final vote on the bill.

The Secretary concluded the call of the roll.

Mr. TELLER. I desire to say that on the final vote I am paired with the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. KIRKWOOD,] I am not paired on any amendment and I vote "yea."

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] announces a pair with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KIRKWOOD] who is absent on public business as I understand, on the main question but not on amendments. I feel authorized to say, although not directly from the Senator from Iowa himself, that if he were present he would vote against this amendment.

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 35; as follows:

YEAS—23.

Allison,	Eaton,	Kellogg,	Sargent,
Barnum,	Ferry,	Matthews,	Saunders,
Blaine,	Gordon,	Mitchell,	Spencer,
Bruce,	Hill,	Paddock,	Teller,
Conover,	Ingalls,	Plumb,	Voorhees.
Dennis,	Jones of Florida,	Rollins,

NAYS—35.

Anthony,	Cockrell,	Kernan,	Patterson,
Armstrong,	Coke,	Lamar,	Randolph,
Bailey,	Davis of Illinois,	McCroery,	Ransom,
Bayard,	Davis of West Va.,	McDonald,	Saulsbury,
Beck,	Edmunds,	McPherson,	Thurman,
Booth,	Garland,	Maxey,	Wadleigh,
Butler,	Grover,	Merrimon,	Wallace,
Burnside,	Hereford,	Morgan,	Windom.
Christiancy,	Johnston,	Oglesby,

ABSENT—14.

Cameron of Pa.,	Dorsey,	Howe,	Sharon,
Cameron of Wis.,	Eustis,	Jones of Nevada,	Whyte,
Chaffee,	Hamlin,	Kirkwood,	Withers.
Conkling,	Harris,	McMillan,
Dawson,	Hoar,	Morrill,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. THURMAN. I now move the amendment that I had laid on the table a few days ago and which was printed as an addition to the third section. I move to insert at the end of section 3 the following:

All the bonds belonging to said fund shall, as fast as they shall be obtained, be so stamped to show that they belong to said fund, and that they are not good in the hands of other holders than the Secretary of the Treasury until they shall have been indorsed by him, and publicly disposed of pursuant to this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary informs the Chair that the Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] gave notice of an amendment that has not been formally offered.

Mr. SARGENT. It is obviously useless to offer any amendments to this bill. There is a determination to vote down all amendments of any character whatever. I think I see that so clearly that I shall not offer in form any amendments which I proposed the other day, although I submit they would be an improvement to the bill. I have no doubt that the same vote which voted down the amendment of the Senator from Maine would vote down every other amendment. For that reason I shall not offer an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. CHAFFEE] to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert what will be read.

Mr. CHAFFEE. From the vote just taken I am satisfied, with the Senator from California, that the Senate is determined to pass the bill without any amendment whatever, and as there are some provisions in the bill which I offered as a substitute which I do not care to have the Senate negative—I refer to the provision regarding the prorate question—I desire to withdraw that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is entitled to withdraw the amendment under the rules, the yeas and nays not having been ordered. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Some Senators have suggested that the ninth section of the bill, which declares that there is a lien in behalf of the United States on the whole property of the company for the security of this debt of the United States, might be construed strictly, although I do not think it could be, to prevent the company from disposing of the lands in the ordinary course of its business and getting assets from them, and so on. In order to cover that, to guard against any possible misconception or doubt, so as to make it what the committee intended it beyond all possible question, I offer this amendment, to come in at the end of section 9, and as part of it:

But this section shall not be construed to prevent said companies, respectively, from using and disposing of any of their property or assets in the ordinary, proper, and lawful course of their current business, in good faith, and for valuable consideration.

The object of the amendment is to relieve it from all criticism and doubt that have been suggested about that section. I am bound to say that I do not think the section would bear any such construction, but there is no harm in making it clear if any one has doubts about it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly; by all means.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BLAINE. I said very frequently during the debate that if my amendment, which the Senate did not see fit to agree to, had been adopted, I would have cheerfully voted for the bill. I cannot vote for the bill without it, but I should be very happy to find in the event of future years that I vote unwisely.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I made some remarks on this question some days ago. The principal portion of my time was devoted to the question involved in the amendment suggested by the honorable Senator from Maine, namely, that this should be a final settlement of this question. I believe that the great objection to this measure is to be found in the fact that it leaves this question open for years and years to come. It is not the great hardship of the terms imposed, but the hardship is to be found in the fact that, after Congress has imposed its own terms it is not willing to be bound by its own propositions. Believing as I do that if these companies do not assent to the propositions tendered by Congress in this bill, and undertake to litigate this measure, it will not stand the test of litigation in the courts, and believing as I do that the great objection that has always been raised by the companies to this measure, and the objection that will be raised to it now by them, is to be found in the fact of the reservation of the right to alter, amend, and repeal the very terms of the contract now proposed by Congress, and believing as I do that that objection would have been removed by the adoption of the amendment offered by the honorable Senator from Maine, I voted for that amendment. Had that amendment been adopted, I should have voted for the bill of the Judiciary Committee in the belief that with the bill so amended by the removal of this one objection, which is the great objection to the bill, the companies would have assented to the bill and thus a finality would have been placed on this whole litigation. But, sir, believing as I do that without that assent the bill is unconstitutional, is not and cannot be made binding, I shall now vote against the bill. I only regret that the amendment offered by the honorable Senator from Maine was not adopted. I believe its adoption would have led to the passage of the bill by an almost unanimous if not quite a unanimous vote; that it would have been accepted by the companies; that the Government would be reimbursed for this whole indebtedness; and that this controversy would have been taken from the halls of Congress for the next twenty years, or at least until such time as the companies might fail to comply with the terms now proposed; and the amendment of the honorable Senator from Maine reserved the right to interfere whenever the companies failed to comply with those terms.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the passage of the bill, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] I should vote "yea" if he were present.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I will say on the part of the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] that he requested me to announce, if the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] should not happen to be here, the pair, and to say that his objections to the bill are not of the fundamental character that have been sometimes—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Debate is not in order pending the call of the roll.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not in explaining the pair of a Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that no debate is in order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not propose to debate. I ask unanimous consent to state that my friend from New York is paired and the grounds of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? ["No objection."] The Senator will proceed by unanimous consent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from New York desired me to say that there were some features in the bill which if left as it was he could not assent to, and therefore voting against it if left as it stands without intending to express an opinion against the principle upon which it is founded.

Mr. CHAFFEE, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.] If he were here I should vote "nay."

Mr. DAWES, (when his name was called.) Upon this question am paired with my colleague, [Mr. HOAR.] If he were here I should vote "nay."

Mr. McMILLAN, (when his name was called.) On the passage of the bill I am paired with the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CAMERON.] If he were here I should vote "yea."

Mr. SAULSBURY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] on political questions. I do not regard this as a political question, and besides I have been informed that the Senator from Maine stated that he did not care how this question was decided. He only asked me to pair with him on political questions.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. There is nothing political about this question.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I say there is not, and therefore I shall vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Debate is not in order pending the call of the roll.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I vote "yea."

Mr. TELLER, (when his name was called.) On this vote I am paired with the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. KIRKWOOD.] I was not paired on any collateral vote upon amendments. I should vote, if the Senator from Iowa were here, against the bill. I should have voted against the bill even if the amendment of the Senator from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] had been adopted.

Mr. JOHNSTON, (when the name of Mr. WITHERS was called.) I desire to announce again that my colleague [Mr. WITHERS] is compelled to stay at home, and is unable to be present. If he were here he would vote "yea."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 40, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—40.

Anthony,	Coke,	Jones of Florida,	Patterson,
Armstrong,	Davis of Illinois,	Kernan,	Plumb,
Bailey,	Davis of W. Va.,	Lamar,	Ransom,
Bayard,	Edmunds,	Maxey,	Rollins,
Beck,	Eustis,	McCreery,	Saulsbury,
Booth,	Garland,	McDonald,	Thurman,
Burnside,	Grover,	McPherson,	Voorhees,
Butler,	Harris,	Merrimon,	Wadleigh,
Christiancy,	Hercford,	Morgan,	Wallace,
Cockrell,	Johnston,	Ogelsby,	Windom.

NAYS—20.

Allison,	Dennia,	Hill,	Paddock,
Barnum,	Dorsey,	Iowa,	Randolph,
Blaine,	Eaton,	Kellogg,	Sargent,
Bruce,	Ferry,	Matthews,	Saunders,
Conover,	Gordon,	Mitchell,	Spencer.

ABSENT—16.

Cameron of Pa.,	Dawson,	Jones of Nevada,	Sharon,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hamlin,	Kirkwood,	Teller,
Chaffee,	Hoar,	McMillan,	Wheate,
Conkling,	Ingalls,	Morrill,	Withers.

So the bill was passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the preamble as amended.

The preamble was agreed to.

BANKRUPT LAW REPEAL.

Mr. McCREERY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 35, reported from the Judiciary Committee. ["Oh, no."]

Mr. WINDOM. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. McCREERY. I ask for a vote on my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota interposes with a motion to adjourn, which is always in order.

Mr. McCREERY. Will the Senator from Minnesota withdraw his motion until I can see whether the Senate by a vote will take up the bill or not?

Mr. WINDOM. It is too late to go into that.

Mr. McCREERY. I only want to take up the bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator from Kentucky does not want to make a speech now.

Mr. McCREERY. I do not want to speak to-night.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This debate proceeds by unanimous consent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us have no debate.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota, to adjourn.

The question being put, the Senate refused to adjourn; there being on a division—yeas 22, nays 30.

Mr. McCREERY. I now renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 35) to repeal the bankrupt law.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. Now I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at seven o'clock and forty-two minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, April 9, 1878.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WOOD. I call for the regular order.

Mr. CLYMER. I ask the gentleman to yield to me, that the naval appropriation bill, with the Senate amendments, may be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WOOD. I yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. CLYMER, by unanimous consent, the bill (H. R. No. 3822) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes, with amendments by the Senate, was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and the amendments ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL MONEY.

Mr. WRIGHT. I ask the gentleman from New York to yield to me that I may introduce a resolution for reference.

Mr. WOOD. I yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. WRIGHT. I present a concurrent resolution proposing to issue $400,000,000 of United States notes, to be known as national money, and I ask that it may be read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the concurrent resolution.

Mr. PAGE, (interrupting.) I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Wood] demanded the regular order, but yielded to the gentleman from Pennsylvania to introduce a resolution for reference. That having been done the gentleman from Pennsylvania was entitled to have the resolution read. The reading of the resolution is the regular order.

Mr. PAGE. Very well.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the concurrent resolution. Before he had concluded,

Mr. WOOD said: I must interrupt the reading of that stump speech. I call for the regular order.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I object that suicide is not in order.

Mr. WRIGHT. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Wood] will have many stump speeches before he gets through with his tariff bill that will interfere with its vitality.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already stated that when consent was given to introduce the resolution for reference the gentleman from Pennsylvania had the right to demand the reading. Thereupon the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] withdrew the demand for the regular order. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Pennsylvania has a right to have the resolution read.

Mr. WOOD. The gentleman from Pennsylvania did not state that the reading of the resolution would occupy ten or fifteen minutes.

Mr. ALDRICH. When consent was given to the introduction of the resolution we did not know it was a stump speech, but now we do.

Mr. WRIGHT. The reading having been commenced, I submit it cannot be interrupted.

Mr. EDEN. Is it in order to finish the reading of the resolution?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. EDEN. Then I ask that the reading proceed.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the resolution.

Mr. WRIGHT. I ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and that it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. ALDRICH. I call for the regular order. I object to the reference of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. It was introduced for reference.

Mr. ALDRICH. I object; it is too late.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is before the House for reference.

Mr. ALDRICH. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Civil-Service Reform.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I hope the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALDRICH] will not attempt to cast ridicule on the resolution.

Mr. ALDRICH. I intend no ridicule.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks consent to have the resolution printed in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I object.

Mr. WRIGHT. I want to know who objects.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I object. The workmen of my district cannot afford to pay for the printing of that stump speech.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania, rose.

Mr. WRIGHT. Does my colleague [Mr. WHITE] object?

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. No, sir; I am standing by my colleague.

Mr. WRIGHT. I do not hear my colleague's remarks.

The SPEAKER. There is nothing before the House.

Objection to the concurrent resolution being printed in the RECORD was subsequently withdrawn. It is as follows:

Whereas it is manifestly unjust for a Government that controls by legislation the money its citizens may use for the transaction of their business to contract the amount in circulation so as to embarrass business pursuits or render oppres-

sire the payment of debts by reducing the price of labor or the value of property the income from which was established on a larger amount in use; and

Whereas this Government did for many years provide its citizens with legal-tender and national-bank notes, bonds, and other evidences of debt, which together formed a circulating medium as money equal to about $50 per capita of population at that time, aggregating in amount nearly $2,000,000,000, thereby stimulating all kinds of business prosperity and enterprise on which vast public, private, and corporate debts were created, whose payment was based on the then existing income from labor, property, and active business investments; and

Whereas, by the persistent and continued efforts of the Treasury Department, aided by legislation from 1867 until the present time, many of the obligations which then entered into use as money have been so changed or contracted as to reduce the amount now in actual circulation to less than $700,000,000, or $14 per capita of present population; and

Whereas the effect of such contraction has been to paralyze nearly all kinds of industries and reduce the income from nearly all kinds of property, to stop the wheels of progress and destroy enterprise, until four million people are now entirely without employment, with twice that number working on half time for half their former wages, until transactions in real estate have nearly all ceased, except by foreclosure of mortgages, until the amount in circulation is nearly all constantly employed in the payment of public dues, until it has become more difficult to earn one dollar in any legitimate business now than it was to earn four dollars when said debts were created, until the depreciation in value of nearly all kinds of property is so rapid that the few who now own money will not invest it while its purchasing power is being so rapidly increased by reason of such depreciation, until stop laws are required prohibiting depositors from drawing their own money out of banks, which must end in stop laws prohibiting the collection of all debts, including taxes, until embezzlement, perjury, forgery, suicide, or failure marks the history of nearly all our financial institutions, until failures in nearly all kinds of business constitute the most important items of news published in the daily papers, and, finally, until it has become a physical as well as a financial impossibility for the people to pay their debts or transact their business with the amount of money now in circulation, or prevent universal bankruptcy and repudiation among nearly all classes unless its amount is immediately increased; and

Whereas the occasion for issuing said evidences of debt which constituted said volume of currency and caused such prosperity in business was the necessities of the Government in carrying on a great civil war, the results of which are now acquiesced in by the whole people, whose present sufferings nearly all arise from said contraction; therefore it would be manifestly unjust for the people's Representatives in Congress, who have authority to determine the amount of money that may be put in circulation, to refuse at this time to reissue a portion of the amount so unjustly contracted, or neglect under existing circumstances to provide a sufficient sum to give immediate relief to the present business distress resting on the whole country, and especially when large amounts can be loaned and at once be put in active circulation among the people, either by aiding in the re-establishment of American commerce on the seas, erecting public buildings, improving rivers, harbors, and inland water-ways, aiding in constructing railroads for the convenience and economy of internal commerce, or the payment of just claims against the Government, all of which interests are now soliciting Government aid by loans of its credit or the appropriation of public money; and

Whereas the experience of the past sixteen years has taught our people that the value of money consists in the stamp or impress of the Government which enables it to buy property and pay debts, and not in the material stamped or impressed, as is fully demonstrated by the use of paper money in the satisfactory settlement of over 95 per cent. of their entire business transactions where money of any kind is used; and that all money is but the product of labor, whether issued by the Government in payment of services rendered for its protection or support, or in paying for property necessary for its use, or in tolling in the bowels of the earth for the precious metals, which, when obtained, like any other material, require the sanction of law to make them available for use as money; and

Whereas it is clearly manifest that the intelligence of the American people has accepted and demands for future use, for the transaction of domestic business, a convenient paper money, to be issued by the Government and to represent its entire wealth, labor, and productions, for its security, to be redeemable through its ability to pay all debts or dues, public or private, to be limited in its amount to its actual requirements and thereby make it absolute money which will form a bond of union between the people and their Government to last as long as it lasts, which money Congress has the undoubted right to and should now issue, not only in response to such demand and the present pressing necessities of the people, but as one of the results produced by the too rapid contraction of the amount of obligations issued by the Government in carrying on the late war, nearly all of which for a long time entered into circulation as money; and

Whereas the issue of said money would not diminish but would increase the demand for gold and silver far beyond their possible present use as money, by stimulating enterprise and prosperity among the people, thereby creating a necessity for their use in the arts, without in any manner diminishing their value among those people who are not yet sufficiently advanced in civilization to accept, or whose governments are not yet sufficiently well established to form a basis of credit for the transaction of their business: Therefore, in view of these considerations,

Be it resolved, (if the Senate concur), That in order to provide a sufficient amount of money for the necessary demands of domestic business, to give work to the unemployed, and a fair return for labor and its productions, to enable the people to pay their private and public debts, and to relieve them from the present oppressive burdens of taxation, Congress will authorize the immediate issue of $400,000,000 of United States notes which shall be a legal tender for their face value in the payment of all debts or dues, public or private, hereafter created and for all existing debts or obligations except where the contract provides for their payment in coin, said notes to constitute a permanent non-interest bearing obligation for currency uses to be known as national money, and to be placed in circulation at the earliest possible time by authorizing and directing its expenditure in the current expenses of the Government, in pressing to early completion necessary public improvements such as are indicated in the preamble to this resolution, and in the prompt payment of just public obligations: Provided, always, That no stock or bonds shall ever be issued to represent said money or any burden ever be levied on or collected from the people for its use when so expended.

APPROPRIATION FOR TEMPORARY CLERKS, ETC.

Mr. DURHAM. I rise to a privileged question. I present the report of a committee of conference.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House (H. R. No. 3102) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to employ temporary clerks, and making an appropriation for the same, also making appropriations for detecting trespass on the public lands and for bringing into market public lands in certain States, having met, after full and free conference, have been unable to agree.

M. J. DURHAM,
J. H. BLOUNT,
J. H. BAKER,

Managers on the part of the House.

WILLIAM WINDOM,
S. W. DORSEY,

JAMES B. BECK,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. DURHAM. I desire to make a brief explanation of this report. I will state for the information of the House that the committee of conference finally agreed upon every item, and made a compromise in regard to all the items with the exception of Senate amendment No. 8. That amendment reads thus:

For railway mail agents and postal clerks, $20,000.

The committee of conference could not agree upon that. There were some propositions of compromise even upon that amendment of the Senate, but they failed, and we are bound to report the fact to our respective Houses.

If any gentleman desires to know the exact agreements as to the amendments I might state them; but I suppose that is a matter of no importance.

Mr. JONES, of Alabama. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. Mr. DURHAM. I will hear the gentleman after a moment. After stating my own view I propose to yield the floor to my friend on the conference committee, the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT,] who is better posted on these matters than I am. I was very thoroughly convinced of the fact that it was not necessary to give this amount of money for the purpose of employing these postal clerks. They had expended I know a very large amount of money over and above the amount of the regular appropriation for the purpose of having these postal clerks, and the House committee was thoroughly impressed with the idea that they had already as much money as they ought to expend in that way. But, as I said before, we proposed to compromise this matter, but the conferees on the part of the Senate would not agree to that, and therefore we had to disagree and report the matter back for the consideration of this House. If the House comes to the conclusion that they are willing to increase this extravagance, as we believe it to be, and put an appropriation of $20,000 in the bill, then the conference committee will throw the responsibility on the House rather than take it themselves. I now yield to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT,] who is better posted and understands this matter better than I can and who will explain it to the House.

Mr. DUNNELL. Will the gentleman from Kentucky allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DURHAM. Certainly.

Mr. DUNNELL. Before the gentleman takes his seat, I will ask him if it did not appear before the committee that there was in different sections of the country a need of route agents who cannot now be appointed for want of means.

Mr. DURHAM. It was so asserted by the conferees on the part of the Senate, but it was not made apparent to the conferees on the part of the House.

Mr. DUNNELL. I know that in my own State there are four or five routes where an agent is absolutely needed, and it is asserted by the Post-Office Department that there are no means to supply such agents. Mr. RYAN. That is the case also in my own State upon several routes.

Mr. BANNING. I understand that this appropriation is for route agents to be employed, and not for any that are now employed.

Mr. HOOKER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky one question. There is a clause in this bill which provides $20,000 for a force to protect the timber of the Government; what was the conclusion of the committee upon that subject?

Mr. DURHAM. I will answer that question when the report finally comes before the House. If we can arrange this matter about the postal clerks, I will state how the other provisions of the bill stand.

Mr. HOOKER. Was there any difference between the conferees of the two Houses in reference to that matter?

Mr. DURHAM. There was none.

Mr. HOOKER. Does the Senate committee agree to the amount you propose to insert in the bill?

Mr. DURHAM. I do not answer that question.

Mr. HOOKER. Was there any disagreement?

Mr. DURHAM. There was not; we have compromised upon that subject, and I will explain it when the report finally comes before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to call the attention of the gentleman from Kentucky to the fact that the report of the conference committee is a disagreement to all the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. DURHAM. I am aware of that, but I do not see the propriety of stating at this time what was the action of the committee in regard to any clause outside of this one.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to suggest that this is a disagreement entirely as to all matters of difference between the two Houses.

Mr. DURHAM. Yes, sir, it is. I now yield to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT.]

Mr. WAIT. Allow me to ask the gentleman whether this disagreement is as to the amount of the appropriation or as to the number of these route agents.

Mr. DURHAM. It is a disagreement as to the amount, number, and everything else.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would again state that the report of the committee of conference indicates an entire difference as to all the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. MITCHELL. I understand the gentleman from Kentucky to say that the only difference between the conferees on the part of the House and those on the part of the Senate is as to the question of appropriating money for a deficiency for route agents, and as to that I desire to ask the gentleman, if he will permit me, whether the gentleman reports from the committee of conference whether the conference committee made inquiries of the superintendent of the railway mail service as to this deficiency on route service?

Mr. DURHAM. I think that if the House would be quiet and will listen to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT,] who has charge in the Committee on Appropriations of all postal matters, and who, as I have said, is better posted on these matters than I am, they will understand the matter, and then can ask him such questions as they wish.

Mr. MITCHELL. I desire to say now upon that subject that there is certainly a necessity for an increased appropriation for this mail-agent service. I know that upon several routes the agents have been removed who had only received from $300 to $400 a year, and the only reason for their removal was that there was a deficiency in the appropriation for that service.

Mr. DURHAM. We will try to answer all questions, but I ask the House to listen to the gentleman from Georgia, to whom I now yield.

Mr. BLOUNT. At the extra session of Congress we were asked to appropriate, and did appropriate, the sum of $10,000 in addition to the amount heretofore appropriated for postal railway clerks. That additional amount for three-fourths of a year made the appropriation for that service equivalent to $15,000 per annum.

It certainly enabled the Department to put on at least fifteen additional men. Moreover, gentlemen on both sides complain that route agents have been taken from places where they once were. They have been put into this postal-car service. The superintendent of railway mail transportation tells us himself in his report that he has taken from the various railways in the country fifty route agents for the postal-car service. This service is with him a hobby; and the whole railroad service of the country is made subservient to this pet of his. This is where the trouble arises. On some railroads there is mail service as often as 98 round trips weekly; on others 41½; on others 42; on others 57½, &c.; while in the great bulk of the States there is mail service but twelve to sixteen times a week. In order to take care of this postal-car service, in which he feels so much pride, the superintendent of railway mail transportation takes route agents from routes having comparatively small facilities in order to put them into this postal-car service.

Again, sir, the Senate now, when three-fourths of the fiscal year are past, puts on an amendment for $20,000, being at the rate of $80,000 per annum, or, with the $15,000 already appropriated, $95,000, for this postal-car service, this pet of the superintendent of the railway mail transportation, while the great bulk of the American people as to mail facilities are being neglected.

What is the occasion of this? The Postmaster-General tells you himself that his receipts for the last fiscal year were less than for the preceding fiscal year; and this deficiency does not arise in connection with fourth-class postmasters, but independently. In addition to that he estimates his receipts for the next fiscal year at a lower rate than for the present year. Notwithstanding the growth of the country, he estimates his receipts for the coming year at less than $30,000,000. How is it with the business of the country?

To C. N. JORDAN, esq.

In view of the falling off in the business of the Post-Office Department, and the stagnation of business generally in the country, there is nothing that calls upon us to increase the postal-car service beyond what it has been in previous years.

Sir, I hope the House will not decide to add to this bill an appropriation at the rate of $95,000 annually in the shape of a deficiency for postal clerks in a few sections of the country. I hope we shall not to the pressure which has been brought upon us by withdrawing route agents from various sections and then telling members, "You have not route agents enough." I may say that I should feel discouraged when the superintendent of railway mail transportation treats us in this manner, if the House should tolerate it.

Now, sir, we were willing, as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DURHAM] has stated, to make some concessions. We were willing to appropriate for the remaining quarter of the fiscal year $5,000, which would be at the rate of $20,000 per annum, or, with what has been already appropriated, $35,000 per annum. We were willing to make this appropriation in the shape of a deficiency, but really to be used in extending the postal-car service; but, sir, I appeal to the House to know whether in making such a concession we have not gone far enough at such a time as this and with such surroundings. When the bill was passing through the House we declined to insert this appropriation, and when it went to the Senate the Committee on Appropriations of that body declined to recommend the appropriation to the Senate. But they were beaten. There was a determination to carry the measure through.

Now, sir, this is the House having control of appropriations; these are the Representatives to whom the Constitution has confided the trust of jealously guarding the Treasury. If the Committee on Appropriations have done right, I ask this House to stand by them. It is an unpleasant issue for us to make; but I shall always insist on making this issue whenever necessary, and if the House sees fit to undo our work the responsibility is with it.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Will the gentleman yield to me for about three minutes?

Mr. BREWER. What is there before the House for discussion?

The SPEAKER. The report of a conference committee.

Mr. BREWER. I do not understand that there is any motion pending.

Mr. DURHAM. In order to bring this matter to a test I move that the report of the conferees be accepted and that another conference with the Senate be asked.

Mr. SAMPSON. In order to test the question, I move that the House recede from its disagreement on this amendment.

The SPEAKER. The conferees report a general disagreement.

Mr. SAMPSON. But it is stated, I believe, by the gentleman from Kentucky that the committee of conference were able to agree upon all the items except one.

The SPEAKER. The report does not so show. The gentleman can make a motion that the House recede from its disagreement to all the amendments.

Mr. SAMPSON. I will enter that motion for the purpose of testing the sense of the House.

Mr. DURHAM. I move that the report be received and that another conference be asked. On that motion I call the previous question.

Mr. SAMPSON. Does not my motion take precedence?

The SPEAKER. It does. Does the gentleman make his motion as to all the amendments?

Mr. SAMPSON. I move simply that the House recede from its disagreement.

The SPEAKER. The report shows that they disagreed as to all.

Mr. SAMPSON. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DURHAM] stated there was only one disagreement.

Mr. DURHAM. I insist on my motion.

The SPEAKER. The motion to recede is the first question to be put.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I ask the gentleman from Iowa to withdraw his motion so the House may recede on the question of postal railway service.

Mr. SAMPSON. I wish to inquire whether we can take a vote on each amendment separately.

Mr. COX, of New York. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COX, of New York. Other members are interested in this business and we cannot hear a word that is said.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen will be seated.

Mr. SAMPSON. Is this report indivisible?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is. It is a report of a conference committee that they were unable to agree as to any report.

Mr. SAMPSON. Must this be voted on as a whole?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the report must be voted on as a whole. There is no way to divide it.

Mr. SAMPSON. I make the motion then generally, that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendments.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I move to amend by receding from our disagreement to the postal railway service amendment of the Senate.

Mr. EDEN. Is this in order pending the previous question?

The SPEAKER. The motion to recede has preference over a motion to insist?

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Is the report of the disagreement between the Senate and the House on all propositions embraced?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause the conference report to be read again, and the House will at once see that it embraces every disagreement.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I insist there is only one thing disagreed to.

The SPEAKER. On the contrary, the report is that all the propositions are disagreed to.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I was on the committee of conference and know there was but one point of disagreement.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman should have seen the conference report was properly drawn.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. The only matter was in reference to railway service and postal-car service.

The SPEAKER. That is not presented in the report.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. The gentleman from Kentucky stated that was the only point of disagreement.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read. There is no report, in fact, in reference to the disagreements between the two Houses. It is a naked report that the two Houses are unable to agree.

Mr. SAMPSON. I understood the Chair to say we could have a vote on each item.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman hereafter to move to recede.

The report was again read.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I wish to inquire whether it is not competent to recommit that report so it may be corrected to correspond with the fact?

The SPEAKER. It is quite competent for the House to recommit it if it is incorrect.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Then I move that the report be recommitted to the committee. Under the circumstances that ought to be done. The report was prepared by a clerk and was signed without being read; and I confess I do not propose myself to be caught in such a predicament again.

Mr. EDEN. I make the point of order that it is utterly impossible for this House to know the action of the conference committee except through the report to this House, and consequently the gentleman from Indiana, in getting up and telling the House what has been done in the committee of conference, is out of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is in the nature of information only; it is only a report that the two Houses have failed to agree.

Mr. EDEN. That is all there is in the report.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I confess I am not the first one to make the suggestion that the report does not conform to the action of the committee. I make the motion to recommit.

Mr. BANKS. It cannot be recommitted, because the House has no control in this question. The Senate conferees make the same report to the Senate that the House conferees have made to the House.

The SPEAKER. A question of fact has been raised whether the report conforms to what was the action of the conference committee and in reference to that point the Chair thinks the motion to recommit is in order.

Mr. BANKS. The Senate have equal control with us and the recommitment of the report does not affect the Senate at all.

The SPEAKER. We can acquaint the Senate with the fact that the report has been recommitted for the reason stated and in all probability the Senate will either ask for another conference or move its recommitment.

Mr. BANKS. That shows the motion to recommit is not the right proceeding.

Mr. BLOUNT. I submit that this is only taking up the time uselessly.

Mr. BEEBE. I desire to ask whether the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky does not take precedence of that of the gentleman from Indiana.

The SPEAKER. The motion to commit is first in order in preference to the motion to accept the report of the committee.

Mr. SAMPSON. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman from Kentucky having moved that the House receive the report, I made the motion that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendments, and I understood the Chair to say that that motion was in order, and that it took precedence of the other motion.

The SPEAKER. So it does.

Mr. SAMPSON. But the Chair has stated that the motion pending now is the motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Because the gentleman from Indiana stated that the report was not in accordance with what occurred in the conference.

Mr. BANKS. I submit that that is not a ground for a motion to recommit. The gentleman has not a right to make that motion. He cannot contradict the report in that way. I move that the House disagree to the report of the committee of conference, and ask another conference.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts say that a committee of conference cannot be instructed?

Mr. BANKS. It cannot.

Mr. DURHAM. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will yield to me for a moment, I desire to make a proposition as to this—

The SPEAKER. The Chair directs the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts to this statement in the Manual:

A committee of conference may be instructed like any other committee, but the instructions cannot be moved when the papers are not before the House.

Mr. BANKS. A committee of conference cannot be instructed, because then it would not be a committee of free conference.

The SPEAKER. The House has been in the constant practice of instructing committees of conference.

Mr. DURHAM. I ask unanimous consent of the House to withdraw the report. I make this request for the purpose of having another report made in accordance with the fact.

Mr. SAMPSON. I do not think that is necessary. I think without having a vote upon the amendments separately the House can take a vote on this one item on which the two committees have failed to agree. The sense of the House can be tested now on that one item. I submit there is no difficulty about getting at the one point at issue between the two committees.

Mr. DURHAM. If we can have a direct vote on that postal matter I have no objection to what the gentleman suggests.

Mr. SAMPSON. That would solve the whole difficulty.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SAMPSON] moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendments, and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DURHAM] calls for a division.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to say in response to my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] that the motion to recommit a report of a conference committee is not without a precedent. On the closing day of the Forty-third Congress the House was engaged on the report of a conference committee on an appropriation bill. That report, after discussion, was recommitted—sent back for the consideration of the committee that had previously had the bill in charge, and the report came back with modifications such as had been suggested in the course of debate in the House.

Mr. BANKS. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that it is very likely there is a precedent for this, but I submit that this report is a House report and the recommitment of it sends it to a House committee, which cannot change the report, because the Senate has an equal right with us.

The SPEAKER. This is not any more of a House report than in the case to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania alluded.

Mr. BANKS. The Senate has a joint right with us.

The SPEAKER. If the Senate do not agree to the recommitment, then of course the report fails.

Mr. BANKS. The recommitment will not change it. The proper course is to ask for another committee of conference. The withdrawal of the report will not bring action by the Senate. The only method of securing joint action of the Senate and the House on this question is to disagree to the report and ask for another committee of conference. I make that motion.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to me for a question?

Mr. BANKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLOUNT. What objection has the gentleman from Massachusetts to the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa, to let the House come to a direct vote on the amendment on which the conference committee disagreed?

Mr. BANKS. I do not object to that.

Mr. BLOUNT. My colleague on the committee who makes this report is willing to take that course.

Mr. DURHAM. I have stated that I agree to that proposition.

The SPEAKER. The first amendment will be read.

Mr. DURHAM. The understanding is that the amendments will be separately read and voted on.

Mr. SAMPSON. I agree to that.

Mr. EDEN. Do I understand the gentleman from Kentucky to withdraw his motion to disagree and that he now asks the House again to go over these amendments separately?

Mr. DURHAM. What I desire is that the House shall take a vote at once on all the other amendments except that relating to the postal clerks.

The SPEAKER. The first amendment will be read.

Mr. DURHAM. I thought we were acting in good faith, and that we were to accept the report of the committee of conference upon every amendment excepting the one in regard to postal clerks.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. What has become of the motion I made to recommit?

Mr. BEEBE. I understand that the committees on the part of the two Houses have agreed upon all the amendments except one.

Mr. DURHAM. We have.

Mr. BEEBE. Then there is nothing for the House to recede from excepting its opposition to this one amendment.

Mr. EDEN. Unless we can get this matter before the House in some shape in which it can be understood we ought not to act upon it at all.

Mr. FRYE. I make the point of order that more than five members should not be allowed to speak at one time.

Mr. EDEN. Unless we can have some understanding as to what the report contains, I shall move to lay it upon the table.

Mr. DURHAM. I thought it was a fair and distinct understanding that all of the amendments upon which the committees of the two Houses have agreed in the conference committee should be concurred in; and that then we should take a direct vote upon the question relating to the postal clerks.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to make a suggestion to the House; and it is that if the House will vote upon agreeing to the report of the committee of conference and ask another conference, then the new conference could make a report conformably to the facts.

Mr. EDEN. Why not let the report go at once back to the committee of conference and let them make a report which the House can understand?

The SPEAKER. Because of the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS,] that the action of the committee of conference is the action of both Houses, while the action of the House is the action only of one House. The Chair thinks that if the House will adopt the motion to agree to the report of the committee of conference they will reach an intelligent conclusion.

Mr. DURHAM. What is that suggestion?

The SPEAKER. That the House agree to the report of the committee of conference, which is in substance a disagreement to all the amendments of the Senate, and ask a further conference.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have no objection to that; but I am very sure that the matters involved are very small.

Mr. EDEN. I cannot tell what the committee of conference have agreed to at all.

Mr. BLOUNT. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EDEN] will permit the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DURHAM] to make a statement of it, it is so simple he will be obliged to understand it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Kentucky has made several statements already.

Mr. DURHAM. What I ask the House to do is to sustain the committee in its action upon these amendments until it reaches the amendment in reference to the postal clerks. That is what I ask, and that, I supposed, was the agreement; and if it be in order I will make that motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky will understand that there is nothing before the House in the report of the committee of conference but a general disagreement as to all the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. EDEN. The gentleman seems to have some understanding or some agreement about this bill which I presume he understands, and probably the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] does, but I do not, because I have never heard what it was, and the House is called upon to vote upon a proposition that they cannot understand.

Mr. HASKELL. I move that the report be accepted, and that a new conference be asked with the Senate upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HASKELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. RAINEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill and joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. No. 691) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the sale of certain New York Indian lands in Kansas," approved February 19, 1873; and

A joint resolution (S. No. 22) providing for a place of deposit for the records and proceedings of the commission appointed under the act entitled "An act to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877," approved January 29, 1877.

Mr. WOOD. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business being demanded, the morning hour commences at one o'clock, and the call of committees rests with the Committee on Appropriations.

JAMES T. JOHNSON.

On motion of Mr. HEWITT, of New York, the Committee on Appropriations was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3328) for the relief of the legal heirs and representatives of James T. Johnson, deceased, of Carrollton, Mississippi, and the same was referred to the Committee of Claims.

CHARLES MULKEY.

On motion of Mr. HEWITT, of New York, the Committee on Appropriations was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1821) for the relief of Charles Mulkey, late postmaster at Butler, Georgia, and the same was referred to the Committee of Claims.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York, also, from the same committee, reported back the petition of citizens of Guttenburgh, Iowa, for the improvement of the channel of the Mississippi River at that place, moved that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

JACOB D. HUTTON.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York, also, from the same committee, reported back the petition of Jacob D. Hutton for compensation as messenger on the "soldiers' roll" under the Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives, and moved that the committee be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee of Accounts.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York, moved to reconsider the various votes by which the papers reported by him had been re-referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INDIAN AGENCIES IN ARIZONA.

On motion of Mr. SPARKS, the Committee on Appropriations was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3516) making an appropriation for the payment of certain vouchers now on file in the Interior Department, for supplies delivered for the use and support of the different Indian agencies in the Territory of Arizona, in the year 1874, and prior years; and the same was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. SPARKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred to the Committee of Claims; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SINGLETON. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to report back the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3964) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes, and to move that the House non-concur in all the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that the amendments be read.

Mr. SINGLETON. There are fifty-two amendments in all. The gentleman had better let them go at once to a committee of conference.

Mr. CONGER. There are some amendments in which we might concur.

Mr. SINGLETON. No, sir; I think not.

Mr. CONGER. We could perhaps if a majority of the House were in favor of it.

Mr. SINGLETON. The gentleman had better let all the amendments go to a conference committee.

Mr. CONGER. I would like to have a separate report upon reinstating the ministers-resident at the Netherlands and at Belgium.

Mr. SINGLETON. You will get that after awhile.

Mr. CONGER. I would rather have it now.

Mr. SINGLETON. We discussed the bill very fully when it was under consideration in the House.

Mr. CONGER. There was an attempt to insert the amendments in the House, and the motion failed, when there was a small attendance of members. I think that now these particular amendments, as they come from the Senate, may be concurred in.

Mr. CARLISLE. I suggest to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] that he demand a separate vote only on the particular amendments to which he refers, and let us vote on the remainder all together.

Mr. CONGER. I dislike very much this practice of having amendments from the Senate non-concurred in as a matter of course and then sent to a committee of conference to control the action of this House. If there is anything we ought to understand, it is the separate propositions in such a bill as this.

The SPEAKER. What does the gentleman from Michigan ask? He has a right to have every amendment read and voted on separately.

Mr. CONGER. These amendments are not printed; they are not before the House in any intelligible shape. It is now proposed substantially to leave all these questions to the decision of three men.

Mr. SINGLETON. The gentleman is altogether mistaken. The bill and amendments as they came from the Senate were printed when they were referred to our committee. The gentleman could have examined them long since if he had so wished.

Mr. CONGER. I have not been able to find them in print.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that the Senate amendments are printed. What action does the gentleman ask?

Mr. CONGER. I wish more particularly to have the House concur in the Senate amendment reinstating the minister resident at the Netherlands and at Belgium.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman, then, asks a separate vote on the amendment as to Belgium and as to the Netherlands. The question will first be taken on the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] that all the amendments, with the exception of those on which a separate vote is asked, be non-concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SINGLETON moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments were non-concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The first amendment on which a separate vote is asked will now be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 8:

On page 1, in line 15, after the word "at," insert "Belgium, Netherlands, Argentine Republic."

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Appropriations recommend non-concurrence in this amendment; the gentleman from Michigan asks that the House concur.

Mr. CONGER. The two propositions to which I wished to call the attention of the House were as to the minister resident at the Netherlands and at Belgium. I care less about the other proposition. I do not ask a separate vote on that.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman moves to concur in this amendment of the Senate with an amendment striking out the "Argentine Republic."

Mr. CONGER. I supposed that the proposition for a minister resident to each of these particular countries could be voted on separately.

The SPEAKER. A Senate amendment is not divisible. The Chair has stated the gentleman's proposition in such a manner as to accomplish his exact purpose: to concur in the amendment with an amendment.

The question being taken on the motion to concur in the amendment of the Senate, with an amendment striking out the "Argentine Republic," there were ayes 51.

Before the negative side had been counted,

Mr. CONGER said: Unless this question can be divided as I wish, I shall withdraw my motion. I desire a vote on the propositions separately. This mode of putting the question does not give it to me, and I would rather have all the amendments go to the conference committee.

The SPEAKER. The motion to concur with an amendment is withdrawn. The question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] to non-concur.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SINGLETON moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was non-concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN D. YOUNG.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 1024) for the benefit of Hon. John D. Young, of Bath County, Kentucky, and moved the same be referred to the Committee of Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HALE moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RETIREMENT OF NATIONAL-BANK NOTES.

Mr. BUCKNER. I am directed by the Committee on Banking and Currency to report, as a substitute for House bill No. 2827, a bill (H. R. No. 4247) to retire the circulating notes of the national banks, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read.

Mr. EAMES. I rise, Mr. Speaker, to make a point of order on this bill. It requires an appropriation to be made in order to carry out the purpose of the bill; and under the rules, therefore, it must have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will examine the point.

Mr. BUCKNER. If the gentleman will point out where there is any appropriation of money or of property it may be amenable to the rules.

Mr. EAMES. I am a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, and in raising the point of order I merely desire to procure the fullest and fairest consideration of the proposition before the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. It has direct reference to the ways and means for the support of the Government, and in that regard is liable to a point of order.

Mr. EAMES. It is a bill of great importance and interest to the country. I only desire as a member of the committee that some time shall be named for the consideration of the bill; that some opportunity may be given for debate; that it may be open to debate and amendment, and then that we may come to a vote upon it. That is the reason why I have raised the question of order now.

If the gentleman from Missouri desires I will state the ground upon which the point of order is based. This proposes to issue a certificate of indebtedness on the part of the Government of the United States to pay off the whole debt of the national banks. There is no provision of law existing at this time authorizing the issue of any such certificate. The bill of necessity imposes an expenditure upon the Government to carry it into effect if it shall become a law. On that ground I raised the point, in the first instance, that under the rules it must be first considered in the Committee of the Whole. At the same time if the bill may be fairly considered in the Committee of the Whole I will agree to withdraw the point of order.

Mr. BUTLER. Why not consider it in the House as in the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. EAMES. If the bill be open to amendment and debate as I have stated I will withdraw the point of order I have made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Rhode Island to make the point of order with a view to arriving at some agreement with the gentleman from Missouri as to when the bill shall be considered.

Mr. BUCKNER. I propose to give the fullest consideration to the bill.

Mr. BURCHARD. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, this bill should be considered in the Committee of the Whole. That will give it full and free discussion.

It is liable to and I make the point of order that it must be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union under Rule 110. The sixth section provides for a new method of paying customs duties, and therefore it changes the law in reference to a charge upon the people in the way of taxes, and it has been decided, as I recollect, by a former Speaker that such a change renders a proposition obnoxious to a point of order under Rule 110. This bill provides in the sixth section that customs duties may be paid in United States notes instead of in coin.

Mr. BUCKNER. To what rule is it obnoxious?

Mr. BURCHARD. To Rule 110.

Mr. BUCKNER. Because it appropriates money or property of the Government?

Mr. BURCHARD. No; it changes the law in regard to customs duties.

Mr. BUCKNER. Assuming that to be so, what rule of the House does it violate to ask its consideration in the House?

Mr. BURCHARD. I say that Rule 110 would send it to the Committee of the Whole. That rule provides such propositions should have their first consideration in that committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands, however, that the gentleman from Missouri is willing to have it considered in committee, provided some day can be fixed for its consideration.

Mr. BUCKNER. I do not think it is obnoxious to any rule of the House and must of necessity go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BEEBE. I interpose objection without qualification.

Mr. BUCKNER. Why can it not be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. It can be.

Mr. BUCKNER. That is what I propose to do. But I do not see there is any provision in the rules which requires it to go to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the point of order taken by the gentleman from Rhode Island is not valid. It is true it directs the Secretary of the Treasury to do certain things, but it contains no provision making an appropriation of money. The sixth section, however, is liable to the point of order under Rule 110. The sixth section will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hereafter in all payments of customs duties two-thirds of the sum so payable shall be paid in the coin of the United States, and one-third thereof shall be paid in legal-tender notes or the Treasury notes authorized by this act, and said Treasury notes shall be exchangeable at par for United States legal-tender notes, at the option of the holder, at the office of the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that section is subject to the point of order, and that this bill should have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole. But the right to report clearly carries with it the right to consider, and the right to consider gives to the House a right to fix a time for consideration.

Mr. BEEBE. Does not the rule, Mr. Speaker, fix the time to reconsider?

Mr. BUCKNER. I have no desire to prevent discussion. On the contrary, I desire that this bill shall be thoroughly discussed.

The SPEAKER. To what rule does the gentleman from New York [Mr. BEEBE] refer?

Mr. BEEBE. The rule which requires that bills shall be considered in the Committee of the Whole in their order.

The SPEAKER. The rule fixes the place where the bill is to be considered—the Committee of the Whole. But it does not fix the time for its consideration.

Mr. BUCKNER. I suppose the House can by a majority vote fix the time when the bill shall be considered.

Mr. BEEBE. I submit that that cannot be done in the morning hour, which is devoted to the call of committees for reports. The rule, in virtue of its own operation, takes the bill to a certain point, and it is not then competent to make any further motion.

The SPEAKER. The right of the committee to report, as the Chair has stated, gives to the House the right to consider. And the right to consider certainly gives the right to fix the time to consider. That was the very thing which was done in regard to the tariff bill by a majority of the House.

Mr. BEEBE. Is not this bill now in the Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. Yes; the bill is in the Committee of the Whole. But the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] is recognized to make a motion to fix the time to consider, just as was done in the case of the tariff bill.

Mr. MORRISON. If the Chair will allow me, I beg to suggest that the time for considering the tariff bill was fixed on a report from a committee.

The SPEAKER. That is correct. The Chair stands corrected.

Mr. MORRISON. This is no report from a committee. The Committee of Ways and Means reported a resolution fixing the time for the consideration of the tariff bill, and that resolution was adopted by the House.

Mr. BUCKNER. I am authorized by the committee to make this motion.

The SPEAKER. What does the gentleman say he is authorized by the committee to do?

Mr. BUCKNER. I am authorized to ask the House to fix a time for the consideration of this bill; and, since the Chair has decided that it goes to the Committee of the Whole, I hold I am authorized to move that a day be fixed for its consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BURCHARD. The gentleman is not reporting a resolution from his committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman states that he is. He says he is instructed by the committee to make this motion.

Mr. BURCHARD. I do not so understand.

Mr. YEATES. The gentleman from Missouri was instructed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri states he is authorized by the committee to move that the House fix a time, which is in the nature of a report.

Mr. BUCKNER. And I ask that the House fix the 23d instant—this day two weeks.

Mr. MORRISON. Does the gentleman make that motion as a report from a committee?

The SPEAKER. He states so.

Mr. YEATES. The committee authorized him to do it.

Mr. WOOD. I hope the assignment will be so limited that it will not interfere with appropriation bills and the tariff bill.

Mr. BUCKNER. I do not propose to interfere with bills reported from the Committee on Appropriations or the bills reported from the Committee of Ways and Means by the gentleman from New York.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the proposition. The gentleman from Missouri proposes that the House shall consider this bill in Committee of the Whole on the 23d of this month, subject, however, to the consideration of appropriation bills and the tariff bill.

Mr. BUCKNER. After the morning hour.

Mr. BURCHARD. And subject, also, to pending orders.

The SPEAKER. Of course.

Mr. FRYE. I desire to know the ruling of the Chair on the point of order raised. The committee, as I understand, reports the bill and nothing else.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. FRYE. A point of order then is made. On that point of order the bill is at once sent to the Calendar to the Committee of the Whole. Now all that having taken place, the gentleman from Missouri then reports further a resolution, as he says, in favor of the assignment of a time certain when that bill shall be considered. Can that be done?

The SPEAKER. It can.

Mr. FRYE. Does the Chair so rule?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does, and only repeats his ruling as to the tariff bill. The gentleman will see in the discussion of the same point of order as to the tariff bill the ground on which the Chair repeats the decision: that the right of the committee to report carries with it the right to consider, and under instructions from the committee a report can be made fixing the time to consider.

Mr. FRYE. My point is this, if the Speaker will pardon me: it is that when the bill is reported the resolution must be reported at the same time, before under the operation of parliamentary law the bill has gone on the Calendar to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The committee has the right to report, being still on call.

Mr. FORT. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] was proceeding to report the resolution when interrupted by points of order.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I call for the reading of the resolution as agreed upon by the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri states that, under instructions from the Committee on Banking and Currency, he is authorized by that committee to make the motion that this bill be considered on the 23d day of this month, after the morning hour, subject, however, to appropriation bills and the tariff bill, and to such special orders as have already been made.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. My point is this: that the report from the committee must be in writing. If they are authorized to report a resolution, then the resolution must be in writing. I do not think the gentleman can report a motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri will reduce it to writing.

Mr. WADDELL. I desire to know if the special assignment of this bill will interfere with the consideration of bills heretofore specially assigned.

The SPEAKER. It will not.

Mr. BEEBE. Is it understood that this assignment is to run from day to day?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] will reduce his report to writing.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I would like to know if this will interfere with the unfinished business in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business comes up whenever demanded, immediately after the reading of the Journal, but this is to be after the morning hour.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. But I understand that the bill has gone to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and the proposition now is to make it a special order in Committee of the Whole until disposed of. My question is whether it will interfere with the unfinished business in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Questions of that sort are all determined in Committee of the Whole and the Chair has nothing to do with them.

Mr. BUCKNER. I have prepared a resolution. I thought that the bill would not be subject to a point of order, but inasmuch as the Chair has decided otherwise I have a resolution here which I now offer.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would like to inquire if what is now offered as a report has not within the knowledge of the House been written at the desk of the gentleman from Missouri and how can that be a report from his committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri submitted his motion verbally, as he was instructed by the committee to do, and then the point was raised that the report should be made in writing and surely the Chair would not cut off the report under such circumstances.

Mr. GARFIELD. But the gentleman said that he did not anticipate any point of order.

Mr. BEEBE. I desire to have the record right. I would ask that the report submitted by the gentleman from Missouri be sent to the Clerk's desk and read. I do not want it to continue in his hand.

Mr. FORT. Is there any rule requiring committees to report in writing?

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Appropriations is authorized to report in writing, and it has been the usual practice for committees so to do.

Mr. FORT. They are not compelled to do so?

The SPEAKER. The resolution offered by the gentleman from Missouri will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the bill reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency, as a substitute for House bill 2827, be made a special order in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for April 23d after the morning hour, and from day to day thereafter until disposed of, subject to the general appropriation bills and the tariff bill.

Mr. CARLISLE. I move that the resolution be so amended as not to interfere with other special orders previously made.

Mr. BUCKNER. I do not yield to the gentleman to make any such motion. I demand the previous question.

Mr. CONGER. I submit that this resolution changes the rules of the House as to the order of business in Committee of the Whole, and that it cannot be done except by a two-third vote of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already overruled that point of order when it was made by the gentleman himself on the tariff bill, and the Chair again overrules the point of order.

Mr. CONGER. The Chair then holds that a majority can change the rules of the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order, and refers to his own ruling on the tariff bill, when the same point of order was made by the gentleman from Michigan himself.

Mr. EAMES. My colleague on the committee will yield to me?

Mr. BUCKNER. No; I do not.

Mr. EAMES. This was not an agreement made by the committee.

Mr. BEEBE. I think that when a member of a committee rises in his place and impeaches the report submitted by the committee, it is the duty of the House to investigate and determine whether the report is rightfully made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has nothing to do with that.

Mr. YEATES. It is the report of the committee.

Mr. EAMES. If the gentleman will allow me a moment I can explain the matter.

Mr. BUCKNER. I demand the previous question.

The question was put upon seconding the previous question; and on a division there were—ayes 75, noes 73.

Mr. EAMES called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. EAMES and Mr. BUCKNER were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 95, noes 90. So the previous question was seconded.

The question recurred upon ordering the main question to be put.

Mr. GARFIELD. Upon that question I call for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BROWNE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I desire the Chair to state the question on which we are to vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the main question upon the resolution reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency fixing a time under certain conditions for the consideration of the bill which has been read.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 126, nays 106, not voting 59; as follows:

So the main question was ordered.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. I am paired with the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. ELLSWORTH. If he were here, I should vote "ay." My colleague, Mr. BROGDEN, is confined to his room by sickness.

Mr. LOCKWOOD. My colleague, Mr. HART, is paired with the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. OLIVER. Mr. HART, if present, would vote "no" and Mr. OLIVER, I think, would vote "ay." My colleague, Mr. BENEDICT, is paired with the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. BURDICK. Mr. BENEDICT would vote "ay" and Mr. BURDICK, I am informed, would vote "no."

Mr. STEELE. Upon all political questions I am paired with the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. HAYES. I do not regard this as a political question; I see nothing of that sort in it. Hence I have voted.

Mr. JONES, of New Hampshire. I am paired on the currency question with the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. TOWNSEND. If he were here, I should vote "no."

Mr. SOUTHARD. My colleague, Mr. RICE, of Ohio, is absent on account of sickness in his family.

Mr. COVERT. My colleague, Mr. MAYHAM, is paired with the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. HUMPHREYS. I do not know how either gentleman would vote, if present.

Mr. HERBERT. The gentleman from Florida, Mr. DAVIDSON, is paired with the gentleman from Minnesota, Mr. STEWART.

Mr. EWING. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. GARDNER, on party questions generally. As this seems to be a party vote, I withdraw my vote. If he were present, I should vote "ay."

Mr. FOLLARD. The gentleman from Illinois, Mr. MARSH, is confined at home on account of sickness.

Mr. POWERS. I am paired on all party questions with General Rice, of Ohio.

Mr. BAYNE. The gentleman from New York, Mr. DWIGHT, is paired with my colleague, Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. DWIGHT, if present, would vote "no."

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I am paired on all political questions with the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. ATKINS, who is sick. I do not consider this a political question; and therefore I vote "no."

Mr. BRENTANO. I am paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. MULLER, on all political questions. Not regarding this as a political question, I vote "no."

Mr. ALDRICH. My colleagues, Judge TIPTON and Mr. TOWNSEND, of Illinois, are paired. If present, Judge TIPTON would undoubtedly vote "no" and Mr. TOWNSEND "ay."

Mr. O'NEILL. My colleague, Mr. FREEMAN, is paired with the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. CALDWELL. They are both absent on public business. Mr. FREEMAN, if present, would vote "no;" and I presume Mr. CALDWELL would vote "ay."

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. CONGER. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. The main question has been ordered, which takes the resolution out of the morning hour. The question is now upon the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. BUCKNER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INTERVIEW WITH SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

Mr. EWING. I am instructed by the Committee on Banking and Currency to present a record of an interview between the committee and the Secretary of the Treasury, and to ask that it be printed as a public document.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. EWING. I am also instructed by the committee to ask the adoption of the resolution I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Has not the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Then I demand the regular order of business.

HOT SPRINGS, ARKANSAS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House a communication from the Senate touching a bill which ought to be acted upon at once.

The Clerk read as follows:

SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, April 4, 1878.

Ordered. The Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill of the Senate 490, supplementary to an act entitled "An act in relation to the Hot Springs reservation, in the State of Arkansas," approved March 3, 1877.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the request of the Senate will be granted and the bill will be returned. Such has been the uniform practice, without exception.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

TEMPORARY TREASURY CLERKS, ETC.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. DURHAM, Mr. BLOUNT, and Mr. BAKER of Indiana as the conferees on the part of the House upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 3102) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to employ temporary clerks, and making an appropriation for the same; also making appropriations for detecting trespass on the public lands and for bringing into market public lands in certain States, and for other purposes.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. EAMES. After the introduction of the resolution by the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, and in the course of the debate on that resolution, I stated on the floor of the House that I did not think it was in accordance with the agreement of that committee. On reflection I desire to state in the presence of the House now that although the proposition as reduced to writing by the chairman of the committee was not the proposition submitted in committee, yet in substance it is like it. The proposition agreed to in committee was that the bill when reported, with the consent of the House, should be assigned as a special order for a certain day; that it should be open to debate for three days, and should be open to amendment before the previous question should be demanded, and then the vote should be taken. The resolution as introduced by the chairman of the committee that this should be considered in the Committee of the Whole is not exactly as was contemplated by the agreement in the Committee on Banking and Currency. The agreement there was that it should be considered in the House. Without thinking at the time that the bill would be open to amendment in the Committee of the Whole, and that therefore, in substance, the resolution is what was agreed upon by the committee, I made the remark I did. I desire now to say that the resolution submitted by the chairman is in substance the agreement which was made when the gentleman was directed to report the bill to the House. I am sorry, for the first time on the floor, to make any kind of personal explanation of anything I have done or said.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CONGER. What is the regular order?

Mr. WOOD. I move the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the tariff bill; and, pending that, I ask by unanimous consent the House terminate the general debate on that bill on this day week at the termination of the session in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EWING. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. WOOD. For what purpose?

Mr. EWING. I ask to have the resolution I introduced read. It will be adopted I am sure by the House without objection. The Committee on Banking and Currency was authorized to take testimony by a resolution adopted two months ago. There are some twenty or thirty persons living in the cities of New York and Philadelphia and we desire to have authority to have them heard before a subcommittee for the purpose of saving the large expense of calling them to Washington. That is the sole purpose of the resolution. I am sure no one in the House will object to it.

Mr. CONGER. Let the resolution be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That in the prosecution of the investigation authorized by the resolution of the House of January 25, 1875, the Committee on Banking and Currency is hereby authorized to examine witnesses by subcommittee in the cities of New York and Philadelphia; and the expenses incurred by the committee in such investigation in said cities shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House on vouchers approved by the committee.

Mr. REED. I object.

TARIFF BILL.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to make a suggestion in connection with the proposition of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means—

Mr. WOOD. I will state before the gentleman proceeds that I have asked unanimous consent to fix a time to terminate general debate on this bill.

Mr. CONGER. Has the gentleman unanimous consent from the House for that purpose, or only from his committee?

Mr. WOOD. I ask unanimous consent to fix the time at which general debate shall be terminated. It does not interfere with the five-minute debate.

Mr. CONGER. I object.

Mr. KELLEY. I rise for the purpose of objecting to fixing a time for closing debate on this, one of the most intricate and vitally important bills brought to the attention of the House. It is a bill which proposes an entire revision of our tariff system, which affects—

Mr. WOOD. If the gentleman objects, let him do so.

The SPEAKER. And that is the end of it.

Mr. KELLEY. I do object.

Mr. WOOD. I withdraw the latter proposition.

Mr. O'NEILL. As I understand the gentleman's proposition it is to close general debate at a certain time—some day next week.

Mr. WOOD. That was my object.

Mr. O'NEILL. I was going to suggest there should be sessions in the House during the evenings, and then gentlemen who desire to indulge in debate on the tariff bill can make their speeches. They can send them to the people.

We, I think, understand the general question of the tariff. I do not know but the country understands it fully. And I do not see why the time of the House should be taken up in its business hours by the general discussion of the question of the tariff. I hope there will be no time allowed for general discussion except to the chairman and one or two members of the committee; and let the speeches be made at night.

Mr. WOOD rose.

Mr. KELLEY. If the chairman will permit me, I will say that I desire no delay in this matter, but I protest against abridging discussion in this House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has withdrawn the motion to limit debate.

Mr. O'NEILL. I think it will answer the purpose if gentlemen have an opportunity to read their speeches at night and send them out to the country.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I dissent entirely from the proposition of my colleague from Philadelphia [Mr. O'NEILL] as to allowing the discussion of this question to proceed at night.

Mr. KELLEY. Just a word further. I want to put myself in proper relations with the chairman of the committee. The bill is a most important one and I want it discussed in the hearing of those who are to pass upon it, and not in the hearing merely of the gentlemen who may have prepared speeches at evening sessions, when all others are discharged from duty by the provision that no business shall be transacted. If this House shall have more important business before it than the discussion and consideration of this bill this session it has more important bills before it than I have heard of.

Mr. O'NEILL. I think the most important business to be transacted in regard to the tariff bill is to vote upon it, and either to pass it or have it out of the way, so that it may not disturb the country any more.

The question being taken on Mr. WOOD's motion, it was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed, without amendment, a bill of the House of the following title:

A bill (H. R. No. 1135) to authorize the issue of a patent of certain lands in the Brothertown reservation, in the State of Wisconsin, to the persons selected by the Brothertown Indians.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House was requested, bills of the House of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 3712) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Kansas, in the State of Missouri; and

A bill (H. R. No. 536) for the relief of W. E. Snyder, of Illinois.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 568) to provide for a code of Army regulations; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

TARIFF BILL.

The House, pursuant to order, resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. SAYLER in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the title of the bill which is the special order.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 4106) to impose duties upon foreign imports, to promote trade and commerce, to reduce taxation, and for other purposes.

Mr. CONGER. That is not the first bill on the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ascertain the order of privileged questions in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WOOD. I submit that this is a special order.

The CHAIRMAN. It is; but there may be others.

Mr. BURCHARD. I desire to suggest that it was the order of the House to go into Committee of the Whole to consider this special bill. No objection was made to the motion being put in that way. This is the business on which by order of the House the House has gone into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CONGER. That will not change the rules of the House. I demand that the bills be taken up in their order according to the rules.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to ask this question: Did the gentleman from New York ask unanimous consent of the House and was it by unanimous consent that the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole? If that is so, unquestionably the Committee of the Whole must be governed by that action. Otherwise, the right of an individual member to object cannot be set aside.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. BURCHARD. Will the gentleman from New York allow me to suggest, in answer to the inquiry of the Chair, that the order of the House made without objection as to the point of order has just the same effect as a unanimous consent changing the rule. When a proposition is submitted to the House and no point of order is made on that proposition, and it is voted upon and becomes the order of the House, it binds the House just as much as a unanimous consent.

Mr. WOOD. Admitting that what was stated by the Chair was not the case, I submit that the last special order governs all the preceding orders and directions of the House. I moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole upon that particular bill, and the House unanimously, as I believed, adopted that motion.

Mr. O'NEILL. No, sir; not unanimously.

Mr. WOOD. And now it is not competent for the Committee of the Whole to take up any other business until the special order by direction of the House has been considered.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that his information from the Journal Clerk is that the motion of the gentleman from New York was to go into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of this particular bill. The Chair recognizes that that might have been objected to by any member, but he is informed by the officers of the House that no objection was made, and that the House therefore did resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole for the consideration of this particular bill, without objection, which is of course equivalent to unanimous consent.

Mr. CONGER. Will the Chair allow me to state that the motion was objected to—one part of it, which was withdrawn; and then there was a vote on the remaining part of the motion. There was a vote on going into Committee of the Whole and the vote was nearly even.

The CHAIRMAN. That might have been an objection to going into Committee of the Whole at all, but not an objection to going into it on this particular bill.

Mr. CONGER. I stood here ready to object to any proposition except to one to go into the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WOOD. There was no division upon that motion. My motion was to go into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the tariff bill.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. The gentleman cannot move to go into Committee of the Whole for a special purpose; there is no such motion known to the rules or practice of the House.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) There was no objection to the admission of the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD]; in other words no point of order was raised although there was opposition to the adoption of the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that is another question altogether, as the gentleman from Michigan will recognize. If the gentleman from Michigan had raised the point of order upon the motion of the gentleman from New York in the House it might have been good.

Mr. CONGER. I have only this to say, that standing here as I do, and as I intend to stand, to oppose the consideration and passage of this bill in every legitimate and parliamentary manner, that it was not stated so that it was heard by me and those around me that the motion of the gentleman from New York proposed to change the rules of the House as to the order of business in Committee of the Whole. I ask for the record of the motion. I ask that the Clerk read the record.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will look at the record.

Mr. POTTER. While that is being done I want to call the recollection of the gentleman from Michigan to the fact that my colleague moved not only to go into Committee of the Whole to consider the tariff bill, but also moved to limit debate upon it, and subsequently withdrew that motion, so that there can be no question as to what his motion was.

Mr. CONGER. I was ready to make objection, but I supposed that the motion was merely to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. The motion made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Wood] was simply to go into Committee of the Whole, and the part added was what lawyers call mere surplusage, because there is no such motion known to parliamentary law here as to go into Committee of the Whole to take up a special bill. That is a violation of the rules.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not desire to be further advised upon this question. He has examined the record. The statement of the Speaker, the record made by the Journal Clerk, and the statement of the record of the House is to the effect that the gentleman from New York did make his motion to go into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of this particular bill. That was not in order if it had been objected to, but no objection was made.

Mr. CONGER. I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection not having been made, the House acted upon the motion of the gentleman from New York as by unanimous consent.

Mr. CONGER. Then I move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Wood] is entitled to the floor; if he yields for that motion, all right.

Mr. WOOD. I do not.

Mr. CONGER. Then I raise the question of consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not possible; the gentleman from New York is entitled to the floor, and the Chair rules that the gentleman from Michigan is out of order.

Mr. CONGER. The Chair has no right to rule that I am out of order when I raise a point of order. Gentlemen on the floor have as many rights as the occupant of the chair. I raise the point of order that the question of consideration may be raised in Committee of the Whole, and I ask the Chair to decide that question.

The CHAIRMAN. That would be the rule, but the House has determined by unanimous consent to consider this bill. The Chair was inclined to think that the gentleman from Michigan was right until he read the record and understood the facts.

Now the Chair rules that the House having ordered the consideration of this bill, the question of consideration cannot be raised in the committee.

Mr. CONGER. Then I submit that when I ask that the record be read, the Chairman has no right to tell me that he wants to hear nothing further on the question, and that he has read the record.

The CHAIRMAN. Not at all.

Mr. CONGER. The Chair said that he would hear no more and would not allow the record to be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will direct the record to be read.

Mr. CONGER. I understood the Chair to say that he had read the record.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair received his information upon that point from the journal clerk.

Mr. CONGER. If the Chair has read the record, the Clerk can read it surely.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read it now.

Mr. BEEBE. Who is entitled to the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's colleague, [Mr. Wood.]

Mr. CONGER. I ask that the record may be read, and that is my right.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the right of the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CARLISLE. How does the gentleman from Michigan have a right to have the record read? It is not before the committee for consideration. I understand that when a proposition is pending before the committee, it is the right of any member to call for its reading; but there is no proposition pending before the committee in reference to the record, it is a question of order addressed to the Chair; and when the Chair has informed himself of the facts, if the gentleman from Michigan disputes them let him say so and show, if he can, that the Chairman is mistaken. But he has no right to call for the reading of the evidence on which the Chairman makes his decision.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Michigan is entitled to the same sources of information as the Chair in regard to this question. The record is ready now and will be read.

Mr. CONGER. The "gentleman from Michigan" was aware that the Clerk was busy writing the record, and that it had not been written until now. I will hear it. [Laughter.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. Wood moved that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill of the House No. 4106, the tariff bill; which motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Wood] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, in opening this discussion, I do not propose at this time to enter into any explanation of the details of the bill. I assume that when the Committee of the Whole shall progress further in the consideration of the subject, it will be incumbent upon the committee and myself, its feeble representative, to afford such explanations as we may be able to give in reference to the particular articles comprised in the bill reported by the committee. My purpose at this time is rather to state some general propositions which in my judgment underlie all questions appertaining to the revenue, and to recall, if I can, the attention of the House to those higher considerations which should govern this country and indeed all countries on the question of taxation.

The highest power of Government is the power to tax, the power to arbitrarily demand of labor and property a portion of their earnings and possessions—to take by forced levy a proportion of the people's industry, and of the property which it has acquired. This demand upon the people is continuous and unrelenting—it is now and forever—from it there is no escape. So long as men live in organized communities requiring control and direction for the protection of their lives and property, the expenditures incident to the organization and maintenance of this authority must be borne. Therefore when the people have parted with the power to make the levy upon them, to be used at the discretion of those who administer the government for the time being, not only as to the imposition of the tax, but also in its disbursement, this power becomes the highest of all the prerogatives and duties of the state.

Hence, in approaching the consideration of a proper use of this authority, I am not unmindful of its importance. It will be remembered that taxation simply consists in imposing exactions for the support of the Government. It was not designed that any other considerations should enter into the discharge of this trust. The burden, whether great or small, was to be borne by the whole people upon principles of equity and equality. The proper adjusting of taxation so as to avoid oppressions upon the one side, or advantages on the other, has engaged the thoughts of statesmen for many hundred years. Nations have not been governed by any uniform rule in the methods devised. In every country at different periods of its existence different ways have been adopted appropriate to the then existing conditions of its necessities and its internal and external affairs; therefore, in my judgment, it is not necessary to study history and draw from it examples which should govern our own policy in this regard. I have little respect for those thinkers who hold theories and advise their practical application in this country, whether on finance or taxation, who have no other grounds upon which to sustain them than are drawn from the practice of other countries, and in other days. While it is true that there are certain general principles applicable to this subject which it would be well to consider, yet it is equally true that the peculiar circumstances to which the principles are to be applied must after all regulate their value.

The United States has never had a permanently established system by which to procure revenue and to regulate its commerce with other nations. Nor is this singular in view of the fact that we have been undergoing remarkable changes since our national birth. Within the century of our existence the policy that was desirable at one time would have been very unfortunate at another, and at no time have we been so circumstanced until now that we could adopt political economies purely American. That period has arrived. For the first fourth of our century of life we were emerging from a colonial chaotic condition, struggling to cement fraternity among ourselves and to furnish mutual protection against others. The next quarter of the century was devoted to the ascertainment of our resources, and an assertion of our independence upon these seas. The third quarter was distinguished by the expansion of our territory, the acquisition of mineral resources of incalculable value, and a gradual growth of the nation toward becoming a great maritime power. While the last fourth of the century has marked the most extraordinary epoch in our history—distinguished for its extinction of slavery—the greatest civil war of any time, and its consequent demoralization and stimulating effects upon values, and the vicious legislation which of necessity followed. The nation, in consequence, lies weakened and prostrated, and sick almost unto death.

We are now brought face to face with the solemn consideration of the present, and the great duties of the future. Doubtless those who shall write the history of this century hereafter will not fail to discover that in this latter period to which I have referred, comprehending the present time, could be traced the germ of the subsequent national grandeur, wealth, and power, which I now see clearly is, with wisdom in our legislation, susceptible of accomplishment. There is now no pending question which is within itself of sufficient importance to the people to make it worthy of a moment's consideration as compared with that of establishing a policy of international commercial intercourse, connected with a policy of taxation, which shall be wise in its inception, permanent in its character, less onerous in its exactions, and have for its prime object a fuller development of our material resources, and a more profitable disposition of the fruits of labor, the results of enterprise, and the security and profits of capital.

PRODUCTION AND COMMERCE.

These objects are to be secured by the application of principles in legislation which shall take from labor and capital the minimum of taxation with a maximum of advantage in return, by economy in administration, and the fullest possible development of the resources of the country, from which both production and commerce shall derive an equal, honest, and legitimate advantage in the prosecution of their industries.

The fundamental basis upon which our legislation to promote these objects should rest, is that production and commerce are twin sisters, and should go hand in hand—that one is indispensable to the other. There can be no antagonism between them. Production must have commerce, and commerce must have production. While it may be true that the present cost of internal transit in this country has imposed and does impose an undue burden upon production, arising altogether from a monopoly of the power of transmission, yet this will not be the case either upon the land or the ocean if in our new departure we shall adopt enlightened principles.

The levying the duties upon foreign goods and direct taxes upon domestic goods and interests may be considered not only as questions of revenue, but also as susceptible of being made the methods by which all interests can be subserved and the national resources more fully utilized. If the authority to impose taxes can be used to advantage one class, is it not well for us to consider whether it cannot be used as well for all? not only to promote the home industries, but to advance the prosperity of all sections and every enterprise, whether commercial, agricultural, mechanical, or manufacturing.

While unquestionably the power to tax if confined to its legitimate object is restricted to that duty alone, yet if it can be made an instrument so as to combine other objects not inconsistent with just and equal taxation, by which the whole nation, as well the people as individuals, shall be alike advantaged, then is it not our duty to adopt it? To this end we should connect with our system a more enlarged and comprehensive scheme than that which now exists.

With a larger seaboard than any other nation, and with material resources in excess of our capacity of consumption, we must encourage and promote the adoption of such relations with other nations as will open up the markets of the world, and make the whole universe contribute to our prosperity.

But the further development of our material resources will avail us little if commerce does not stand by to utilize the results. The large surplus yield of our agriculture would be of trifling value if it could not be carried to other consumers than those who produce it. The same principle applies to manufactures and minerals. We should therefore adopt a policy which shall create facilities purely American for the transmission of the excess over our own consumption to foreign buyers and consumers. Nor will this be the only advantage of such a policy. It will lead to a larger interchange of commodities between other nations and ourselves, in which we will be the gainers. We shall take from them the articles which our soil or climate will not enable us to produce, and return them back in manufactured form, thus deriving profit from our superior capacity, energy, or ingenuity. It is our chief boast as a people that in intelligence, industry, and enterprise we are second to none, and certainly we cannot hesitate to enter the race for supremacy with any other people where these qualities are requisite for success. There is indeed no one of the departments of human labor in which we hesitate to claim superiority, and believe we can maintain it if a fair opening be afforded to an equal footing with others.

Before proceeding to consider how best to avail ourselves of these advantages by legislation, it may be well to look at the laws as they now exist and to see in what regard the present tariff operates as an obstruction to the enlargement of our foreign trade. I approach the subject with a full appreciation of the difficulties attending any change, however desirable it might be.

From July 4, 1789, when the first tariff law was enacted, until 1876, there were passed one hundred and twenty-eight laws in relation to the levying and collection of duties. In the law as it now stands are many of the provisions of statutes passed over fifty years ago; some in the language as originally passed which yet remains, others have been modified and amended and consequently exist in part. The revision of the revenue laws in 1874, instead of simplifying and consolidating the then existing statutes, served rather to complicate, confuse, and add in many respects to the previously existing difficulties. But this was not the greatest objection to that revision. It actually changed many of the rates levied as duties, though purporting to be only a codification of those already established by law. The laws as they now exist are mainly the creation of the last fifteen years. Within the period from 1861 to 1876 were passed one hundred and eight laws relating to the tariff and the collection of duties. Nearly every one of these acts was the creation of some special domestic interest or to subserve some partisan purpose.

The present tariff laws are subject to the following objections: First. They comprise twenty-one hundred and seventy-two articles, each subject to duty or to official examination at ports of entry.

Second. The dutiable articles are in many cases subject to compound duties; that is, the ad valorem and the specific combined in the same article.

The following table, furnished by the Bureau of Statistics, states this in detail:

The number of articles paying ad valorem, specific, and compound rates of duty, embraced in schedules A to M, both inclusive, also number of articles admitted free of duty, under the Revised Statutes of the United States, approved June 22, 1874, (paragraphs from 921 to 1895, both inclusive, Heyl's tariff.)

Number paying ad valorem rates.....	923
Number paying specific rates.....	541
Number paying compound rates.....	169
Total dutiable.....	1,534
Number free of duty.....	645
Total free and dutiable.....	2,179

Third. Their ambiguity of language and doubt as to construction, and the complex rates of duty, tend to litigation, loss of revenue, and injury to the importer.

There are now pending in the United States circuit court of New York nearly three thousand cases arising out of the tariff laws and on the present calendar of the Supreme Court there are a large number yet undetermined.

Fourth. They have the effect to increase the duty levied in an inverse ratio to the value of the merchandise; thus the luxuries of the rich are less highly taxed than the necessities of the poor.

Fifth. Their high rates encourage fraud by undervaluations of invoices and other evasions, and also smuggling, thus inducing perjury and other kindred crimes.

The enormous frauds on the revenue in consequence of the high protective character of the rates of duty are beyond estimate. Intelligent officers of the customs have placed the amount of loss to the Treasury as high as 20 per cent. of the total sum collected.

A statistician of the custom-house estimates that of silk alone, imported into this country, "there was, either by direct smuggling or by undervaluation, at least five or six million dollars a year, perhaps seven millions, (out of thirty-five millions,) which paid no duty." One of the examiners estimated the loss to the Government by undervaluations at from three to five millions a year. Another witness spoke of the silk smuggling during late years as "prodigious," and the United States civil-service commission, in their report of 1871, looking at the general loss of revenue, remarked: "It is calculated by those who have made a careful study of all the facts that one-fourth of the revenues of the United States is annually lost on the collection." (Forty-second Congress, second session, Executive Document No. 10.)

Sixth. On many articles the duty is made altogether prohibitory, or so high as to yield but little revenue, while upon the whole they operate so as to enhance the price of any imported article, which, as a consequence, enhances the cost to the consumer of any domestic-made like article.

Seventh. Thus a loss of revenue follows, which causes the necessity of imposing additional taxation in other ways so as to make up the deficit in the Treasury.

Eighth. The large, complicated, and cumbersome machinery required in its administration is made the pretext for the employment of a great number of subordinate officials, who in general are partisan retainers, with little work, but great opportunities for profit.

Ninth. The expense of collection is equal to about 5 per cent. upon the sum collected, which, if added to the loss by collection and false valuations upon which duty is assessed, would be equivalent to the ordinary expenses of the whole Treasury Department if administered upon an economical basis.

By the following table this expense is shown from 1872 to 1876 inclusive.

Expenses of collecting the revenue from customs for the five fiscal years ending June 30, 1876.

Year.	Customs proper.	Revenue cutters.	Total.
1872.....	$6,950,189 81	$1,078,511 81	$8,028,701 62
1873.....	7,079,743 42	1,133,901 37	8,213,644 79
1874.....	7,319,918 55	1,106,558 62	8,426,477 17
1875.....	7,028,521 80	986,093 66	8,014,615 46

Average per annum, $8,057,996 59.

In short, the evils of the present tariff laws are so outrageous that it is difficult to speak of them with patience. They are the results of a series of assaults through legislation upon the pockets and labor of the people. They are immoral in theory, utterly indefensible in practice, and without any merits upon which their most ingenious and well-paid beneficiaries can maintain their defense. And yet we do not propose to deal with them as their demerits deserve. I recognize an implied moral right to a little longer continuation of the favor which they afford to the manufacturing interests. The bill reported affects them, so far as the rates of duties are concerned, but little. Its reductions are trifling as compared to what they should be, and in my opinion they could well afford to bear. If I had the power to commence de novo I should reduce the duties 50 per cent. instead of less than 15 per cent. upon an average, as now proposed.

To specify fully the evils following the present protective system would be impossible, and I will furnish but one example showing its effect upon the agricultural industries:

THE FARMER AND THE TARIFF.

The farmer, whose whole mind is bent on his agricultural pursuits, has neither the time nor opportunity to investigate the influence of the tariff tax on his household expenses; it is a fact, however, that every article he uses is either directly subject to a tariff tax or enhanced by the tariff. Let us enumerate these burdens: the farmer's house in the West, where lumber is scarce, pays either a direct or enhanced tax of 20 per cent. on the lumber his house is built of; a tax of 35 per cent. on the paint it is painted with; of 90 per cent. on his window-glass; of 35 per cent. on the nails; of 53 per cent. on the screws; of 30 per cent. on the door-locks; of from 35 to 40 per cent. on the hinges; of 35 per cent. on the wall-paper; of from 60 to 70 per cent. on his carpet; of 40 per cent. on his crockery; of 38 per cent. on his iron hollow-ware; of 35 per cent. on his cutlery; 40 per cent. on his glassware; of from 35 per cent. to 40 per cent. on the linen he uses in the household; of 51 per cent. on the common castile soap he uses; 48 per cent. on the starch. When he goes into his stable, barn, or workshop he will find that he pays 35 per cent. on the iron he uses; 53 per cent. on the halter-chains; 45 per cent. on the files and rasps he may use; 47 per cent. on the backsaw; 49 per cent. on cross-cut saw; 38 per cent. on the handsaw, and 35 per cent. on any sheet-iron he may require. On his medicines he pays 20 per cent.; on the quinine pills he swallows, 20 per cent.; on blue-pills, 40 per cent., and 40 per cent. on any medicinal preparations. The female portion of his house cannot even go into hysteria without paying a tax of 20 per cent. on asafetida that may be required to quiet their excited nerves. On his sugar he pays a tax of at least 60 per cent. As for the clothing he and his family uses, let me enumerate the tax separately: on his wool hat he pays from 60 to 80 per cent.; on his fur hat, from 45 to 60 per cent.; on his suit of woolen clothes, some 55 per cent.; on the leather for his boots and shoes, 25 per cent.; on his hosiery, 35 per cent.; on his wife's and daughter's common alpaca dress he pays 65 to 70 per cent.; on spool-thread, 70 per cent., and on the needles, 35 per cent. If I were inclined to pursue these topics further it would take up too much time; suffice it to say that the furnishing of his child's cradle and the coffin in which he is finally buried pay a direct tax or are enhanced in price by our tariff system.

The committee has not undertaken to reform all the abuses of the present tariff. Though fully conscious of the necessity of effecting many radical changes sooner or later, we were content with a simplification of methods of assessing the duties, changing the phraseology, so as to avoid ambiguity and doubt as to the proper duty to be levied, a large curtailment in the number of articles to be assessed for duty, and ingrafting upon the law important provisions looking to a more liberal commercial intercourse with foreign nations.

The changes proposed are designed to be the foundation for a permanent measure, comprehending new principles and a lopping off of the complications and contradictions now existing in the present laws.

The bill reported has but one list so called, and that is the dutiable one. It has no compound rates, the duties being either ad valorem or specific, and the latter as far as practicable. It comprises two hundred and forty-seven classes of articles, and five hundred and seventy-five articles against the large number comprised in the present law. It has no free list as such; all articles not enumerated and specifically named are to be admitted free. In lieu of the duties now levied upon the cost and charges added to the original cost or value of the articles imported at place of production or export, which has been the source of so much litigation between the Government and the importers, the bill fixes an allowance of 5 per cent., equally applicable to all merchandise coming in under the ad valorem principle. It levies a discriminating duty of 10 per cent. additional upon all merchandise imported from and the growth and production of any country which discriminates against the United States in the admission of our products to their ports.

This provision is not intended as retaliatory, but is designed as an inducement to those foreign countries whose treaty stipulations prefer other nations to our own to make commercial regulations with us which shall place us upon an equally favorable footing. The bill in this, and in its general scope and tenor, looks to an enlargement of our foreign commerce, not only in its navigation, but also in facilities for the profitable sale of American-grown products of every character. Another and important provision is that which proposes to establish manufacturing bonded warehouses, and the benefit of drawback upon all exported goods containing any foreign material subject to duty. It is designed to encourage the exportation of American manufactured products of every character, by affording them the raw material free of duty, so that they can compete with any other like manufactures in the markets of the world. We believe that it is only necessary to afford our people an equal chance with all others in order to prove to foreign nations that we are equal if not superior to them in our manufactures. The bill will materially reduce the cost of collecting the customs revenue. The official report of the Secretary of the Treasury for 1877 (page 4) gives the cost of collecting the revenue from customs as $6,501,037.57. I may safely claim that the simplification, together with the curtailment of the number of dutiable articles and the abolition of the free list, will reduce this sum at least 15 per cent.

Another considerable saving will be gained in the authority given to the Secretary of the Treasury to consolidate the collection districts, now the source of a large and unnecessary outlay; many of them are kept up at several thousand dollars' expense without producing any return whatever in the way of duties collected. I estimate the saving in these two items at 20 per cent., which will be equivalent to $1,300,000.

Some apprehensions have been entertained that the reduced rates proposed will cause a loss of revenue. There is no necessity for fear on this account. The removal of the ambiguities of the present tariff and the easy and speedy liquidation of entries which will follow will operate as much to increase the importations as the proposed reduced rates will cause loss of revenue.

The many obstructions now existing in entering goods at the custom-houses and of speedily ascertaining the amount of duty to be paid will under the new system be very much if not altogether removed.

A merchant will know in advance the exact amount of duty to be paid, which will facilitate commerce and the Government will collect the duty without delay or litigation. Those who are not familiar with the present machinery used in the collection of duties will be slow to believe the great losses to the Treasury which are constantly occurring in consequence. It has been estimated that the Government loses from 10 to 15 per cent. of the amount it should collect.

The losses occurring by evasions of the law, collusion with officials, and smuggling will, if the reforms proposed be carried out, be much lessened, and the opportunity for frauds and the demoralizing effect upon Government officers prevented.

But to leave no doubt as to the amount of revenue to be collected under the bill, I append a carefully prepared estimate based upon the average importations of value and quantities for the past eight years:

Estimated revenue under the proposed tariff.

Articles.	Estimated consumption.	Average rate, calculated in ad valorem.	Estimated revenue.
Schedule A. Cotton goods and cotton fabrics.....	$30,000,000	28 %	$5,600,000
Schedule B. Earthenware, glass, and glassware.....	9,000,000	40 %	3,600,000

(a) SCHEDULE D.—SPIRITS AND WINES.

The alterations in the tariff on still wines in this schedule, if based upon the estimated consumption of last year, would yield a revenue of $2,150,000, or $48,000 more than last year.

The calculation of revenue under the new tariff on still wines is based as follows:

	Gallons.
Still wines paying 40 cents duty.....	3,500,000
Still wines paying 75 cents duty.....	600,000
Still wines paying $1.50 duty.....	200,000

This schedule comprises the sparkling wines, brandies, and spirits, &c., which will produce the revenue estimated.

(b) SCHEDULE F.—PROVISIONS.

No changes having been made in this schedule, the revenue in 1877 was $2,963,440. It is therefore safe to assume that the revenue will not decrease, and that $3,000,000 is a fair estimate.

(c) SCHEDULE L.—SPICES.

The revenue from spices in 1877 amounts to $230,779. The increase of duty under the new bill, estimated on the consumption of 1877, will produce a revenue of $1,317,305. Prepared ginger, included in the schedule, producing $102,969, is under the old tariff included in schedule M.

(d.) SCHEDULE J.—TOBACCO AND CIGARS.

The consumption of tobacco in 1877 has been 7,036,910 pounds, which is about the average consumption during the last eight years.

The consumption of foreign cigars during the last eight years has been 5,801,810 pounds, which gives an average of 725,236 pounds per annum. The consumption last year, therefore, of 589,198 pounds has been exceedingly low, yet the estimates made are nevertheless upon this low and moderate consumption of 1877. The yield from cigars under the new tariff will give $1,853,193, or some $32,000 more than last year.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF STATISTICS.

January 21, 1878.

Statement of the average ad valorem rate of duty per schedule of the articles enumerated in "Appendix B," as prepared by Joseph S. Moore, of the New York custom-house.

REVENUE NECESSITIES.

The Secretary of the Treasury, in his annual report before quoted, estimates the total requirements of the Treasury for the present fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, to be $232,430,643.72 and for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, to be $240,688,796.38, which, less a deduction of $11,000,000 by reduction in estimates and $37,196,045.04 for the sinking fund, will leave $222,492,751.34. These estimates, though doubtless in excess of the sums that Congress will grant, may be taken as the maximum amounts which will be required for each of the periods stated. To meet these disbursements the Secretary anticipates the following revenues, namely, for 1878, $265,500,000, and, for 1879, $269,250,000. In the disbursements the Secretary does not include any sum for the sinking fund, though he refers to this as probably to be provided for. I think it is time that this myth of an expenditure should be either altogether abolished or held in abeyance until the tax-payers of the country get the benefit of their overpayments to the sinking fund on this account.

SINKING FUND.

In estimating the necessities of the Treasury, I purposely omit any contribution to the sinking fund. There is not the least obligation upon the part of the Government to go further in that direction than it has already gone. Neither in law nor equity, nor on any ground of public policy are we obliged to sink another dollar in that fund for at least eight years to come. As this question begins to attract attention, it may be well to give a brief history of sinking funds in England, as well as in the United States. In the latter part of the eighteenth century Dr. Price, a leading mathematician of England, published a series of papers on sinking funds, in which he showed the enormous production of money at compound interest, and this after all is the underlying principle of the sinking-fund theory.

These theories were adopted by Mr. Pitt in his resolutions of March 29, 1786, on which occasion he said: "Upon the deliberation of this day the people of England place all their hopes of a full return of prosperity." (Parl. History xxvi, 1295, 1313, 1109;) and no doubt he fully believed this, as did a majority of the people of England. He carried his point, and a sinking fund was established of a million sterling a year, (act of Parliament of May 26, 1786,) subsequently increased by two hundred thousand sterling per annum, and providing for a third addition in these words, "that whenever in future any sums should be raised by loans * * * a sum equal to 1 per cent. on the stock created by such loans should be issued out of the produce of the consolidated fund (revenues) quarterly, to be placed to the account of the commissioner," but by these acts the aggregate of the sinking fund was limited, (32 George III, ch. 69, 1792.)

Under these two acts the fund was managed until 1802, and as immense sums were borrowed to carry on the war with Napoleon, it grew with great rapidity. In this year an act was passed (Parl. Hist. xxxvi, 890,892) enacting "that this fund (the sinking fund) should accumulate till the whole existing redeemable annuities should be paid off," and the "one-million fund," "two-million-pound fund," and "1 per cent. fund" were combined into one "consolidated fund" which it was estimated would pay off the debt in forty-five years.

Under these three acts the sinking fund continued to be administered until 1813, when its annual income was £15,500,000 sterling, and the debts which it had discharged from 1786 to 1813, a period of twenty-seven years, amounted to £238,231,000. (See Paehrer's tables 153, 154, 246; Parl. papers 1822, &c., 145; Porter's Parl. tables i, 1 Colquhoun, 292, 294.) But during the period from 1792 to 1815 the government had borrowed £585,000,000, or over double the amount of the sinking fund.

In 1813 the thinking English public began to see that the sinking fund was a mere juggle with figures, and that no amount of mere financial operations can mend either national or individual fortunes. These ideas soon spread to the legislature, and then began the gradual inroad upon this fund which ended in its final extinction in 1832.

These inroads were accelerated and encouraged by the nation's demand for relief from the burdens of taxation, and the leaders soon found it popular to reduce these burdens by supplying the deficiency from this fund.

If instead of doing this they had reduced expenditures and canceled the debt then in the hands of the commissioners £238,000,000 sterling of their debt would have been wiped out and £15,500,000 of expenditures would have disappeared as if by magic. But reduction of expenditures was not popular, and the English leaders found it easier to supply the deficiencies occasioned by reductions in taxation by encroaching upon this fund; and this encroachment, gradually continued as I have before said, finally resulted in its extinguishment, but not before a law had been passed (July 11, 1828, 10 George IV, chapter 27) providing that "the amount of the sinking fund be the actual surplus of the revenues over the expenditures."

From that day to this England has continued to increase in wealth and prosperity. Her 3 per cent. consols, an absolutely irredeemable debt, are quoted to-day at from 93 per cent. to 94 per cent. in the London market. Her debt, which at the close of the French war was $4,200,000,000, is now $3,700,000,000, showing that in a period of not quite fifty years she has only succeeded in reducing her debt $500,000,000, a less amount than we have paid off in one-fifth of that time. And she has never since had a sinking fund, the only reduction of her debt arising from the application of the surplus revenue to its purchase.

The debt of the United States at the close of the revolutionary war, or, rather, the amount funded and unfunded at the commencement of the present Government, is stated by Hamilton (report, 1800) at a little over $75,000,000. By the act of August 12, 1790, provision was made for a sinking fund, to be managed, with the approbation of the President, by the Vice-President, Chief-Justice, Secretary of State, Secretary of the Treasury, and the Attorney-General, as a commission for that purpose. This fund was constituted, first, of the surplus of the duties on imports and tonnage, to the end of 1790; second, the proceeds of a loan of $2,000,000, to be borrowed for that purpose; third, the interest on the public debt, purchased, redeemed, or paid into the Treasury, together with the surplus, if any, of moneys appropriated for interest. Subsequent acts added to the funds for this purpose, enlarged the scope of the duties of the commission, and somewhat varied its plans, but it substantially continued its operations until the public debt was either purchased, redeemed, or provided for, and on the 6th of February, 1836, the commissioners reported their labors ended and recommended that the sinking fund and its commissioners should be discontinued. This is the only finally successful sinking-fund operation upon record, but I have not been able to find any statement showing its operations, as a whole, nor have I been able to ascertain the probable expense of its management. It is safe to say, however, that this expense was not inconsiderable as compared with the amount of debt to be managed, and in this respect our present sinking fund, as amended by the act of July 14, 1870, is an improvement upon any plan heretofore tried either in this country or England, since it is merely an account upon our Treasury books instead of an actual fund in the hands of commissioners. Further than this, so much of the debt as has been actually redeemed ceases forever, and the charge upon the revenues for interest account is permanently reduced; this latter, however, only apparently, since we have retained as a basis of our annual appropriations to the sinking fund not only all this interest but in addition thereto compound interest at the same rate. This is the objectionable feature of the sinking-fund law as it now exists; that the amount to be provided for it annually is indefinite and uncertain, depending upon the computations of clerks for its sum, and without a clearly specified basis or rate even for that. The true sinking fund is a permanent appropriation of a definite sum each year, be that great or small, and the making of it a sacred charge upon the coin revenues next after the interest upon the public debt.

But however theories may be started or figures made to prove them, a provision for a sinking fund must in the end simply amount to a measure for continuing a high rate of taxation, or, on the other hand, a reduction of expenditures by which a surplus over and above the other necessary objects of expenditure is provided, which will amount to the sum required for this fund. It means nothing more nor less than a specific knowledge of the expenditures of the nation in detail, and then the levying of a tax that will produce enough to meet these expenditures. Any sinking fund is a mere device, and amounts to nothing unless a revenue is provided in some way to meet it. This done, let the amount be applied in monthly installments to the purchase or redemption of so much of the debt as it will buy or redeem, and stop the interest.

There is no question of the growth of money at compound interest, but this can only be applied as between debtor and creditor. It is absurd and childish for a nation to undertake its application in its dealings with itself. It is like taking money from one pocket and putting it into the other, and every time you do it making an entry in your cash-book. It merely adds the cost of management to the interest charge. If you have the money, pay your debt and stop the interest is the only wise plan for nations as well as individuals. The present sinking fund was created under the act of February 25, 1862, section 5, as follows:

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That all duties on imported goods shall be paid in coin, or in notes payable on demand heretofore authorized to be issued and by law receivable in payment of public dues, and the coin so paid shall be set apart as a special fund, and shall be applied as follows:

First. To the payment in coin of the interest on the bonds and notes of the United States.

Second. To the purchase or payment of 1 per cent. of the entire debt of the United States, to be made within each fiscal year after the 1st day of July, 1862, which is to be set apart as a sinking fund, and the interest of which shall in like manner be applied to the purchase or payment of the public debt, as the Secretary of the Treasury shall from time to time direct.

Third. The residue thereof to be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

At the passage of this act Salmon P. Chase, afterward Chief-Justice of the United States, was Secretary of the Treasury. He disregarded it. During his service as Secretary of the Treasury he never paid one dollar into the sinking fund. He was succeeded by Mr. Fessenden, of Maine. Mr. Fessenden had been a member of both Houses of Congress. I had the honor of serving with him on this floor as far back as 1841. He was chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate, and drew that act and reported it to the Senate—or rather that feature of the act. He disregarded it. Mr. Fessenden never while Secretary of the Treasury paid one dollar into the sinking fund. He was succeeded by Mr. McCulloch. He disregarded it. During those three administrations of the Treasury Department, although the sinking fund was created in February, 1862, not one dollar was taken from the revenues of the country for this purpose. It was not until Mr. Boutwell became Secretary was there any notice taken of it. He went into the market and bought the bonds at a premium, in order to get the benefit of a so-called reduction of the public debt. In 1875 in this House I took up this subject and declared that we were adopting a wrong policy in this regard; that it was almost criminal to continue the then present rate of taxation merely for the purpose of contributing toward this myth of an expenditure, and I showed that had every Secretary from the passage of the act down made his annual contribution then we were in excess of about $145,000,000 paid into the sinking fund more than we need to have done under the law.

Secretary Morrill following up what I had begun in 1875, in his annual report for the year 1876, dated December 4, takes the same ground. He refers to the sinking fund in these words:

By the terms of the act of February 25, 1862, it was provided that, after the 1st day of July, 1862, 1 per cent. of the entire debt of the United States should be purchased or paid within each fiscal year, to be set apart as a sinking fund; also, that the interest on said fund should in like manner be applied to the purchase or payment of the debt. The sixth section of the act of July 14, 1870, also required that, in addition to other amounts to be applied to the redemption or payment of the public debt, an amount equal to the interest on all bonds belonging to the aforesaid sinking fund should be applied to the payment of the public debt.

From the time when the act first named was to go into effect, until August 31, 1868, the demands upon the Treasury for expenses incident to the war were greatly in excess of the revenues of the Government, and therefore there was no surplus income which could be applied to the extinguishment of the debt or the creation of a sinking fund, and consequently the law providing for that fund was during that period necessarily rendered inoperative.

It will be noticed that the statute contemplated that a certain sum should be applied within each fiscal year to the account of the sinking fund. If the resources of the Treasury during each fiscal year, commencing with July, 1862, had been sufficient to have made a literal compliance with the conditions of the law practicable, the account would at the close of the last fiscal year have appeared upon the books of the Department as follows:

Amount for fiscal year 1863.....	$5,556,969 97
Amount for fiscal year 1864.....	12,184,090 52
Amount for fiscal year 1865.....	20,233,683 45
Amount for fiscal year 1866.....	30,490,767 15
Amount for fiscal year 1867.....	33,080,531 88
Amount for fiscal year 1868.....	33,736,306 85
Amount for fiscal year 1869.....	34,638,937 03
Amount for fiscal year 1870.....	35,959,651 99
Amount for fiscal year 1871.....	36,370,257 59
Amount for fiscal year 1872.....	36,507,573 43
Amount for fiscal year 1873.....	36,830,924 80
Amount for fiscal year 1874.....	38,012,930 63
Amount for fiscal year 1875.....	39,536,019 66
Amount for fiscal year 1876.....	40,681,351 02
Grand total.....	433,848,215 37

On the 31st of August, 1865, the public debt, as represented upon the books of the Department and shown by the public-debt statement, reached its highest point, namely:

Debt, less bonds issued to the various Pacific Railroad Companies and less cash in the Treasury..... $2,756,431,571 43
On June 30, 1876, the debt, including accrued interest, less bonds issued to the Pacific Railroad Companies and less cash in the Treasury, was..... 2,099,439,344 99

Reduction of the debt..... 656,992,226 44

The terms of the law of February 25, 1862, required by the operations of a sinking-fund account that the public debt should be reduced in the sum of $433,848,215.37 between July 1, 1862, and the close of the last fiscal year. A reduction has been effected during that period of $656,992,226.44, or $223,144,011.07 more than was absolutely required.

It can therefore be said, as a matter of fact, that all of the pledges and obligations of the Government to make provision for the sinking fund and the cancellation of the public debt have been fully met and carried out.

The following, from Secretary Sherman's report, appears to sustain this position:

In the last annual report (page x) my predecessor stated that had the resources of the Treasury during each fiscal year, commencing with 1862, been sufficient to make a literal compliance with the conditions of the sinking-fund law practicable, a total of $433,848,215.37 would have been applied to that fund July 1, 1876, whereas the actual reduction of the debt, including accrued interest, less cash in the Treasury at that date, amounted to $656,992,226.44. On the same basis the amount in the sinking fund would have reached $475,318,888.78 on the 1st July, 1877, on which date the reduction of the debt, including accrued interest, less cash in the Treasury, since its highest point in 1865, amounted to $696,273,345.17, or $220,954,459.39 in excess of the amount required by law to be provided for that fund.

I do not think, therefore, with this authority of two Secretaries of the Treasury, and these figures, which cannot be disputed, together with the additional fact that the public credit of the United States stands as high if not higher than that of any other nation, there can be necessity for maintaining the present taxation for such objects. No government in the world owes so little in proportion to its resources as ours. Our consols stand with the first on the London Exchange and the Paris Bourse. We can borrow at as low a rate of interest, if we make the bond long enough, as can England, the credit of which is the best in Europe. Therefore we should provide only for the amount required for the actual living expenditures, which taken as a basis of estimate as stated by Mr. Sherman will be an average of about $230,000,000 per annum, if we include the reduction in interest arising in consequence of the final conversion of the five-twenties into the four percents.

This, therefore, may be considered as the fair average annual expenditure of the Government for a series of years, and it is necessary to provide for it beyond hazard or contingency.

The total revenues for the year ending June 30, 1877, were..... $369,000,566 02
The revenues for the first three quarters of the present fiscal year ending April 1, instant, per data furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury, is, (see Appendix A.):

From imports..... $99,075,729 89
From internal revenue..... 80,198,300 40
Estimated from miscellaneous sources..... 14,560,204 04
Estimating remaining quarter..... 64,611,441 11

Whole revenue..... 258,445,765 44

Estimate by the Secretary for the year ending June 30, 1879..... 269,250,000 00

There can be no doubt that with the least revival in trade the receipts after this year will be increased. The average receipts will be about $270,000,000 per annum; if there is no return of prosperity an excess of revenue over expenditures of about $40,000,000. This statement I deem a sufficient guarantee to the Government creditors that their security is in no way endangered by omission to pay into the sinking fund, as it is also encouraging to the people to hope that a reduction in taxation can be made without any detriment to the public interest.

This apparent surplus revenue should be met by a corresponding reduction in taxation and in expenditures. It is our duty to forego appropriations not absolutely required, so that the burden of the people may be lightened to the lowest possible minimum. The reductions proposed in the present tariff will afford much relief, and, as I have shown, without injury to the Treasury. A corresponding reduction can be made in direct taxes, and yet sufficient revenue can be relied upon to meet the interest upon the public debt and defray all the necessary expenses of administration, if conducted upon a like scale of economy, as the tax-payers are now compelled to apply to their own individual affairs.

MANUFACTURERS.

The principal opposition to a change in the tariff emanates from the friends of extreme protection to the manufacturing interests.

Whatever may have been the excuse originally for the governmental bounty to the then infant manufacturers, it does not now exist and should not be continued, because the necessity for it no longer remains. They have reached so high a degree of excellence and grown so strong that they not only need not fear foreign competition here but are able to maintain themselves in other countries against any opposition or rivalry there. This is the fact, especially with regard to the leading and the most protected interests. The iron and steel, the woolen, the cotton, and the silk productions of the United States are now forcing themselves into foreign markets by no other aid than their own superiority and conceded merit.

IRON AND STEEL.

Much alarm has been excited in some parts of the Union by an undue apprehension that great injury to the iron and steel manufacturers would follow any change in the tariff. The iron and steel interests have been especially referred to as those which would be ruined by any interference whatever. I think upon a careful examination of the bill, so far as it affects this industry, these apprehensions will cease. The average reduction in rates in the metal schedule is only 4 per cent., which would seem to be too little to cause any alarm on the ground of loss of protection. The partial change from specific to ad valorem duties cannot properly be complained of. In some cases the change became necessary for the better securing the duties which have been frequently evaded, and in others for the purpose of simplification in the interest of revenue as well as of the home manufacturer, and in other cases for the purpose of modifying the vexatious classifications now existing. The total loss of revenue under this schedule, if computed on the consumption of 1877, amounts to $417,716.

The consumption of foreign metals, iron, steel, and manufactures of, has fallen from $57,333,158 in 1873 to $10,222,220 in 1877. The mean average for eight years' consumption of these metals and manufactures thereof amounted to $38,030,766 per annum. The large falling off in the importation of these articles may be properly traced to two causes: first, the high duties and the vexatious and cumbersome classifications, and, secondly, the wonderful progress and improvement which our own country has made in similar manufactures. To the latter cause, in my judgment, may be attributed the principal influence which is operating. It is quite certain that the exportation of manufactured articles which come under this head has largely increased. According to the official returns issued by the Bureau of Statistics, November 10, 1877, the average increase has been fully equal to 30 per cent. for the nine months ending 30th September last, over the preceding nine months of 1876. We exported in 1876 during this period of machinery, $1,891,305, and in the like period of 1877 $2,131,231, and of pig-iron, $70,544 in 1876 and $138,100 in 1877; of railroad bars for rails, $128,567 in 1876 and $198,770 in 1877; of sheet, band, and hoop iron, $4,988 in 1876 and $23,072 in 1877; of steam-engines, $489,405 in 1876 and $522,040 in 1877, and other manufactures of iron not enumerated, $2,510,038 in 1876 and $2,772,516 in 1877.

The exportations of steel show a more gratifying result. Of edge-tools we exported for the nine months of 1876 $448,717, while for the same period in 1877 the export amounted to $609,842; and of muskets, pistols, rifles, and sporting-guns we exported in 1876 $2,015,662, and in 1877 $4,361,752, an increase of about 133 per cent., and in other manufactures of steel not enumerated $112,817 in 1876, $247,216 in 1877. The total exports of iron and the manufactures of iron for the fiscal year 1877 was $9,089,540, thus showing that the apprehension arising from the competition of foreign mechanics with American workmen has now little force.

It was put in evidence before the Committee of Ways and Means, by Mr. Roach, the celebrated American iron-ship builder, that he readily obtained workmen in Pennsylvania from fifty to sixty cents per day; but, however this may be, it is certain that our superior quickness and productive energy counterbalance any difference which may exist in the price of labor. Mr. Isaac Southerin Bell, M. P., the English judge at the centennial exposition in Philadelphia, in his report upon the iron interest of the United States, summarized his conclusions as follows:

1. That the powers of iron production between the years 1870 and 1875 were increased in the United States far beyond any possible requirements of the country.
2. That the high prices which led to this permitted and induced the manufacturers to accede to demands from certain sections of the workmen which are now acting adversely to the true interests of the trade.
3. That the same causes reacting on the value of the raw materials, along with the increased value of labor, as above stated, have unduly added to the cost of the iron.
4. That the interference with the laws which regulate the prices of commodities has, in the case of anthracite coal, added to the difficulties of the iron-smelters; and the sudden demand made on mines incapable of meeting it has increased those difficulties by an unhealthy addition to the selling price of iron ore.
5. That the protective duties levied on foreign iron entering the United States, by raising the price there, are chargeable with a portion of the mischief.
6. That the natural resources of the United States of America are such as to render any protective tariff on iron unnecessary; which tariff, moreover, is an injustice to other branches of industry.

Mr. Bell is one of the best-informed men in England, and any opinions he expresses upon this subject are entitled to the highest consideration. It would appear, therefore, that the great degree of success which we have attained in the manufactures of iron and steel is attracting the attention of England, and the time cannot be distant when we shall be enabled to supply all other less favored nations.

In this connection it is an interesting fact that, as our exports of iron and steel have been increased, the exports of like articles from England to this country have been largely decreased. In 1872 England exported in value £35,996,000 of these articles, but in 1876 it had fallen to £20,737,000. While it would be unfair to attribute the change altogether to American competition, yet the reference to it is sufficient to be stated as an indication. There can be no doubt that this country has made enormous strides in the improved manufacture of articles of this character. In cutlery, machinery, engines, and other articles requiring skilled mechanical and scientific knowledge, Americans should be ashamed to acknowledge that they are inferior and require protection against the brain and physical power of any other people.

I hope that every close observer of the bill now before the House in comparing the rates on metals and manufactures thereof with the duty at present levied will admit that the reduction of rates of duties have been in average moderate to the last degree. The opponents of the bill, who will be found strongest in those parties interested in this schedule, cannot therefore complain of any extra radical changes that have been made as far as the reduction of rates is concerned. But they will and do oppose a reform in the tariff on metals because the bill before the House now tends to simplify the rates and the collection of duties, and I am very willing to meet them on that ground. Let it be understood, and I state it most emphatically, that the opposition from the iron, steel, and metal industries to the bill before the House is simply upon that ground only. I can very well understand the objection that iron and steel monopolies have against any change of duties. For instance, the present rate of duty on steel rails which is 1½ cents per pound or $28 per ton, entirely prohibits the importation of rails which can be bought in England at $35 per ton. If we calculate a duty of $28 per ton on them, the cost of foreign rails laid down in New York would be $63 gold per ton, while the price of American rails now is from $46 to $48 or even less.

A reduction as proposed in the bill to 1 cent per pound would still be $16.80 a ton duty on steel rails, and the cost of rails in Europe being $35, they could not be laid down in New York for less than $51.80, which is far above the price prevailing in the market for American rails. Yet I anticipate great objections to this change for the simple reason that the policy of protection is to prevent any possibility of foreign competition of steel rails with the home-made article. But I submit that such a policy is neither fair nor beneficial, as in the first place it deprives our citizens of having a competitive market for foreign commodities at home, and it certainly shuts out all the probability of revenue to the country. I am perfectly willing that the issues of the steel rail industries, or in fact of the iron and steel industries of this country, should be made upon that ground, and I do not fear for the result.

Let me call your attention to the reductions in this schedule on copper. It is a deplorable fact that the pure and best copper in the world placed on Lake Superior by Providence is now more for the benefit of foreign manufacturers of copper than to our own copper industry. In 1876 we exported 14,304,160 pounds of ingot copper, and in 1877 we exported 13,461,553 pounds of ingot copper. This copper was sent chiefly to three countries, namely, to France, Germany, and Great Britain, where it was sold invariably from 2 to 3 cents and sometimes 4 cents a pound below the market price in New York. Now, as it happens our own superior copper is chiefly used for the manufacture of cartridges, an industry in which our manufacturers in Connecticut or elsewhere excel. Yet by dint of our own tariff laws we have furnished foreign manufacturers with the cheaper raw material in order not only to compete with us successfully but to undersell us in foreign markets.

It is a well-known fact that if our merchants were allowed to buy American copper in London and bring it over to the United States free of duty that they would have it from 2 to 3 cents cheaper than it can be bought in the United States. But as the law forbids any American product to be reimported, where packages have been destroyed, it is a stipulation by the exporters of American copper invariably made that the packages and casks in which American copper is made should be at once destroyed.

I think we have evidences nearer home of the healthy condition of our metal industries than would appear by the foreign estimate of our success, or by the amount of exports of their products.

The American Iron and Steel Association in its last report states that there was produced in the United States 2,314,585 tons of pig-iron in 1877 as against 2,093,236 in 1876.

In Michigan and other western States large manufactures of hoes, rakes, and other agricultural implements are being made for export to England and other parts of Europe.

An enterprise has been commenced in Philadelphia looking to the export of anthracite coal to Europe and one cargo has actually sailed with model steam-engine locomotives constructed for the use of this coal. The future consumption of our coal in Europe is by no means an improbable event, the result of which to our large surplus coal-producing regions is beyond estimate.

WOOLENS.

Much that has been said with reference to the steel and iron manufactures applies to worsted and woolens. Great progress has been made in these articles. If the falling off in the amount of duties received from them without any change in the tariff is an indication of a decrease in the consumption by us of foreign productions, the following table is very significant:

It is evident from these figures that we are gradually supplying the entire home consumption, and it cannot be long, if the raw material be furnished at less cost, before we shall be able to supply all our own wants and engage in competition with England and other nations in markets which they have so long monopolized. England, which has maintained the mastery in these products, is fast losing her hold. There is a remarkable falling off in the quantity she exports.

The following table (official) shows this to an extent that cannot be accounted for solely on the ground of the general depression of trade:

Shipments from England to the United States.

Years.	Woolens.	Worsted goods.
	Yards.	Yards.
1871.....	5, 391, 000	86, 682, 000
1872.....	6, 339, 000	98, 243, 000
1873.....	4, 968, 000	85, 891, 000

1876.....	1, 475, 000	41, 079, 000

The falling off since 1871 has been in woolens 77½ per cent. and in worsted goods 52½ per cent; certainly this is greater than the general stagnation would justify. At the late exhibition at Philadelphia foreign factors were astonished at the wonderful perfection of our worsted and woolen fabrics. French, German, and English manufacturers went home with the conviction that they had a competitor in us who would soon master them in the production of cassimeres, cloths, and coatings. Therefore we may well conclude that in this regard we are now able to cope with our rivals of Europe, and that American manufacturers of woolen and worsted fabrics require no longer the bounties which they have for so extended a period enjoyed at the hands of the Government. Certainly, in view of these facts, leading manufacturers cannot much longer claim governmental bounty. If they were entitled to protection originally, there is little foundation for it now.

The influence of the tariff on the commonest kind of mixed woolen dress goods, such as are worn by the poorest classes in the country, is of a nature that requires the most serious consideration.

Fancy alpaca, costing in England 7½ cents per yard, is subject to a duty of 5 cents per yard, and sold in this market at 20 cents per yard. Now, as it takes twenty yards of this stuff to make a dress, the poorest woman of our working classes pays a direct tax of $1 for a dress. Black alpaca, costing in England 5½ pence or 11½ cents of our money, is subject to a duty of 8½ cents per yard. This article is sold for 27½ cents per yard and worn by the millions of our population. Surely an article costing in England 5½ pence cannot be considered a luxury; yet we find that the pernicious working of our tariff is of that kind which oppresses the poorer classes in all their necessities of life. Black cashmere is worn as a Sunday dress by millions of our industrial classes. The cost of these goods in Europe is 26 cents, the duty thereon amounts to 18½ cents per yard, and is consequently sold at 55 cents a yard wholesale in the United States.

Now, do our people generally understand what such a duty really means? A workingman in Europe buying a dress of this kind for his wife and using only ten yards of it would get it at $2.60, whereas his brother-workingman in the United States if he wishes to treat his wife with a dress of this class would have to pay $5.50 for the same dress, or more than double.

The question therefore arises whether it is absolutely necessary to charge a tax of $1.85 on a dress of this kind, coming as it does out of the pocket of the hard-workingman for the benefit of sustaining the Government and the industries of this country. Surely it must be admitted that there is no country in the world where an equal taxation is laid upon the labor and industry of the hardest-working man of the population.

WOOL.

The change to a uniform rate of 35 per cent. on raw wool has been actuated by the following reasons: First, the present tariff has three distinct classifications for raw wools, subdivided by two distinct rates. In each classification the duty thereon is levied both specific and ad valorem and based upon the foreign cost. It is therefore obvious that a change to a single ad valorem rate is by no means an innovation; but it has first of all the merits of simplifying the rates by abolishing the specific duty, and also by repealing the ad valorem rate to the different costs of raw wools, divided into classes abroad. Secondly, under the present tariff the class of wool known as scoured and washed wools is pretty much entirely prohibited. In 1877 the whole importation of scoured clothing-wool was but 130 pounds and the importation of washed clothing-wool was 10,276 pounds. Now, it is very well understood that the interest of the wool manufacturer is to have the largest variety of wools that he possibly can procure abroad, while our existing tariff compels him to import wool in the grease and dirt. The proposed rate of duty at 35 per cent. ad valorem somewhat raises the rates on carpet wools; yet, if we consider that the new bill gives a protection of an average of 50 per cent. on manufactured carpets, which is the same rate of protection that is given on the manufactured cloth, there certainly seems to be no room left for dissatisfaction. I cannot see with what equity we can allow the raw wools for the use of carpeting to come in from 15 to 20 per cent. less, under the present existing tariff, than for the wool used in the manufactured cloth.

The wool-growers are made to believe that the rate of 35 per cent. proposed is detrimental to their interest. There is no foundation for this apprehension. There is no perceptible change as to the wool grown in the United States.

I append a statement showing the revenue from wool in 1877 under the present tariff and what it would be on the consumption of the same quantities under the 35 per cent. duty now proposed:

Wool revenues.

The amount of duties received upon wools imported during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877..... $2, 644, 748
Whole value of wools imported during same period, $7,012,844; which at the proposed duty of 35 per cent. would have produced..... 2, 454, 516

The executive committee of the American Woolens and Wool Association of the United States in their representation to the Committee of Ways and Means thus refer to the evils of the present method of levying the wool duties and the benefits that will arise if a horizontal ad valorem duty shall be adopted as proposed in the bill:

We know of no reason why one kind of wool should pay any higher rate of duty than another, nor can we believe that it is the interest of the Government or of the people that any particular class of wool or of manufactures should be discriminated against. We hold it to be of vital importance to every manufacturer that he should be left as free as possible to choose the raw material best adapted to his peculiar fabric, and that it is equally important to every wool-grower that he should be left free to produce that class of wool best suited to his peculiar soil and climate. In our country, where we have every variety of soil and climate and where wools of nearly all descriptions can be grown, there can be no doubt that the fairest result can be obtained by placing a uniform rate of duty upon all kinds of wool.

The present classification is also essentially defective because there is no natural line of demarcation between class 1, clothing wool, and class 2, combing wool. The Merino sheep have been crossed with sheep of English blood in all proportions, and the resulting wool is well adapted to either combing or clothing purposes, and may be placed with almost equal propriety in either class, thus giving rise to endless disputes and annoyances in the custom-houses and to frequent losses to importers.

The difficulty of classing wool under the present system may be inferred from the fact that it was necessary to furnish the appraisers of the different custom-houses with 162 type-samples in order to enable them to properly discharge their duties. The only effect of this complicated system is to make washed wools of class 1 pay double the duty of washed wools in class 2; in all other respects the distinction of classification is practically abolished by assessing the same rate of duties upon both classes.

No gain to the revenue has accrued from this classification. It has simply prohibited the importation of washed wools of class 1, to the great injury of the manufacturer, as the great bulk of desirable clothing wools in European markets is offered for sale in the washed state. There being no American competition for these washed wools they are sold to our foreign competitors at a relatively lower price than the unwashed wools to which American manufacturers are restricted by the tariff. The restriction to unwashed wool also entails extra expenses for freight and handling upon the home manufacturer.

A few figures compiled from the reports of the Department of Agriculture for the years 1865 to 1866 and 1874 to 1876 will serve to show that the present tariff has not proved beneficial to the woolen manufacturers or to the wool-growers, especially to those wool-growers residing in the States on this side of the Mississippi, in whose interest this tariff was supposed to have been specially made:

Name of State.	Number of sheep, February 1, 1867.	Number of sheep, January 1, 1877.
Ohio.....	7, 159, 177	3, 900, 000
Michigan.....	4, 028, 767	2, 100, 000
Pennsylvania.....	3, 456, 568	1, 607, 000
New York.....	5, 373, 005	1, 897, 700
Indiana.....	3, 033, 870	1, 175, 000
Illinois.....	2, 764, 073	1, 258, 500
Wisconsin.....	1, 664, 338	1, 151, 100
Total.....	27, 470, 797	13, 089, 300

We have in these States a decrease of 52 per cent. since this tariff was enacted. If we include New England, the total decrease in the States east of the Mississippi will be found to be quite as great. The whole number of sheep in the United States in 1867 was 42,000,000, (see Agricultural report for 1871, page 39;) in 1877, 35,804,000; a decrease of 15 per cent.

We have given the statistics of the number of sheep for the reason that the varying shrinkage of wool from different sections makes a comparison between numbers of sheep fairer than a comparison between pounds of wool. It must be observed, also, that this immense decrease in sheep east of the Mississippi represents a corresponding decrease in the fine, long, more valuable varieties of wool, while the increase west of the Mississippi is largely made up of short, burry, seedy, and common descriptions. Contrast these statistics with those of Great Britain:

The whole number of sheep in Great Britain in 1866 was 25,795,000; in 1874 it was 35,000,000, an increase in eight years of 35 per cent. under absolute free trade in wool, and with an area no greater than some of our larger States.

The importations of wool and woollens into this country for the year 1867, when large quantities of both were imported in anticipation of the tariff, were as follows: Wool, 36,300,000 pounds; woollens valued at $45,800,000. For the five years ending 1875, when the trade had adjusted itself to the tariff, the average yearly importation was, in wool, 75,000,000 pounds; in woollens, $47,600,000.

These figures show that under a tariff framed to promote the growth of wool, the quantity has actually decreased, and we have been obliged to increase our importations from foreign countries. That under this same tariff, which was also supposed to be framed to encourage home manufactures, our mills have not been able to produce the fabrics necessary for our own consumption, and the importation of woollen goods has also increased. Much of this mortifying result is due to the restriction in the selection of raw material, to which we have alluded, and upon which we cannot lay too much stress.

We also believe that a specific duty is not applicable to an article like wool, which varies so widely in value. Every tariff that has attempted to deal with it has been obliged to use value as one of the elements in determining classes, and if the element of value is used at all there is no apparent reason why the whole duty should not be ad valorem.

Schedule B, herewith submitted, is designed to show the most simple and equitable arrangement which we have been able to devise for specific rates. It may be also considered as an additional illustration of the inequality of any but ad valorem duties.

In further illustration of this point we hereto annex Schedule C, which shows the varying duties which will be paid, under a specific duty, on the secured pound by the kinds of wool specified. One wool would pay twice as much as another.

It is for the foregoing reasons that the committee recommend the abolition of the classification, which serves no useful purpose, but works great injustice and inequality, as shown by Schedule A, and also recommend the adoption of the uniform rate of 25 per cent. ad valorem on all kinds of wool.

COTTONS.

The exports of our manufactured cottons have increased since 1875 over $7,000,000, the most of which has gone to Europe and been purchased on foreign account. The reports recently made to the State Department by our diplomatic and consular agents abroad show that there is an encouraging disposition to enlarge our foreign trade especially in cotton fabrics; and in the East Indies, including China, Japan, India, and Australia, there is a decided expression in favor of our cotton fabrics over the English.

The manufacturers of England are alarmed at these indications; they already experience the effects of even these small competitions; they struggle against and fear them. As yet England has held her own against France and Germany, but can but a little longer against the United States. And why should we be surprised at our success over England in cotton manufactures? The raw material is at our own doors with comparatively little cost of transportation, while to her it is carried many miles across the ocean at high cost. We turn out more and better work on any given basis of comparison than the English can. Our machinery and workmen are in all respects equal, if not superior, and our proximity to the South American and Pacific markets is much better, and therefore with these advantages, backed up by the skill, energy, and progressive spirit of the American character, it would be very strange if we were afraid of the rivalry of England.

From the London Warehousemen and Drapers' Trade Journal, July, 1877:

Nearly two years ago we announced the first importation into this country of cotton cloths manufactured in America, and paid a special visit to Manchester to examine them. We are not alarmists and have too much faith in the energy and ability of our manufacturers to be easily disturbed, but we were obliged to admit the excellence of the American fabric, and felt it a duty to warn our Manchester friends that the quality of the new importations placed the sized manufactures of our own mills at a serious disadvantage. In the interval that has elapsed since then we have occasionally returned to the same subject, and return to it again to-day to note that the importations continue to increase in bulk and that our manufacturers still size and dress their fabrics with China clay. Now and then they break silence to justify their practice by the plea that their customers at home and abroad like to have the fabrics sized and loaded, and they only supply what is demanded. Our readers will know how to estimate the excuse.

In the mean time Messrs. Ellet, Glover & Co., of George street, Manchester, have sent us samples of cloths from the Wamsutta Mills, Massachusetts, for whom and for other American companies they are the sole agents in this country. These samples sustain in every respect the reputation achieved here by the American fabrics. One of them is a double-warp cotton sheeting, and we have never seen a cloth of English manufacture to equal it. It is perfectly pure, extremely strong, and moderate in price. Precisely the same may be said of the Wamsutta (willed sheetings and long-cloths. We have given them a very careful examination and no other judgment is possible.

Knowing perfectly well how much may be said about the depression of trade in the States, and the consequent pressure upon manufacturers there to find an outlet for their produce, it is still not by any means an unimportant fact that Massachusetts finds it possible to compete with Manchester in the Manchester and London markets, and we are only discharging a duty which we must not disregard in again calling attention to it.

The president of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce at its last annual meeting, in his speech on that occasion, stated that the exports of Manchester goods to the United States which formerly afforded an excellent market were now nil, and that there is considerable trade in Manchester in cotton fabrics manufactured in America. It is certainly true that in all the manufacturing districts of England there is a lively apprehension that the American markets for their cotton products is fast becoming extinct. The following table gleaned from official sources shows the shipment to this country of cotton goods for the last six years:

	Yards.
1871.....	129,000,000
1872.....	132,000,000
1873.....	109,500,000
1874.....	105,300,000
1875.....	79,900,000

This decrease is in a greater ratio than the general depression of trade would excuse. General causes have of course affected all trades about equally. The whole imports of the United States have fallen from $604,400,000 in 1872 to $426,600,000 in 1876, at a rate of 31 per cent. The reduction, however, of this class of British fabrics has been in a much higher ratio comparing 1871 with 1876, the decrease in cotton goods being at the rate of 57 per cent. This comparison is based on quantities, and not values, which, owing to the great decline in prices, would exhibit a still larger rate of decrease. It is not exclusively in the coarser goods that our rivalry with England begins to be recognized abroad. Our manufacturers claim not only that their machinery turns out a larger product per machine or per hand employed than Lancashire, but that there is also a very marked improvement in the quality and style of our products. Upon the whole, therefore, it may well be supposed that the time is not far distant when we shall shut out British cotton goods permanently from our market.

The bill changes the duty on gray shirting not exceeding 100 threads and exceeding in weight 5 ounces from 5 cents per square yard to 2 cents a square yard, which is a reduction of over 100 per cent. But the reason for this great change is found in the fact that not a single yard has been imported since 1869. The cost of these goods as far as can be ascertained is about 6 to 7 cents a square yard in Europe. Now, it must be obvious that 2 cents per square yard duty, which is equal to about 28 per cent., will either give us revenue or it will demonstrate that even at 28 per cent. duty none can be imported. In any case there is not a cent loss to revenue.

Bleached cottons of the same class are changed from 5½ cents per square yard to 2½ cents per square yard. Not a single yard of this goods is being imported; no record can be found of any duty having been received from it in commerce and navigation during the last 7 years; the change, therefore, does not involve any loss on revenue.

The colored printed goods of the same class are changed from 5½ cents per square yard and 10 per cent. to 3 cents per square yard in the bill. Revenue received from this class of goods during 7 years from 1871 to 1877 inclusive, was as follows:

1872.....	7,401 13
1873.....	8,249 15
1874.....	3,752 32
1875.....	25,640 34
1876.....	304 90

The loss of revenue under the new duties on this article computed on the consumption of the foreign goods of 1877 would be $2,978.96.

On finer and lighter goods of the same description not exceeding 200 threads per square inch, the change having been on unbleached from 5 to 2½ cents per square yard, from 5½ to 3 cents per square yard bleached, and on printed from 5½ cents and 20 per cent to 4½ cents per square yard, the loss of revenue computed on the consumption of 1877 would be as follows: on unbleached, $859.27; on bleached, no consumption; on printed, $294,324.28.

The rate of duty under the present tariff computed on actual consumption of this last article is 56.81 per cent. The new rate amounts to still 30 per cent., and it may confidently be expected that not only will consumers largely benefit by this change, but that the revenue will increase under the new rate.

The next change made on unbleached goods exceeding 200 threads from 5 cents per square yard to 4 cents per square yard leaves no loss on the revenue, for none has been consumed in 1877.

The change on bleached of the same class from 5½ cents per square yard to 4½ cents per square yard is only a reduction of 7½ per cent. on existing rates. This class of goods brought a revenue in 1877 of $494,059. One regard was therefore had to sustain the revenue.

The reduction of colored and printed goods of the same class from 5½ cents per square yard and 20 per cent. to 5½ cents per square yard will only involve a loss of $6,320.40, being a reduction of the 20 per cent. duty on a whole consumption of $31,602. All other reductions made in jeans, denims, drillings, and colored and printed goods are as follows: On unbleached from 6 cents per square yard to 2½ cents per square yard, the revenue in 1877 only amounted to $229.68, and the average rate of duty was 109.89 per cent., (see Commerce and Navigation, 1877, page 464;) it is therefore obvious that this reduction involves no loss of revenue, but may largely increase it.

The reduction on bleached from 6½ cents per square yard to 3 cents per square yard involves hardly any loss, as the revenue in 1877 of this goods was only $63.38, while the reduction of stained and printed from 6½ cents per square yard and 10 per cent. ad valorem to 4 cents per square yard involves a very trifling loss, as the revenue collected in 1877 only amounted to $361.98.

The reduction on the same class of goods of a lighter description reduced on unbleached from 6 cents to 3 cents per square yard, and 6½ to 3½ and 6½ cents and 15 per cent. to 5 cents per square yard only involves a loss of $25,914. It may therefore be assumed that a larger revenue will be collected.

The 35 per cent. ad valorem goods reduced to 30 per cent. involves a loss, computed upon the consumption of 1877, of $359,700. And the reduction of all other manufactures of cotton reduced from 35 per cent. to 25 per cent. involves a loss, computed on the consumption of 1877, of $464,717.

The simplification and the reduction of duties on thread-yarn amounts to $342,803.60. This reduction, apparently large, is necessary on account of encouraging the manufactures of spool-thread and cotton fabrics in this country, and there can be no doubt that at the reduced rates there will be a heavy increase of revenue.

Simplification and reduction on spool-thread from a double to a single rate of duty from 6 cents and 30 per cent. and 6 cents and 35 per cent. to 6 cents and 7 cents respectively per dozen involves a reduction, computed on 1877, of $21,509.

Our export trade of cotton fabrics has suffered largely under the prevailing high duties on foreign manufactured cotton goods.

The total exports of our domestic manufactures of cotton goods during the last ten years, namely, from 1868 to 1877, inclusive, amount to $51,368,092, whereas the exports of domestic cotton fabrics during ten years of a low tariff, namely, from 1852 to 1861, inclusive, amounted to $74,060,605, or some $22,732,000 more than during the ten years of a high-tariff system. It is perfectly true that our exports of cotton fabrics in 1876 were $7,722,978, and in 1877 they were $12,134,740, which is about $1,000,000 more than the exports of 1860 and 1861. Yet if we look at the countries to which we exported these cotton fabrics it will be found that a large portion of them has gone to countries where little or no profit could possibly have been made on them; for instance we exported in 1876 to England and Germany $2,610,067, and in 1877 our exports of cotton fabrics to England and Germany were $2,271,610, whereas our whole exports to China and India in 1876 amounted to $908,178, and in 1877 to $1,223,843. In other words, while the bulk of our exports of manufactures of cotton fabrics before the war went to China and India, where we successfully competed with the British manufacturer of cotton goods, we now, during the last few years, seek a market for the surplus of our cotton fabrics at a loss in those European countries who are famous for producing cotton fabrics at the lowest price. It cannot therefore be maintained that the present tariff on cotton fabrics is beneficial to the manufacturer either at home or abroad, as the distress in the manufactured cotton industry is too well known at home and these statistics show that he seeks a losing market for the surplus produced.

SILK.

The fifth annual report of the Silk Association of America, dated May 5, 1877, contains the following letter addressed by I. Walter H. Thorp to the Macclesfield (England) Courier, dated October 4, 1876:

Our English silk manufacturers have acted wisely in abstaining from exhibiting their goods at the centennial exhibition at Philadelphia, as they would only have exposed their inferiority in quality and price. Instead of wishing any longer to see or use our English silk goods, America, protected by her 60 per cent. duty on the import of manufactured silk, is almost entirely supplying her own market with home-made goods; and her manufacturers, having proved that they can produce the article and quality required by their markets, are now lending all their efforts to the reduction of cost.

Now that the period of inflated prices and extravagant wages is passing away, (which last item has hitherto been the great difficulty with manufacturers,) and their scale of wages is rapidly falling to the European level, we shall find that the simple labor-saving appliances and greater intelligence of the work-people will bring us face to face with a competition such as we have never yet dreamed of, and I venture to say that before long England, mother of free trade as she is, will find herself compelled to impose a duty on the importation of American silks, in order to protect her manufacturers from being beaten in their own markets. * * * I noticed at the exhibition that our neighbors at Leek had had the courage to send exhibits of such sewing-silks, but any one comparing them with the cases of the Nosotack or Corticelli Silk Company, Belding Brothers, or Brainerd, Armstrong & Co. would not fail to notice their inferiority in luster and finish. In silk piece-goods and dresses, I was quite astonished at the magnificent goods shown by Cheney Brothers, Dexter, Lambert & Co., Hamill & Booth, and William Strange & Co., of Paterson; and that there is no inferiority in machinery or dyeing is testified by the beautiful silk-throwing machinery of the Danforth Machine Company, of Paterson (who boast that their winding and reeling frames are greatly in advance of any others produced in Europe and America) and the finely arranged cases of Weidmann & Greppo, dyers of Paterson.

In conclusion, I could have wished that the Macclesfield Weavers' Association had seen fit, with their vast accumulated funds, to send across a deputation to report on the silk goods exhibited at the Centennial, and to return with enlightened views to inform their fellow-workmen of the true state of the trade.

In an appreciative article on the centennial exhibition published in the Revue des Deux-mondes, July, 1877, M. Jules Simonin, the eminent French publicist, pointed out the silk industry of America as among the successes with which France would continually be driven to a closer competition. The Swiss commissioner-general to the centennial exhibition, in his official report, calls the attention of his countrymen to the progress of Americans in silk manufacture, and says, "Switzerland must be prepared for a warmer rivalry in silk products."

This report contains tables and statements showing conclusively that the silk industry of the United States has reached a high degree of success and is abundantly able to take care of itself. Indeed, the only complaint it makes is of hard times and the frauds practiced in fictitious invoices and by smuggling, which are of course the natural results of high duties, injurious alike to the Government and the home manufacturer. I am not to be understood as being adverse to the prosperity of our manufacturing interests. As an American I am proud of the great success that has attended them; nor do I wish to place any obstruction in the way of their continued prosperity.

As showing the prosperity of this industry in the United States, the following is an extract from a work recently published, entitled The Silk Industry in America, page 128:

The centennial year of our national existence finds us, even in a time of financial depression, manufacturing not less than one-half of all the silk goods used in our country, and furnishing them to our people at a price, if the quality of the goods be taken into consideration, below that which ruled when the silks of England, France, and Italy were admitted into our ports nearly free of duty. The processes already invented, and in practice, enable us to produce better fabrics than have been offered here before. Nor, on the other hand, has the high rate of duty so far diminished importation as to reduce the Government's revenue. The duties collected on manufactured silk goods in the whole period from 1843 to 1875, amounted to over $275,000,000; but $150,000,000, more than half of it, was paid within the last ten years. The fact becomes even plainer if the average annual revenue under different tariffs be considered. Thus from 1843 to 1856, with a duty of 30 and 25 per cent., the average annual revenue was about $500,000; from 1857 to 1864, with duties ranging from 24 to 40 per cent., the average was about five and a half millions; but from 1865 to 1875, with a duty of 60 and 50 per cent., the average revenue rose to $14,500,000. Meanwhile, vigorous competition, both at home and abroad, has greatly cheapened domestic production, and substituted in many of the processes machine labor for hand labor; the result being a great improvement in American goods as well as a marked reduction of their prices.

This great advantage has been gained also in the very field where Great Britain has almost completely failed. With an established manufacture of great extent, reaching back nearly two centuries; with highly skilled workmen, abundant capital, and a nearer market than we have in which to purchase her raw material, (as from climatic causes the silk culture had been a failure,) she was obliged to abandon her manufactures of silk, except in the production of spun silk, hosiery, silk, laces, and some descriptions of ribbons, as soon as the silks of France and Italy were admitted duty free. Twenty years ago our supply of dress silks, ribbons, silk, laces, shawls, &c., was drawn in about equal quantities from England and France. To-day, beyond a few fancy goods (like silk lace, hosiery, ribbons, and mixed goods of silk and linen, silk and cotton, and silk and wool, mainly of spun silk) we buy no silks from Great Britain.

The reduction of duty on silks from 50 per cent. and 60 per cent. respectively to a uniform rate of 45 per cent. will no doubt prove beneficial. It should be borne in mind that an immense quantity of silk used in this country enters into the manufacture of other articles besides expensive dress. For instance, much silk is used in the manufacture of men's clothing, a vast amount is also used in the manufacture of umbrellas, parasols, and hundred other articles. It is therefore a mistake to class silks entirely as a high luxury.

The collection of revenue under the new rates having been simplified to a uniform rate on dress silk and mixed silk goods it will no doubt tend to larger receipts of revenue. It has been discovered and is now undergoing Treasury investigation that enormous frauds by undervaluations have long been practiced at the principal ports of importation. Some startling revelations may be soon expected which will implicate persons of hitherto high commercial and social standing. While it is almost impossible to remove altogether these evils so long as our high tariff is maintained, still it will be our effort to make them more difficult of accomplishment.

GENERAL OBJECT OF THE BILL.

The general policy and scheme of the bill is to resuscitate American commerce, to re-establish our position as one of the foremost maritime nations of the world, and by this means to develop to its full extent the material resources of the nation. Will not this advance the manufacturing interests of the country? It is only necessary for us to have the opportunity to establish reciprocal trade with all the nations of the world in order to show our superiority. Certainly American industries, so far as manufactures are concerned, have reached so high a degree of perfection that we can have nothing to fear. An exclusive policy, like that which the protective system implies, is not applicable to modern times. No nation now lives within itself. Science has served to unite the human race into one common family. While political institutions and language separate them into individual communities, yet in interests, in social ties, in rapid and constant intercommunication, in interchange of products, they have become solidified and concentrated. The former barriers which prevented general fraternal concord have been shattered, if not altogether broken down. The telegraph and the rapidity by which intercommunication is constantly conducted have caused a similitude of thought and action. The result of this will speedily effect reciprocal interchange of products and commodities, and that people which can supply another to the best advantage will command appreciation.

As a consequence the United States will receive universal recognition in all things in which we strive to excel. Hence the removal of any obstructions upon our part to the full consummation of this coming assimilation and consolidation is demanded by every consideration of self-interest.

As we have set the example of free political institutions and the recognition of the rights of the people, holding up to other nations the example of free political thought and action, it is our duty to lead off in the free interchange of productions and the removal of those barriers which serve only to dwarf human energy and to keep fettered in a subordinate condition the manual power of labor.

It is but fair, however, that having grown strong by the bounty of the Government, and having been the beneficiaries of the entire people of the United States who were taxed for their profit, I am unwilling to continue this favor. Whatever may have justified it originally in order to establish them permanently as American industries, cannot be retained as the lasting policy of the Government. They should now be placed upon the same footing with every other department of productive industry.

But while firmly convinced of the justice and necessity of an abolition of the protective policy, I do not propose at this time to make the application. The bill reported by the committee makes but slight reductions from the existing tariff. These reductions are made in a way and in a direction that will not affect existing manufacturers. They are rather intended as an indication that the special favor which has been so long extended must sooner or later be materially modified and finally be withdrawn altogether. I recognize in consequence of the present tariff a moral right in the interests affected for a little longer enjoyment of the sustenance so liberally dispensed to them. I think that the advantages which the bill extends to them very much outweighs any injury inflicted by a reduction of the rates. New principles are sought to be ingrafted upon the policy of the Government extending facilities for the exportation of American manufactures which are not now enjoyed.

CONCLUSION.

In contemplating the needs of the country, is it not time for statesmen and thoughtful men to raise themselves above the mere conflicts of party? Is there no higher object worthy of their effort than to become mere partisan retainers and gladiators? Is it not the duty of the intellect of the nation, with opportunity in public life, to initiate and shape legislation looking to a fuller development of our material resources and a more profitable use of the advantages which God and nature have given us? However desirable a reform in the civil service may be and however important the preservation intact of the political organizations to which we belong may be, yet these and all other pending questions are secondary to that of the political economies, involving in their consideration the highest interests of the present as well as of succeeding generations, by an intelligent utilization of existing yet hidden superior possessions.

The late war, like all wars, especially in republics, threw into the leading places in the public councils those who had commended themselves to public favor by military achievements, and, so long as a lively recollection of the incidents of the war lasted, this class, as a class, ruled the public councils. Time has, however, calmed the popular pulse, and the sober judgment of the country has reached the conclusion that the meritorious soldier is not always a statesman. He may answer the purposes of war, but not of peace. For the great objects and duty of government we require a broad, catholic spirit and an elevated comprehension of the needs and the resources of the nation. He who possesses these is the most useful legislator and best qualified to determine measures for the general well-being. I do not declare that soldiers cannot be statesmen; history has many brilliant examples to the contrary; but I do say that for the past fifteen years the heroes of our late war, from whose merits I would not detract, have occupied almost entirely the control of our civil affairs, thrusting aside, by their hold upon popular esteem, those who by their training, great abilities, and much higher qualifications were better fitted for the purposes of the state. Is it unjust, therefore, to attribute to this fact much of our present distress and lack of material progress?

Now, however, the time has come when men can stand upon their own merits for the purposes required, and we can seek the great minds of the country to lead us onward in the important struggle for national grandeur, power, and wealth. The hero has been remembered and rewarded; let us do likewise by those who will lead us out of the present labyrinth of despair and point to the road which will keep us from a like condition hereafter.

Doubtless there are many now in obscurity who have the capacity to do this, who will become illustrious in the effort. It is true that ours is a Government of party; but I contend that they who, rising superior to the degrading servitude required by political organizations, will think out, suggest, and practically apply measures for the public good such as I have indicated will not only advantage the party to which they belong, but will create for themselves names that will stand side by side in history with the fathers of our country and transmit to their posterity a valid claim to a just pride of ancestry.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, WARRANT DIVISION, April 1, 1878.

Mr. BANKS. I move the committee rise.

Mr. MITCHELL. I desire to know whether I understood the gentleman from New York correctly in making his statement in reference to the production of pig-iron that it was greater last year than ever before.

Mr. WOOD. Yes, sir; and I have proof of the fact here if the Iron and Steel Association of Philadelphia is an authority.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have no doubt the gentleman is entirely honest in that statement. I have that statement too, but do not read it as the gentleman has done. I rise for the purpose of making a correction of the gentleman's statement.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. My colleague is right, the production of pig-iron last year was greater than the previous year.

Mr. MITCHELL. But that was not the gentleman's statement.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. That is the way I understood the statement of my colleague.

Mr. MITCHELL. I beg the gentleman's pardon; the question I put to him was, whether it was greater than ever before, and he answered in the affirmative.

Mr. WOOD. I did not intend to state that. I will now state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that in 1876 the production was 2,093,236 tons and in 1877 it was 2,314,585.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is true.

Mr. WOOD. That is what I said; that is all I intended to state.

Mr. MITCHELL. Then I misunderstood the gentleman. I understood him to say that it was larger last year than ever before. It appears in this article that in 1872 the production was 2,854,558 tons. That fact appears in the same article to which the gentlemen has referred, and that is a production greater than last year when only one-third of the furnaces in the United States, including the State of Pennsylvania, to which he called particular attention, were in full blast.

Mr. BURCHARD. What was it in 1870?

Mr. MITCHELL. I have not the figures for 1870.

Mr. BURCHARD. It was 1,800,000 tons.

Mr. BANKS. I move the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SAYLER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration a bill (H. R. No. 4106) to impose duties upon foreign imports, to promote trade and commerce, to reduce taxation, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

F. W. HURTT.

Mr. McCOOK, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to this House, in addition to the proceedings of the court-martial in the case of F. W. Hurtt, assistant quartermaster, United States Volunteers, which were sent by the then Secretary of War, William W. Belknap, on the 20th of May, 1874, in answer to a call of the House, and printed in Executive Document No. 255, of the Forty-third Congress, first session, copies of all other papers on file or of record in the War Department in the said case, including especially the statements, opinions, recommendations, and testimonials of the accounting officers of the Government and of the judge-advocate, president, and members of the said court-martial.

Mr. McCOOK moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN BOTTS.

Mr. HERBERT, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4248) to place the name of John Botts, of Pike County, Alabama, on the rolls as a pensioner of the war of 1812; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

GREENVILLE LAND OFFICE, ALABAMA.

Mr. HERBERT also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4249) to refund certain moneys paid by mistake to the Government at the land office at Greenville, Alabama; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

PAY OF CLERK AND EXPERTS.

Mr. GLOVER. I ask unanimous consent to introduce for present consideration a joint resolution providing for the payment of the clerk and experts of the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department who, by an inadvertence, were not sworn into office at the date of their appointments.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read for information, after which objections, if any, will be in order.

The joint resolution was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I object.

Mr. GLOVER. I hope the gentleman will not object. These men have been working for some time without receiving the pay to which they are entitled.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I insist on my objection.

LIFE-SAVING SERVICE.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York, by unanimous consent, presented resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, in respect to the life-saving service; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

They are as follows:

Resolutions in respect to the life-saving service.

At the monthly meeting of the Chamber of Commerce held April 4, 1878, Mr. Samuel D. Babcock, president, in the chair, the following resolutions reported by the committee of the chamber on foreign commerce, in regard to the transfer of the life-saving service to the control of the Navy Department, were adopted:

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this chamber, the transfer of the United States life-saving service from the control of the Treasury Department to the Navy Department, as is proposed in Senator SARGENT's bill and its amendments, would be inexpedient, as not only the origin and history of the life-saving service, but also the general interests of our Government, justify and demand its subordination to the Treasury Department and its connection with the revenue-marine service.

Resolved, That the chamber recommend the passage of the bill introduced in the House by Hon. Mr. ROBERTS, and recommended by the Committee on Commerce to that body, as the provisions of that bill are well calculated to increase the efficiency of the life-saving service under its present control.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be attested and sent to both Houses of Congress by the secretary.

A true copy.

S. D. BABCOCK, President.
GEORGE WILSON, Secretary.

Mr. James W. Elwell, chairman of the committee on foreign commerce and the revenue laws, to which was referred at the last meeting of the chamber the resolution approving of the bill pending in Congress to transfer the life-saving service to the control of the Navy Department, submitted the following report:

To the Chamber of Commerce:

Your committee, to whom was referred, at the last regular meeting of the chamber, the following resolution, namely: "That this chamber approve of the bill introduced by Senator SARGENT transferring the life-saving service to the control of the Navy Department," beg leave to report:

That they have given the subject-matter of this resolution referred to them a very careful consideration, and have devoted much time and attention to it by the examination of the printed reports, as well as other printed documents relating to the life-saving service.

They have received communications in writing from parties representing both sides of the question, which they have carefully considered. They have also had personal interviews with various parties familiar with the service and its present workings, having become acquainted with it by personal observation and by visits to the line of our coast, some of these parties being for and some against the present system; and with the information before them, and from their best judgment as to the facts, your committee are unanimous in their opinion that the service in its present condition is neither so inefficient nor so incapable of improvement as to demand the radical change which would result from the passage of Mr. SARGENT's bill.

The Committee on Commerce of the House, to whom were referred the two bills before that body, with various petitions, protests, and memorials relating to the life-saving service, after due consideration, reported a substitute for all other bills, and that bill was introduced in the House by Hon. Mr. ROBERTS, and is known as bill No. 398.

Your committee have examined this bill, and approve of it, and are prepared to recommend to the chamber the passage of the following resolutions:

Resolved, That in the opinion of this chamber: the transfer of the United States life-saving service from the control of the Treasury Department to the Navy Department, as is proposed in Senator SARGENT's bill and its amendments, would be inexpedient, as not only the origin and history of the life-saving service, but also the general interests of our Government, justify and demand its subordination to the Treasury Department and its connection with the revenue-marine service.

Resolved, That this chamber recommend the passage of the bill introduced into the House by Hon. Mr. ROBERTS, and recommended by the Committee on Commerce to that body, as the provisions of that bill are well calculated to increase the efficiency of the life-saving service under its present control.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be attested and sent to both Houses of Congress by the secretary.

JAMES W. ELWELL,
SOLON HUMPHREYS,
GUSTAV SCHWAB,
WILLIAM H. GUION, Committee.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. TIPTON, for fifteen days; and

To Mr. NEAL, for ten days, on account of important business.

LOUISA SCHENCKLE.

On motion of Mr. ROBERTS, by unanimous consent, leave was given to withdraw from the files of the House papers in the case of Louisa Schenckle, there being no adverse report thereon.

BRIDGE AT ROCK ISLAND ARSENAL.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, inclosing a communication from the commandant of Rock Island arsenal, Illinois, showing the need of rules and regulations for the government of commerce over the bridge belonging to the United States at that point; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

LIFE-SAVING STATION ON GALVESTON ISLAND.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, inclosing a communication from the collector of customs at Galveston, Texas, recommending the early establishment of a life-saving station on the east end of Galveston Island; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

LIFE-SAVING STATION AT KENOSHA.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a petition from certain seamen and masters of vessels, urging the importance of establishing a life-saving station at Kenosha, Wisconsin; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

LIEUTENANT THOMAS BLAIR.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting proceedings of a court of inquiry convened at Fort Bayard, New Mexico, November, 1871, on the application of First Lieutenant Thomas Blair, First Infantry; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

CAPTAIN C. H. McNALLY.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the military record of Captain C. H. McNally, United States Army, retired; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

E. F. WENCKEBACK.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting report of the Adjutant-General on the bill (H. R. No. 3789) restoring E. F. Wenckebach, late Twentieth Infantry, to rank of captain, United States Army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

RECORDS OF LATE CONFEDERATE STATES.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting recommendation of an appropriation of $20,000 for the purpose of printing records of the late Confederate States; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

INDIAN SUPPLIES AT CROW AGENCY.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting copy of report of Captain Edward Ball, Second Cavalry, of an inspection and rejection of certain Indian supplies at Crow agency in February, 1876; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

OFFICE OF COMMISSARY GENERAL OF SUBSISTENCE.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting recommendation relative to the clerical force in the office of the Commissary-General of Subsistence; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BELL: Papers relating to the claim of A. B. Nichols—to the Committee of Claims.

By Mr. BOUCK: Memorial of the State Grange of Wisconsin, against any reduction of the tariff on wool—to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. CLARKE, of Kentucky: The petition of the publisher of the Bracken County (Kentucky) Chronicle, for the abolition of the duty on type—to the same committee.

By Mr. COVERT: The petition of Louisa Ehrler, for a pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. COX, of Ohio: The petition of citizens of Williams County, Ohio, against any reduction of the tariff on wools—to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina: A paper relating to the establishment of a post-route between Spartanburgh Court-House, Poolsville, Woodruffs, Scuffletown, and Laurens Court-House, South Carolina—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. FOSTER: Papers relating to the claim of I. J. Young Seamon, of Chicago, Illinois—to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. GIBSON: The petition of Theresa Senette and 11 others, of Louisiana, that their war claims be referred to the southern claims commission—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. GIDDINGS: The petition of D. C. Stone, mayor, and 102 others, including the president and many members of the Cotton Exchange, merchants, shippers, and pilots of the city of Galveston, Texas, against the transfer of the life-saving service to the Navy Department—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. GUNTER: Papers relating to the claim of W. A. Britton—to the Committee of Claims.

By Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, (by request:) The petition of Gabriel Smith, for a pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HUNTON: The petition of B. P. Noland and other citizens of London County, Virginia, requesting their Senators and Representatives in Congress to vote for the Texas Pacific Railroad bill—to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

By Mr. MCKINLEY: The petition of 170 citizens of Bethlehem Township, Stark County, Ohio, against any change in the tariff, and especially that no change be made upon the present duty upon wools and woollens—to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Also, the petition of Jonah Woodward, to be restored to the pension-rolls—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. STENGER: The petition of 42 citizens of Bane Forge, Pennsylvania, for the extension of the national credit to the completion of a great southern line to the Pacific—to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, April 10, 1878.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.
The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, presented resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, remonstrating against any law admitting foreign-built vessels to American registry; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented resolutions of the General Assembly of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the passage of the bill known as the Wood tariff bill; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the memorial of A. Stephens and 50 others, citizens of Phenixville, Pennsylvania, and vicinity; the memorial of John O. Geise and others, citizens of Reading, Pennsylvania; and the memorial of Charles J. Dalmass and others, citizens of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the passage of any act imposing a tax on incomes; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BUTLER presented a memorial of the General Assembly of South Carolina, in favor of restoring to the State of South Carolina possession of the Citadel Academy, in Charleston, and the granting of compensation for its occupation by the Federal troops during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WALLACE presented the petition of R. Spear and others, citizens of Bane Forge, Huntingdon County, Pennsylvania, praying Congress to extend the national credit to the completion of a great southern line to the Pacific Ocean; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads.

He also presented the petition of Samuel B. Hutchinson, of Manch Chunk, Pennsylvania, praying to be reimbursed certain money advanced by him to his ward, Mary A. Shurlock, on account of a pension which she was entitled to receive; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the passage of the tariff legislation now pending as it affects merchant-ship building; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. McPHERSON presented the petition of Elizabeth Ely, Carrie Price, R. W. Vonsdom, Joseph Smith, and others, citizens of Lambertville, New Jersey, praying for an amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting the several States from disfranchising United States citizens on account of sex; which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. MERRIMON. I present the petition of W. D. Wharton and others, composing the grand jury of the circuit courts of the United States at Greensborough, in the western district of North Carolina, representing the importance and the absolute necessity of erecting a suitable building there for the purpose of holding the United States courts, and praying Congress to make an appropriation for that purpose. I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MAXEY presented the petition of Marcos Radich, of Texas, praying compensation for the occupation of his property in the city of Brownsville, Texas, by the Army of the United States in the year 1865; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CONKLING presented the memorial of Robinson, Lord & Co. and others, business men of the city of New York, remonstrating against the proposed transfer of the life-saving service from the Treasury to the Navy Department; which was ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Doughty & Card, attorneys, &c., Lake City, Minnesota, praying payment of their claim for legal services, expenses, &c., incurred in behalf of the United States in the case of Parish vs. The United States, in the Court of Claims, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 1066) for the relief of Doughty & Card.

The bill was read twice by its title, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRUCE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of John G. Morgan, M. D., praying to be allowed arrears of pension, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1780) granting a pension to William S. Davis, late a private in Company E, Thirty-first Illinois Infantry Volunteers, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SARGENT, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1047) regulating the appointment of cadet midshipmen in the Naval Academy at Annapolis, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 602) for the relief of John R. Bond, late of the United States Navy, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 494) for the relief of Thornton A. Jenkins, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. HARRIS, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Thomas M. Simmons, praying compensation for the use and occupancy of the premises known as the Alabama press-yard No. 2 and the Crescent City press, in New Orleans, Louisiana, in the years 1863, 1864 and 1865, by United States troops, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 1067) for the relief of Thomas M. Simmons.

The bill was read twice by its title, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Captain Theodore Higgins, late of Company D, Twentieth Regiment Illinois Volunteers, praying to be allowed the pay of a captain of that company from April 10, 1863, to July 4, 1863, while acting as captain thereof, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of T. B. Kelly, of Du Quoin, Illinois, praying for compensation as a lieutenant in the marine service from the 4th of April, 1863, to September 15, 1864, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 1068) for the relief of T. B. Kelly.

The bill was read twice by its title, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 893) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to examine the evidence of payments made by the State of Missouri since April 17, 1866, to the officers and privates of the militia forces of said State, for military services actually performed in the suppression of the rebellion, in full concert and co-operation with the authorities of the United States, and subject to their orders, and to make report thereof to Congress, reported it without amendment.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 582) providing for the payment of counsel fees in Osage ceded land suits, reported it without amendment.

Mr. HEREFORD, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 496) for the relief of the legal representatives of R. W. Gibbs, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, the matter having been settled at the proper Department; which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

THADDEUS A. JONES.

Mr. ROLLINS, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom a resolution was referred to pay the engineer in charge of the elevator $100, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to pay to Thaddeus A. Jones, engineer in charge of the elevator, out of the contingent fund of the Senate, $100 as compensation for injuries received while engaged in repairs coming within his line of duty on February 10, 1877.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MORGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1069) for the relief of Emanuel Jones, a British subject; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WALLACE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1070) to define the extent of the lien of judgments obtained in the courts of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. BRUCE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Chair be authorized to appoint two additional members to serve on the Committee on Levees of the Mississippi River.

PENSIONS TO SOLDIERS OF MEXICAN WAR.

Mr. VOORHEES. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pensions be instructed to report a bill to this body making provision for placing the names of the surviving soldiers of the Mexican war, and of the widows of those who are deceased, upon the pension-rolls of the United States.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the resolution?

Mr. VOORHEES. I have offered the resolution for the purpose of saying that on the 30th of this month, after the morning hour, I shall ask leave of the Senate to call it up and submit some remarks upon it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie on the table in the mean time.

Mr. VOORHEES. Yes, sir.

ENLISTMENT OF COLORED SOLDIERS.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 178) to remove all restrictions now existing in regard to enlistments of the colored citizen in any arm of the United States Army. I have nothing further to say on this subject and I am quite willing that the bill should come to a vote.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask the Senator from Rhode Island if the Senator from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] who is not now in his seat did not move the indefinite postponement of this bill.

Mr. BURNSIDE. The RECORD will show. He did not. He said but for some reason—and I have forgotten what reason it was—he would move the indefinite postponement of the bill; but he did not make the motion. If the Senator from Missouri thinks, however, that he would rather have the Senator from Maine in his seat while the bill is being considered, I have no objection to waiting.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no objection to the present consideration of the bill. The Senator from Maine had an interest in it, and I thought he had made such a motion, though I cannot say positively that he did.

Mr. BURNSIDE. He did not make the motion.

Mr. ROLLINS. He suggested that he would make it, however.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I think there will be no further discussion on the subject, and we may as well take up the bill and vote upon it.

Mr. INGALLS. I think it would be hardly just in the absence of those who have debated this bill to proceed to its consideration now, and I shall, under the rule, object.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I am perfectly content to let the bill go over if there can be a general understanding that it shall be taken up and disposed of immediately after the close of the morning business to-morrow morning. If there be no objection on the part of the Senate to that arrangement, I will let the bill go over until that time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill goes over under the objection of the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS.]

TRESPASSES ON PROPERTY IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. MERRIMON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1412) to prevent depredations upon property in the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that every person who, in the District of Columbia, shall willfully, and without color of right, enter into any occupied or unoccupied dwelling-house or other building, the property of another, and cut, break, or tear from its place any gas-pipe, water-pipe, door-bell, or other fixture, or cut, break, or tear down any wall, or part of a wall, or door, with intent to cut, break, or tear from its place any pipe or fixture therein, shall, for the first offense, be fined not more than $200, and be imprisoned in the District jail not less than two months or more than one year, and for any subsequent offense shall be imprisoned in the penitentiary for not less than one year or more than three years.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to a third reading.

Mr. WHYTE. I should like the Secretary to report the first part of the bill again. I did not hear the exact language.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That every person who, in the District of Columbia, shall willfully, and without color of right, enter into any occupied or unoccupied dwelling-house—

Mr. WHYTE. That is all.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

JOHN W. DOUGLASS.

Mr. WALLACE. I move to take up the bill (S. No. 55) for the relief of John W. Douglass.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to John W. Douglass, late collector of internal revenue of the nineteenth district of Pennsylvania, $5,948.68, and also to credit him on his revenue account $916.98; these sums, amounting to $6,865.67, being the balance of which Douglass was robbed by a deputy collector, after deducting the amount realized from the sale of the deputy's property.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. MATTHEWS, it was Ordered, That William E. Morgan have leave to withdraw his petition and papers from the files of the Senate.

J. C. M'BURNEY.

Mr. HILL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1033) for the relief of J. C. McBurney.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the accounting officers of the Treasury, in the settlement of the accounts of J. C. McBurney, late collector of internal revenue for the second district of Georgia, to credit him with $3,895.07, on account of the embezzlement and defalcation of Michael O'Brien of that sum while acting as deputy to McBurney.

Mr. CONKLING. Is there a report?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir, there is a report made unanimously from the Committee on Claims. They have investigated the case fully. The bill is a mere matter of justice and ought to pass.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York desire the reading of the report?

Mr. CONKLING. No, sir.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I think we had better have the report read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will state to the Senator from Delaware that the report in the case is quite lengthy. Quite a number of the affidavits are incorporated in the report.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Perhaps the Senator from Oregon will make a brief statement of the case.

Mr. MITCHELL. The facts of the case are these: Mr. McBurney was collector of internal revenue in a certain district in the State of Georgia. He had been collector for a number of years. His deputy at a place some distance from his location became a defaulter, and it was necessary to remove him, which he did. It was during the collection of the cotton tax, and it became necessary that he should have a deputy at that point immediately; otherwise the Government would have lost a very large amount of revenue. The assessor of internal revenue at that place was recommended to Mr. McBurney very highly, as a competent man to be designated as his deputy at that point. Accordingly, under this recommendation, he designated Mr. O'Brien, who was the assessor at that point, for a few days only until such time as he could appoint a permanent deputy for the place. Mr. O'Brien acted as his deputy at the point designated for a few days only, a very short time. I do not know the exact time that he acted, but it was for a very few days, and during that time he embezzled some $3,000, or whatever the amount is, of Government money that he collected. Mr. McBurney proceeded against him at once, made complaint against him, put the case in the hands of the United States attorney, and he was arrested and bound over and indicted. The matter hung along for some time. Mr. McBurney made several visits to Savannah, I think, to attend the trial, with his witnesses, but for some reason or other the case was postponed, and continued from time to time. Finally, some years afterward, when Mr. Akerman was United States attorney for the district of Georgia a motion was made to quash the indictment, and the court held that the indictment was insufficient. That resulted in the final discharge of this man, O'Brien; but all the evidence goes to show that Mr. McBurney did everything in his power to secure the conviction of Mr. O'Brien. The evidence in the case shows very clearly that O'Brien embezzled this money and refused to account for it. On application at the Treasury Department the Department as a matter of course refused to allow Mr. McBurney for this sum in the settlement of his accounts, but deducted from his salary in the settlement of his accounts the sum that had been thus embezzled by O'Brien. I will state to the honorable Senator from Delaware that this is one of a class of cases that the Senate has very frequently passed upon. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. HILL] is doubtless familiar with the case.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to ask the Senator one question before he sits down. Is it true that the Senate has relieved collectors from defaults and embezzlements of their deputies?

Mr. MITCHELL. It is true, I will state to the Senator from New York, that the Senate and Congress have done that very thing in numerous cases which are cited, with the page and date, in the report of the committee in this case. If I had the report I could refer to them.

Mr. CONKLING. I have no doubt the Senator is correct.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not think myself it is a good practice. It is the opinion of the Committee on Claims that it is a practice that ought to be stopped some time; but to stop it just now on this particular case, when the case presented is a very hard one for Mr. McBurney, is another question.

Mr. CONKLING. I did not ask the question to interpose an objection to this immediate measure, but having asked the question, I venture to say that the practice, assuming it to exist, as it no doubt does, stands in glaring contrast with the fact that a few years ago there used to be published periodically all over the country a list of defalcations of internal-revenue officers. The total was very large, and it was made up in the main, except in respect to errors, of these very items, items unaccounted for by the deputies of the collectors. All the collectors whose deputies were thus derelict were published as defaulters year after year, and they stand now, I suppose, as defaulters.

Mr. MITCHELL. When really they have been relieved of the liability?

Mr. CONKLING. When some of them have been relieved. All those who have not been relieved, I suppose, are still going the rounds as defaulters.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to add to what the Senator from New York says that a very large item of this amount was made up by transferring the entire account of one collector to his successor. Uncollected taxes in the hands of a collector when he went out of office were transferred bodily to the account of his successor. There were very many instances where it stood upon the books that men were defaulters for one or two hundred thousand dollars when in point of fact the Government was their debtor. A very distinguished gentleman in Illinois, John H. Bryant, a brother of the editor of the New York Evening Post, was paraded in that table, near the head of it, as a defaulter for nearly $200,000, all made up by transferring the uncollected taxes of his predecessor over to him when he came into office. He came on here when that list was first published and demanded a settlement of his accounts and that a balance be struck before he would proceed another hour in the discharge of his duties, and it resulted that the Government was indebted to him. That is but one of very many cases in the same line.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I have no objection to this case, and it is not of this case that I am going to speak; but I noticed that the Senator from New York as well as the Senator from Oregon, and also the Senator from Massachusetts, have spoken of a certain list of defaulters, and one of the Senators said that many such cases have been relieved, but they are still before us as having been defaulters to the Treasury. I think those Senators are in error.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not think any Senator said that. If my friend will pardon me, I said that those who had been relieved had either been dropped or were still reported, I did not know which.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator from Oregon, as I understood him, in reply to the Senator from New York, said that many of them had been relieved.

Mr. MITCHELL. Probably. I did not pretend to state it as a fact; I said "very likely," or that is what I intended to say.

Mr. ALLISON. A great many of these collectors were not defaulters at all. I know that of three or four of those on the list to my knowledge.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That is not the question I am addressing myself to now. The Senator from New York said that a few years ago there were regular lists made to Congress annually, giving the names and amounts of those who were defaulters. It ought to be required. The law has required it for a great number of years; but since 1864 I believe, without authority from Congress or by disobedience of the law, the Departments, from some cause or other, have ceased to publish that list; but the law stands to-day as it did in 1864, up to which time it was published regularly. It may be recollected by the Senate several times I have called attention to that fact heretofore.

The Senator from Massachusetts says that some gentlemen were reported as defaulters who, in fact, owed nothing to the Government, that claims which were due it from somebody were transferred to his successor in office. That may have been the fact; but still somebody was in debt to the Government. If the collector to whom these claims had been transferred was not the defaulter, then his predecessor must have been.

Mr. CONKLING. Oh, no.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Oh, yes.

Mr. CONKLING. My friend will pardon me one moment. I beg to correct him about that. I can do it by one instance within my own personal knowledge. A collector in a district was changed. His book showed a considerable sum of uncollected taxes; but the law had exhausted itself in the effort to collect those taxes and it was impossible to collect them. They were charged to the successor. When these lists came to be made out, they figured among the items constituting a default. Now I ask the Senator from West Virginia is it just to say that in a case like that any officer was a defaulter. He may say the tax-payers were defaulters. Some of them were indigent, so that to use a common phrase they beat the Government on the execution; the taxes could not be collected; but nobody was a defaulter, officially speaking, in such a case as that.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. These reports referred to by the Senator from New York are made up under the law at the Treasury Department, if made at all, two or three years—I forget which now—after the amounts fall due, and the credits the officials are entitled to are allowed in the Department. Certainly they are not made up and charged against them for two or three years after they become due. That is the law. I know there are very many cases where collectors are unable to collect the assessments made against persons, sometimes erroneously. Those soon after they are discovered, within the time specified by law, are credited. There may be in many instances injustice done, certainly sometimes, but in other cases where there is injustice done to one party by publishing the names, justice is done probably to a hundred. There may be isolated cases that Senators have referred to; but I am talking of the list generally and of the collectors generally.

In the case before us, certainly somebody is a defaulter, and the Government only knows the collector. It does not know the deputy collector. There is to-day, in my judgment, probably $10,000,000 justly due the Government from collectors. I had in my hand a few days ago a list reported in 1871 under a resolution of the House of Representatives asking for the indebtedness of collectors then out of office, and that list amounts to over $20,000,000. It was published three years after the time specified, when the indebtedness ought to have been paid.

Mr. MITCHELL. Does the Senator know now that no part of that amount was made up of the very amounts which Congress had relieved against?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. How is that?

Mr. MITCHELL. Does the Senator know whether any part of that amount was made up of items against which Congress had relieved?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Would the Secretary of the Treasury make out the list?

Mr. MITCHELL. I am not asking what the Secretary of the Treasury would do. I ask the Senator whether he knows that is so.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Of course I do not know, but I must take the facts as they come to me.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President—

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. One at a time. Let me answer the Senator from Oregon, and then I will with pleasure listen to the Senator from Massachusetts. The Senator from Oregon very well knows that when an act passes Congress relieving anybody it goes to the Department where it belongs, is there entered, there taken notice of, and the relief, if it has been given, of course is entered to the party's credit; and unless there is some informality—

Mr. HILL. I hope the Senator will allow this bill to go through.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I am not troubling the Senator's bill.

Mr. HILL. I know that; but this debate delays it.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Only a word, and then I will not trouble the Senator further. I expect this claim is meritorious. But now the Senator from Massachusetts wants to ask a question.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator has stated that in 1871 there was some communication setting forth the number of defaulters on money actually in the hands of collectors, from which he says he has no doubt—

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Let me correct the Senator. I did not say money actually in the hands of collectors. I said money due the Government from collectors or from somebody else.

Mr. DAWES. I do not understand the distinction between money actually in the hands of collectors and money due the Government from collectors, but perhaps the Senator from West Virginia may see a distinction which has not occurred to me. From that paper he said he made the statement that he had no doubt there was between ten and twenty millions of money in the hands of collectors. I want to know from the Senator if it is not within his knowledge that the Secretary of the Treasury made a communication to Congress saying that that statement in that report was an entire error.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. No, I do not know that to be so. On the contrary, I think it very queer that—

Mr. DAWES. I regret exceedingly that it escaped the Senator's attention, because that was a communication to which allusion has been made in debate here. A report was made up by a clerk in one of the Departments assuming that whatever of uncollected taxes was charged was from one collector to another as he went out of office, treating it as so much money in the hands of the collector, and that sum was reported here. Afterward a report, from which the statements of the Senator from New York and others have been made to-day, was sent here in an official form by the Secretary of the Treasury in explanation of that very document to which the Senator from West Virginia alludes. While there is no doubt that there are defaulters under the Government, always have been, and always will be, and while eternal vigilance and eternal hunt after them is the only way to secure the Government as far as possible against them, still it is not worth while for the Senator from West Virginia to be laboring under such a misapprehension as that which he seems to be laboring under when the official documents within his reach would set him right.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Mr. President—

Mr. MITCHELL. Allow me a moment. The question now being discussed can be discussed just as well on some other matter. I hope it will not be permitted to embarrass the passage of this bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I have listened to my friends on both sides. I have sat here for several days very patiently; I do not occupy the floor very often, but it appears to me that Senators want to get rid of this question or they would not object to its being discussed. I do not see why my friends all around here are so anxious to get rid of this matter. Why do you not want the truth to come out?

Mr. MITCHELL. For one I am not anxious to get rid of the subject. I am anxious to pass this bill because I think it is a very meritorious bill, but the question we are discussing now has no reference whatever to the pending measure. That is the only objection I make.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I ask my friend whether this is not the very same character of claims that are involved in the question I was discussing. The bill is to relieve a deputy of a collector of internal revenue and that is the subject we are talking on. What is more legitimate to it. I know nothing of this particular case and I am not addressing myself to it. I hope my friend from Georgia, who I see is on his feet, will be quiet. I shall be through before the morning hour is out, and he will have time to pass his bill.

The Senator from Massachusetts appears to think that I ought to know that these are errors in the report to which I alluded. Does the Senator from Massachusetts say, or does he mean to have the Senate understand, that an erroneous document was printed by the authority of Congress after being called for at the request of a member, passed the House, and sent to the House under the official signature of the Secretary of the Treasury? Does that contain entries that are not true? If so, that is a strange statement. This pamphlet gives the name, the date, the State, the district, of each party named, and is signed by Secretary Boutwell, and it winds up by saying that there are now $20,783,000 due by internal-revenue collectors alone, not those in office but those out of office at that time and whose accounts ought to have been settled if they had not been.

The Senator from Massachusetts says there was a subsequent statement sent here. True there was a statement sent here; and what became of that statement? It was refused by the Senate to be printed, though the law required that the information should go to the country; yet that side of the Chamber, my recollection is, declined to have it printed, and they I suppose placed it in the Secretary's office or somewhere else here, and in fact the information never was communicated to Congress.

Mr. DAWES. The paper the Senator has in his hand is dated, I believe, in 1871.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Yes.

Mr. DAWES. I have not the name of the member of the House at whose request that was printed; but I have in mind (for I was not in this body at the time) the whole matter, and the matter to which the Senator now refers was something that transpired in this body of which I am entirely ignorant. I referred to a communication made to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury immediately upon that statement having been paraded to the country, and the use was being made of it which the Senator from West Virginia tries at this late day, six or seven years afterward, to repeat.

I understand from the Senator from New York that the very paper to which I allude had the same treatment here in this body that it had in the House of Representatives. It was very fully discussed and printed by order of the House of Representatives, spread upon the records of the country, and debated at full length. I understand the same treatment was had in this body.

Now the Senator gathers up that old document, which has been explained and put before the country, the true meaning set before the country five or six years ago, and undertakes to galvanize it into life in this way, and the Senator says that he has no doubt there are from ten to twenty millions of money due to-day from collectors. I venture to say that in the experience of this Government, as compared with that of any other government in the whole world, in view of the amount of money collected by its officials within the last fifteen years, there is no record that will compare so favorably as that of this country as to the percentage of money that has been lost.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I yielded for a question, not for a speech.

Mr. DAWES. I beg pardon.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator from Massachusetts asked me to yield for a question, and now he makes a speech.

Mr. DAWES. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That will not do, to refer to some other government when we have enough here before us. The question now pending is whether or not this document is true. The Senator from Massachusetts has said that it was not true and that it was so published, and that a report was sent to Congress stating it was not true. I have never seen such a report. On the contrary, since this report was published in 1871 a report which my friend from Maryland [Mr. WHYTE] has in his hand now says there are $5,000,000 additional of defalcations to the Government from 1869 up to 1876. There are $5,000,000 additional. Instead of growing less, they are growing worse and more of them.

Mr. DAWES. I do not hear the Senator. What does he say?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator says he cannot hear me. I imagined that I was talking too loud.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator designate one case now?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. What does the Senator mean by "one case?"

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator says that there have been $5,000,000 additional of defalcations reported within a certain specified time. Now I want the Senator from West Virginia to designate any one particular case and the amount.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Mr. President, I am not naming individuals. Here is a whole pamphlet full of names. If the Senator wants it, let him send to the document-room and get it. There are $20,000,000 in amount of them. I do not want to pick out men from his State, or any other State. The Senator can get the information if he wants it.

Mr. DAWES. May I have that document?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Certainly; I will hand it to the Senator. If the Senator will look at Secretary Bristow's report of June 16, 1876, he will find a great many names; some in his own State if I am not mistaken. However, I am not naming individuals. The names and the dates and the amounts are all in the pamphlet, and if the Senator wishes he can look upon them and read them.

Mr. MITCHELL. If the Senator says that any collector of internal revenue in my State is a defaulter, he is mistaken; that is all.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Perhaps I am not.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am very confident the Senator is.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Even if I were, it has no bearing on the general question. But my friend from Massachusetts now has the paper, and I cannot tell whether the Senator from Oregon is right or wrong. My friend from Georgia is very earnest about this bill; I see he is rising again.

Mr. HILL. The morning hour is nearly out.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Let me say to my friends on the other side of the Chamber, if they want to do right and what the law requires, let them have the statement published annually as the law requires, and then there would be no question about these defaults. As I said, the paper that I held before me, the last general statement that was published, contained defalcations amounting to $20,000,000, and that statement is signed by the Secretary of the Treasury, formerly my worthy friend's colleague on this floor. Whether or not he has made a false statement here, is a question between the Senator now and the ex-Senator who sent the statement here.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President—

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I am done.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator from Georgia will allow me, the Senator from West Virginia has been kind enough to show me the paper. It is the identical paper to which I referred. In it I find the very case I cited, where a man was charged with having defaulted for $450,000 when it appeared that the statement arose merely from the form in which a clerk in the Treasury Department kept the books, by charging to him the uncollected taxes that were assessed under a former collector. At that very moment the Government was a debtor to that very collector. All that has been officially presented to Congress and published and is in the documents to-day. I regret exceedingly—

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator to yield to me a moment.

Mr. DAWES. I wish merely to add that I regret exceedingly that this has escaped for so long a time the vigilant search of the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. HILL. I appeal to Senators to let us act on the bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I will take occasion to show the truth of what I have said hereafter. I give way now to my friend from Georgia.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I desire to say that this is a case that everybody admits is meritorious who has ever seen or heard of it. Now, I do not think that gentlemen ought to murder a good case by going into debate on a general question. If any Senator doubts the merits of this case, I can satisfy him in three minutes.

Mr. ALLISON. I only wish to occupy one minute. I merely want to call the attention of the honorable Senator from West Virginia to the fact that the report alluded to by him, made by Secretary Bristow in 1876, covering the defalcations of collectors of internal revenue, shows that the defalcations on that account only amounted to $33,000 from 1869 to 1876.

Mr. DAWES. That includes the time covered by this other document, which has been referred to.

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly it includes that great document covering $20,000,000! It happens to be within my knowledge that many of the men who are reported there—

Mr. HILL. The Senator asked one minute; I think he has spoken two. I gave way for one minute.

Mr. ALLISON. I beg pardon of the Senator. I did not know that he was holding the floor.

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. ALLISON. I will wait until the Senator has finished his remarks.

Mr. HILL. I was going on to say and did say that if any Senator doubts the merits of this case, I can state them very briefly. The morning hour is nearly out. The bill is unanimously reported by a committee of the Senate. It was unanimously reported by a committee of the House on a former occasion. I know personally some of the facts, and it is a hard case. I rarely vote for these cases. I believe this is the second time I have ever consented to vote for such relief; but this is a case fully meritorious in all respects, and the amount is small, and this man ought to be relieved. I trust the Senate will pass the bill.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, as a member of the committee reporting this bill, I desire to say that if Congress has adopted the policy, or if it be a proper policy for Congress to adopt to relieve collectors for the defaults of their deputies, this is as meritorious a case of that character, I suppose, as any other. But, believing, as I do, that it is not a proper policy, I could not assent myself to the reporting of this bill; nor can I vote for it in the Senate; not for any reason peculiar to this case, but because I believe that the policy of relieving collectors for the defaults of their deputies is an improper and a dangerous policy. For that reason I shall vote against this and all other cases of this character. I know of no reason why this is not as meritorious as any other case of this character.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I cannot vote for this bill. I do not know anything about Mr. McBurney. He may be a gentleman of the very highest character and he may have lost every dollar which he claims was embezzled by his deputy, but the committee's report, which I hold in my hand, shows that he was a collector of internal revenue in the State of Georgia from 1865 to 1869; and in 1867 he appointed a man by the name of O'Brien his deputy. Now, what was his duty to himself? Certainly to have taken an obligation from his deputy, with proper security. That was the custom and that was the practice among the collectors of internal revenue throughout the country. I remember that I once filed a petition in behalf of the sureties of a deputy collector to relieve them from the defalcation of their principal on a bond which he had executed and given security to the collector of internal revenue. There had been a defalcation for over $12,000; but the collector of internal revenue very wisely took his bond and took ample security, and I was unsuccessful in my effort to get relief for the sureties of the deputy collector who had to fork over and pay to the collector.

Why did not Mr. McBurney take the precaution when he appointed O'Brien deputy to take from him a bond sufficient to indemnify himself? Should his negligence in that respect now relieve him and compel the public Treasury of this country to pay out nearly $4,000 which he might by proper diligence on his part have secured to himself?

Mr. MITCHELL. Allow me a moment. This man was designated but a very few days, and he was a public officer. He was the assessor, and was simply designated until such time as Mr. McBurney could get a man to take the place.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I understand that, but he was charged by the laws of this land with collecting the internal revenues in his district. He had given bond, I suppose, to do that thing, and it was his duty not to intrust the collection of a single dollar of those revenues to any person who was irresponsible. He ought to have protected himself by a bond with security. If he failed to do so it was his own fault, and not the fault of the Government. One other fact—

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. MITCHELL. I hope this matter will be continued.

Mr. HARRIS. I hope we shall have unanimous consent to complete the consideration of the bill.

Mr. HILL. I trust that will be done.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the completion of this bill at this time? The Chair hears none. The bill remains before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, there is one very significant fact connected with the whole transaction as detailed in this report. The defalcation took place in 1867, and yet that fact was not communicated to the Secretary of the Treasury or to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue until after this gentleman was out of office in 1869. He made no complaint of the action of his deputy. He did not go to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and state to him that there had been a defalcation by this man O'Brien, and seek to get relief, and never until they came to the final adjustment of his accounts after he was out of office, was it brought to the knowledge of the Government or its officials that there had been this defalcation.

Mr. MITCHELL. Why, Mr. President, I would inquire of the Senator of what manner of use was it for the collector to apply to the Treasury Department for relief? No relief could be afforded him there. All he could do was this: when he came to settle his accounts he was short that much; he explained the matter, and the amount was taken out of the allowance for his salary. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue could grant no relief.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I suppose there was no power in the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to make an allowance; I judge that to be the case; and perhaps that may have been the reason why Mr. McBurney did not communicate the fact to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue; but there is no question of this fact, that O'Brien was his appointee. There is no question of this fact, that he could have protected himself if he had been so inclined by a bond, with sureties, from his deputy. There is no doubt about this fact also, that if Mr. O'Brien embezzled the money it was an embezzlement by a man who was selected as his deputy by Mr. McBurney. And can it now, in conscience and equity and justice, be required of the Government that the Government shall refund money which has been lost by the very act of Mr. McBurney in appointing an improper man and in not taking proper security for the faithful performance of his duty?

Sir, if we sanction claims of this character, I do not know how the public Treasury is to be supplied with funds to pay them all. Mr. McBurney may be a very meritorious man; he may have lost every dollar of this money; but he does not come here with a case that entitles him to relief, in my judgment, and therefore I cannot vote for the bill.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I wish to state one fact which I think is a sufficient answer to the Senator from Delaware. This occurred in 1867. The deputy collector at that place, Hawkinsville, had defaulted and his removal was asked of the Secretary of the Treasury. It was at a period of time when cotton was being shipped and the cotton tax was being collected. Hawkinsville was a shipping point for cotton, whence cotton was being constantly shipped, and it was necessary to have a man there at once to collect the tax. It was difficult to get men to give the bonds and take the oath required by the law at that time. The collector was compelled to have a man there immediately. He took this man O'Brien because he was already the assessor for that district and was recommended to him. He took O'Brien to collect the cotton tax, which would otherwise have been lost, until he could get a proper deputy who would give the bond and take the oath to which the Senator referred. He therefore selected O'Brien to collect the cotton tax for a few days until he could get a proper man there. It was a case of necessity. He was compelled to act on the spur of the moment. It was during those few days that this man O'Brien committed this embezzlement. So the ordinary rule that my friend the Senator from Delaware refers to does not apply. There was an emergency in this case, and if my friend knew the condition of things which existed down there then he would believe that this collector did the very best he possibly could under the circumstances.

Again, after this default occurred the collector employed lawyers himself to collect the debt civilly, by civil process, and the lawyers undertook to sue this man O'Brien who had committed the default; but the lawyers were unable to collect it because of the insufficiency of his property to pay. At that time, by the constitution then being adopted and before the civil suit was brought to an end, a large homestead exemption was established for that country by the new constitution; and it rendered it impossible to make this man respond to the loss civilly. Then Mr. McBurney (showing his entire vigilance) went to Savannah and presented the case to the courts and had O'Brien indicted, and for several terms was down there doing his best to have the matter tried. I am not going to state all the reasons why he did not succeed; but I do say that the failure to bring the prosecution to trial was not the fault of Mr. McBurney.

Mr. MITCHELL. It was the fault of the district attorney.

Mr. HILL. It certainly was the fault of the district attorney. The district attorney is a personal friend of mine and I do not like to speak of him; but I know the difficulty. This man did his best, was at term after term of the court with his witnesses from the city of Macon, nearly two hundred miles, striving to get O'Brien prosecuted; and when finally he did succeed in bringing O'Brien to trial the court ordered an acquittal because of a defect in the indictment, a mere technical defect for which Mr. McBurney was not responsible. He did everything that man could do. He was compelled to make the appointment in the first place during an emergency and for a few days until he could get a proper man, or see the Government lose its revenue. He then prosecuted him civilly and failed. He prosecuted criminally and failed. He has done everything he could and I do think this is a case where the man ought to be relieved, and many cases have occurred of not half the merit where relief has been granted. The precedent has been established. The report cites the case of a collector of customs at Philadelphia who on account of an embezzlement by a deputy of his was reimbursed $62,000, and there are a great many other cases which are referred to in the report.

I have said that I do not as a rule approve of these applications; but there are exceptions to all rules. This is a case where the man has shown clean hands. He collected $7,000,000 of revenue taxes during the time he was collector for the second district of Georgia, and perhaps at as small an expense as can be found on the record, and this is the only dollar ever missing. He shows where every dollar went, and he exhausted his means, at his own expense, to bring the man to justice, and failed not because of himself but because of the inefficiency of other Government employes. I say, therefore, that his bill ought to pass.

Mr. ALLISON. When the Senator from Georgia put me down in order to talk himself, I was about to say—

Mr. HILL. I beg the Senator's pardon. I thought he was talking on another subject.

Mr. ALLISON. I was endeavoring to reach the exact subject under consideration.

Mr. HILL. Ah, well. I beg pardon.

Mr. ALLISON. I made some statement with reference to the report made in 1871, which has been again brought up here. I ventured to do so for the reason that over and over again, when that report has been alluded to as showing defalcations of internal-revenue collectors, it has been shown here and elsewhere to be false. Take this very case of McBurney. On the report of 1871 he is shown to be a defaulter in the sum of $94,000, whereas the bill on your table for his relief only shows a deficit of some $3,000. Yet the Senator from West Virginia comes in here with this old report and endeavors to make it an absolute statement with reference to defalcations of internal-revenue collectors. I happened to be in Congress in the other House when the report was made. I was amazed at the report, and went to the proper office to make inquiry with reference to the collectors in my own State. It contains a list of nine collectors in my own State with an aggregate defalcation of over $100,000, and yet on inquiry at the office of Internal Revenue I found that the accounts of those collectors had not been settled at all, and with a single exception every one of the collectors named in the list settled his accounts with a balance in his own favor against the Government of the United States, and that collector was only indebted to the Government some $500 or $600, because of a difference between him and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue with reference to the amount to be paid to a deputy. Still we are told now, seven or eight years afterward, that these were cases of absolute defalcation of internal-revenue collectors! As I said before, this constituent of my friend from Georgia is put down as a defaulter for $94,000, and yet this bill shows that he was only indebted to the Government on his accounts some $3,000.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. How do you know he did not pay the balance within the seven years?

Mr. ALLISON. I only know from the statement made by the Senator from Georgia that he was a most reputable man and collected $7,000,000.

Mr. HILL. He collected $7,000,000 at less than 1 per cent. expense to the Government, and accounted for every dollar of it except this $3,000.

Mr. MITCHELL. He collected $7,331,794.91.

Mr. ALLISON. And yet he appears as a defaulter in this list for $94,000.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue says his accounts are "now closed on the books of the Department" by taking out of the amount of his allowance for salary the amount of the defalcation of O'Brien, which squared all his accounts, and he was discharged.

Mr. ALLISON. I only judge of the other cases from the cases in my own State, which I took occasion to examine after seeing this publication. The difficulty arose from the fact that during those years these accounts of collectors could not be settled rapidly. They were two or three years behind in the settlement of collectors' accounts in the Third Auditor's Office.

But even if all that were true, I submit to the Senator from West Virginia that it is not a large defalcation when you take into account the millions of dollars that were collected under the internal-revenue laws from 1863 to 1869, and when you take into account the further fact that for all these defalcations the Government of the United States took what was supposed to be at the time absolute security from the collectors and their deputies.

Mr. MORRILL. Allow me to ask the Senator from Iowa if it is not true that taking any one point of time and reporting as to the state of facts between the Government and the collectors then it will always show a balance due uncollected from almost every collector throughout the United States; and such balances have been made to figure as defalcations because the collectors had not yet collected the taxes due from various parties.

Mr. ALLISON. That is true from the condition of the law itself. The moment a tax is assessable it is charged to the collector as money, and he must account for it either as money or must give some reason why it could not be collected; and therefore these large sums were added to the collectors' accounts when in fact there were but small balances due from the collectors.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Mr. President, a word in reply to the Senator from Iowa. He refers to this particular case now before the Senate and says that the claimant appears to ask relief here for $3,000 when the report of the Treasury Department made February 18, 1871, says his defalcation was $94,000. That is entirely consistent. Then it might have been $94,000, and it may be to-day $3,000 or nothing.

Mr. ALLISON. Allow me a moment. I also added the statement of the honorable Senator from Georgia that this man was a reputable man and kept his accounts straight all the time.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That has nothing to do with it in the world. This gentleman may have been one of the most upright men in Georgia, and there are a great many very upright men there, and that is the very reason, probably, why he settled his accounts so as to reduce the deficit to $3,000. Does the Senator know he has not paid the other $90,000?

Mr. MITCHELL. Here is what the Commissioner of Internal Revenue says:

While he held the office of collector—

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. My friend is very impatient; he cannot let me talk one minute without stopping me.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Commissioner says:

While he held the office of collector his reports appear to have been properly and promptly rendered, and the affairs of his office properly conducted.

That is what the Commissioner of Internal Revenue says.

Mr. McCREERY. I should like to inquire what length of time the Senator having this bill in charge proposes to occupy?

Mr. HILL. I am ready for a vote now; I do not see any trouble in voting now.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I shall conclude within five minutes, if I am allowed to go on.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator from West Virginia allow me to ask one question, he is so good-natured in yielding? I should like to know from him, as he has investigated this matter, whether upon the evidence before him he believes that this claimant was at that time a defaulter for $94,000?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I have no information on this particular claim, not one iota.

Mr. CONKLING. But the Senator finds his name in that list as a defaulter for $94,000; I beg to inquire whether that or such information as he has leads him to believe that this claimant was a defaulter for $94,000?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. All I can answer is to say that the document which is signed by the Secretary of the Treasury says so; that is all I know about it, and that should be conclusive I think on the Senator from New York.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator believes it himself?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The document says so. The Secretary sent it to Congress as a fact; it is an official report.

It is perfectly consistent that this gentleman owed at that time $94,000, and I take it the then Secretary of the Treasury would not have reported so if it was not so, and since then he may have settled his accounts. Here he is asking relief for his deputy, not for himself. For aught any Senator knows there may be part of this claim now against the principal in the Treasury Department. There is no information here that it is not so; but let us dismiss that; I do not want to attack this gentleman.

Mr. MITCHELL. I must correct the Senator.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I have already three Senators to answer, and the Senator himself has put me one question.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator has already put one question that I should like to answer.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator does not wish to misrepresent this case. Certainly I will not interrupt the Senator if he does not desire to be interrupted.

I understood the Senator from West Virginia to say that there was no evidence here to the contrary but that this man McBurney was chargeable with this amount at the Department. There is evidence here to the contrary in the letter of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, which says that he has closed up his accounts, that when he put in his final account there was a balance due from him for O'Brien's defalcation, and that the Department took it out of his compensation and squared the account.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I promised the Senator from Kentucky that I would stop in less than five minutes. My friends all around me take up the most of my time.

Mr. President, this is a question that ought to be discussed at some future time, I have no doubt, when the Senate has full opportunity to do it. I know nothing about this particular claim, but I will say to Senators now that I will notice what they have said, and at some future time this matter will be renewed. But I want to say now, in conclusion, that the law requires that the First Comptroller, under the supervision of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall report annually, which report shall be made during the first week of the session of Congress, a list of the defaulters whose defalcations have stood more than three years on the books. The report in the document I have here, made in 1871, says under that state of things there were more than $20,000,000 due, and among the names on the list this very name appears. A moment ago the Senator from Oregon said to me that there was nobody in his State on this list, and I asked him if he was sure of that.

Mr. MITCHELL. I said no such thing. The Senator from West Virginia said that unless he was mistaken there were collectors of internal revenue in my own State who were defaulters.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That document says there is.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not care what the document says. I venture the expression of the opinion that there is no collector of internal revenue in my State who is to-day a defaulter to the Government.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. They may have paid, and probably they have. There certainly were such when that document was issued. I hope they may have paid up since. They may have done so. This document speaks of collectors out of office, not in office. There may have been as many more in office at that time who were termed defaulters by the Secretary of the Treasury. I know not whether that was so or not.

Now, one word as to the printing of the document that came here last year under a resolution offered by me. My recollection is that the Committee on Printing of the Senate reported against having it printed, and it was sent to the Secretary's office, and if it has ever been printed I have not seen it. I do not think it ever has been printed.

Now, as my friend from Georgia is anxious about this bill and my friend from Kentucky is anxious for the bankrupt-repeal bill, I will say no more.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President—

Mr. HILL. I hope the Senator from California will let us vote.

Mr. SARGENT. I am aware of the great patience of my friend, and I will not tax it much.

Mr. HILL. That has been the case for the last hour.

Mr. SARGENT. I have no doubt the Senate will have as much patience as my friend and give him a chance to pass the bill. I think the bill ought to pass and ought to have a chance to pass.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President—

Mr. SARGENT. Now if the Senator will only let me alone, we shall get through a great deal sooner.

Mr. McCREERY. But where are my rights? [Laughter.]

Mr. SARGENT. Here is another anxious Senator. [Laughter.] I ask my friend from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] to read the portion of the report which states that the persons named therein are defaulters? That is a very serious term, and amounts to the word "thief." I do not find that this document says they are defaulters, but it says there are certain balances due from collectors of internal revenue not now in office; and this book shows what those lists are and explains just what is meant by the terms used. It contains an extract from a previous report of May 2, 1870, which Mr. Taylor, the Comptroller, says was made in answer to a similar resolution, and I wish to read this extract as a full reply and all that is necessary to show that these persons were not intended to be treated as defaulters or criminals in any degree:

The balances and payments as shown by this statement are those which appear by accounts adjusted; but in many of them, I have no doubt, the balances will wholly, or in part, disappear when further reports and vouchers shall have been transmitted to the Auditor and been acted upon. In a large proportion of the cases the balances against collectors consist of tax-lists charged to them, but turned over to their successors in office. Under the existing law the accounting officers cannot credit an outgoing collector with lists so turned over, unless the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall certify that such outgoing collector has used due diligence. In the absence of such certificate the accounting officers cannot credit collectors with taxes turned over to their successors, and in almost every case a collector must appear to be in arrears, though nothing be due from him, until the required certificate shall have been supplied.

That is the explanation of the whole list; in a multitude of cases there was nothing due from the officers at all; their accounts were simply hung up on a technicality; and I have no doubt that was the case with the $94,000 charged against the gentleman whose claim is now pending before the Senate for relief.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, as a member of the Committee on Claims, I dissented from this report at the time it was made, but did not deem it necessary to make an adverse minority report. I cannot sustain this bill. My reasons will be stated very briefly.

This collector appointed a deputy in 1867. That deputy, it is claimed now, became a defaulter. By reason of that default he incurred a penal liability and a civil liability. Great stress is put upon the fact that the collector attempted to enforce the penal liability against this officer while he totally neglected to enforce the civil liability. The civil liability was in his own hands, was in his own power. He could have enforced that civil liability against this deputy collector; and in the report it is stated that he took a due-bill from this deputy collector, and it is stated as the opinion of this collector himself that if the United States had brought an action there was property purchased with this money which was the reason of the default, as the collector asserted, real estate, out of which the money could have been made. If the United States could have proceeded civilly and made it, this collector could have done it.

Another objection—

Mr. HILL. I will state to my friend that I believe that fact was not before the committee, but the fact was that he did pursue the civil liability until it was found ineffectual.

Mr. COCKRELL. That was not before the committee, and that is not in the report.

Mr. HILL. That is the fact, and he employed lawyers that I know, very able lawyers, for that purpose—Lochrane and Shorter.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I call the attention of the Senator from Georgia to the fact that he did not take this obligation from the defaulting deputy until June 4, 1868. The defalcation occurred the year previous, and he failed to take the obligation for a whole year.

Mr. HILL. He tried to collect the money as soon as he found it out. It was not necessary to take that obligation at all at any time. It was unnecessary on his part; but he was trying to get the evidence of that defalcation; he did employ Lochrane and Shorter to collect this debt. I have the statement of Judge Lochrane who was here himself a few days ago.

Mr. MITCHELL. I hold in my hand a letter from Judge Lochrane, late chief-justice of the State of Georgia, I believe.

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir; a very able lawyer.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think it answers the objection made by the honorable Senator from Missouri.

WASHINGTON, April 9, 1878.

DEAR SIR: In response to your inquiry, my recollection is that at the time Mr. O'Brien failed to turn over money in his hands to you as collector of internal-revenue, you came to my office at Macon, Georgia, and consulted me what could be done to recover the money from him; and Mr. Shorter, a young lawyer in my office, was sent to Pulaski County to find out what, if any, property O'Brien had which might be made subject to the claim. He went with instructions to examine the records as to title, taxes, &c.; and my recollection is that Shorter reported upon examination nothing could be made out of him on civil suit or proceedings, and I advised you to go to Savannah and see the district attorney about prosecuting him, which you did, as I afterward met you in Savannah upon this matter.

Respectfully,

JAMES C. MCBURNEY, Esq.

O. A. LOCHRANE.

Mr. COCKRELL. It does not answer the charge which I make, and it seems very strange that those facts were not embodied in the report of the committee as to the bringing of a civil suit. I stated that no civil action had been brought. The letter read by the Senator from Oregon confirms that statement; the lawyers made investigation, but brought no civil suit because they say there was nothing out of which the money could be made; and yet the collector states that if the United States had prosecuted the deputy diligently they could have made the amount. There is an inconsistency, to say the least, in the report.

Mr. HILL. The meaning there is that this man O'Brien if he had been convicted of embezzlement perhaps would have had the money made up by his friends rather than have been sent to the penitentiary. I suppose that is what it means. His lawyers advised him that the only way to get the money was by a criminal prosecution, and he did resort to a criminal prosecution, and that failed through the inefficiency alone of the district attorney.

Mr. COCKRELL. My other objection to this bill was that this collector of internal revenue never reported this default until 1869, two years after it had occurred, when he applied to the Treasury Department for a settlement of his accounts, and there was a balance found against him of $3,785.40.

Mr. HILL. He did not ask for that or report the facts sooner, because in the mean time he was doing his very best to collect the amount.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from West Virginia made it $94,000 according to the report he had.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator from West Virginia did not. The Senator from Iowa said so, not the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will not detain the Senate long. I have but one point to make. If gentlemen who want to pass this bill would simply wait for the objections to be made to it they would have been made long ago.

Mr. MCCREERY. I must demand the regular order.

THE VICE-PRESIDENT. The regular order is the unfinished business.

Mr. HILL. I hope the Senator from Kentucky will withdraw his call.

Mr. MCCREERY. If the vote can be taken in five minutes, I will give way again.

Mr. MITCHELL. We can certainly do that.

Mr. HILL. I think so.

Mr. MCCREERY. Very well.

Mr. COCKRELL. As I stated, the other objection to this bill is that this collector never reported this default until 1869, two years after it occurred. Then it was that he made his report after the close of his term of office. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue says:

After the close of his term of office it was ascertained that of the amounts reported collected by him there remained a balance unaccounted of $3,785.40, and, in reply to a letter from this office upon the subject, he represented that the amount in question was the amount of a defalcation of one of his deputies, Michael O'Brien.

I think it is gross negligence when an officer of the United States charged with the collection of these funds fails, neglects to report a default to the head of the Treasury Department to which he made his monthly reports, for two long years after it occurred.

Mr. MITCHELL. Has my friend any doubt about the facts of this matter being just as represented in the report, that he lost this money by this defalcation? There cannot be any question about that. Then what difference does it make whether he reported it to the Treasury or not?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. In the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Claims, I desire to say a word in regard to this claim. I was present in the committee at the time it was considered by the committee and was opposed to recommending the passage of the bill, and without my vote an adverse report would have been made on the bill. I stated, and it so appears on the records of the committee, that for the purpose of bringing the claim before the Senate I was willing to vote in favor of it, but stating at the same time that I would not vote for the bill when it came before the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. I am surprised by the statement of the Senator from Wisconsin, a member of the Committee on Claims, for I thought some Senator stated that this was a unanimous report from that committee—

Mr. HILL. I thought it was.

Mr. CONKLING. I arose, however, for the purpose—

Mr. HILL. If I stated it was a unanimous report, that was my opinion. There was no minority report.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. There was none.

Mr. CONKLING. I did not remember which Senator stated it.

Mr. HILL. That was my information.

Mr. CONKLING. I did not mean to take exception to the propriety of the statement. I rose, however, for another purpose. The claimant in question, who has been canvassed here this morning perhaps somewhat unceremoniously, has taken the trouble to say to me in writing what I think I ought to read to the Senate. He says:

At the time I went out of office I had only about $9,000 of unsettled accounts. The Government then owed me over $10,000 on account of compensation which was afterward paid to me, less the $3,895.07 which was deducted and kept.

That is the amount represented in this bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. Three thousand seven hundred and eighty-five dollars and forty cents.

Mr. CONKLING. Three thousand eight hundred and ninety-five dollars and seven cents appears here, but it is identified by the context as the same item. I read this in justice to this claimant, and I feel bound to say (although I observe that the report of the committee refers to other cases the facts of which have not been stated in which collectors were relieved) that I do not see any more than the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS,] or the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] seems able to see, the principle on which we relieve a man from the act of his agent, not our agent, but his agent.

What does he give bond for? Manifestly this very case, just as a sheriff gives his bond, becomes responsible not alone for what he does individually, but for what is done by his deputies because they are his deputies, his agents, and therefore he is responsible for them. If a burglar breaks into a post-office or a depository and steals stamps, money, or valuables, I can see, as I think the Senate will see, a distinction between that case and this. But when a bonded officer and his sureties undertake to be responsible for specific things, and those things occur, I must say that I cannot comprehend the principle on which the Senate has based, if it has done so heretofore, precedents like those referred to by the committee. It seems to me very extraordinary that a bonded officer should be by legislative act exonerated from the very thing which his bond is given to cover and compel him to respond to.

I feel bound to say as much as this for one, although I know no reason why this individual should be made an exception to any general rule, if indeed general rule there be covering a case like this.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, one word now in conclusion. I will simply say, I feel called upon to say it in answer to what has been said, that unless Congress relieve this gentleman Congress did wrong in relieving "William J. Patton, collector of internal revenue, second district of Arkansas, $36,081.88; S. S. Bailey, collector of internal revenue, fourth district of Michigan, $1,752.23; E. B. Pendleton, collector of internal revenue, fifth district of Virginia, $26,476.28."

Mr. CONKLING. What were the circumstances of these cases?

Mr. MITCHELL. I have examined them, and most of them are cases where the deputies of the collector were in default, and through the default, the embezzlement of the deputies, the collectors were compelled to account to the Government for a certain amount, and Congress relieved them. There are also numerous other cases; here are some: E. H. Webster, (16 Stats. at L., 703,) John T. Mason, (17 Stats. at L., 704,) R. R. Bolling, (17 Stats. at L., 768,) Logan H. Roots, (16 Stats. at L., 690,) W. B. Thomas, (18 Stats. at L., 555,) Thomas Hillhouse, (18 Stats. at L., 532,) Willard Davis, (18 Stats. at L., 533.) Most of these were collectors of internal revenue, and in many cases the circumstances were not so strong in favor of the claimant as in this particular case.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, there being on a division—ayes 27, noes 16.

The bill was read the third time.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 29, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—29.
Bailey,	Conover,	Hereford,	Patterson,
Beck,	Dawes,	Hill,	Sargent,
Booth,	Dennis,	Ingalls,	Teller,

So the bill was passed.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting copies of the annual reports of the generals commanding the Departments of the Columbia and of Dakota, and asking that these reports be printed as a part of his annual report for 1877; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

PROPOSED CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. President, I rise to a question of privilege. I ask that the Journal of yesterday be corrected. When the House bills were laid before the Senate by the Chair, I asked that the bill (H. R. No. 4245) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint James Shields, of Missouri, a brigadier-general of the United States Army on the retired list receive the present consideration of the Senate, to which the Senator from Vermont not now in his seat [Mr. EDMUNDS] objected. I supposed, until I saw the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD this morning, that the bill to which I have referred was upon the Calendar under the rules of the Senate. I see that the RECORD states that the Vice-President said:

If there be no objection, the bill will be considered read the second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

And I am informed at the desk that it has been sent to the Committee on Military Affairs. I submit to the Senate that the Journal ought to be corrected by striking out the words:

And referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The facts I believe are these: as the bill was announced, I immediately rose in my place; the Chair, however, as is usual with the Chair, announced that the bill would be referred to the appropriate committee; but immediately upon that, and during the announcement made by the Chair, I addressed the Chair and asked for present consideration. I believe under the twenty-fifth rule that the calling for the present consideration of a bill and objection being made thereto by a Senator would put it upon the Calendar without a special motion from some Senator to make the reference. I ask, therefore, that that correction be made of the Journal, and that the bill be put upon the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state the facts as the RECORD states the facts. He announced, as he always does on the presentation of House bills, their reference. It was after he had made the announcement that the Senator from Georgia made the request for present consideration, to which the Senator from Vermont objected. The Chair simply desires to say that within his own knowledge the RECORD states the fact as it actually occurred.

Mr. GORDON. I agree with the Chair that the Chair used the words "the RECORD reports." I understand that there is no disagreement between the Chair and myself in regard to the words used by the Chair. The point I make, though, is that, having made the objection at the time to its reference and asked its present consideration, the bill could not go to the committee without a special reference by the Senate on the motion of some Senator. I will read, if the Chair please, the twenty-fifth rule:

Every bill and joint resolution reported from a committee, not having previously been read, shall be read once and twice, if not objected to, on the same day, and be placed on the Calendar in the order in which the same may be reported; and every bill and joint resolution introduced on leave, and every bill and joint resolution of the House of Representatives which shall have received a first and second reading without being referred to a committee, shall, if objection be made to further proceeding thereon, also be placed upon the Calendar.

I objected to this reference at the time, and supposed, and I think the Clerk so supposed at the time, for I took the pains to go to the desk to ascertain whether my motion did put the bill upon the Calendar, and supposed it did until this morning.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair heard nothing from the Senator from Georgia except a request for the present consideration of the bill. If the Senator made an objection to the reference the Chair did not hear it. He refers all bills without a motion.

Mr. GORDON. It is due to the Chair to say that I did not use the words, "I object to this reference;" but I supposed, and I think it is true under the rules, that asking present consideration was an objection to the reference. I wish further to say, as appears from the RECORD further on, that my understanding must of necessity be correct:

Mr. GORDON. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the present consideration of that bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. To which I object, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The objection is well taken. The bill goes over under the rule.

Now I submit that it was utterly impossible for the bill to go over if the reference had already been made to the committee. There could be no such action taken upon it. Therefore the position I assume holds good, that the objection in the words "I move that the Senate proceed to the present consideration of the bill" did carry it to the Calendar under the objection made by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I think the statement of the Senator at once vindicates the Journal and the action of the Chair, and, if he will allow me, shows that in the interest of the bill he had better not press his motion. Manifestly the bill could not be considered at the time of which he has been speaking, except by a motion to postpone the present and all prior orders, because there was actually pending in the Senate and under consideration another bill and as I understand the rule and the direction of the Chair, the Chair did precisely that which the rule required, the bill took the direction which the rule means. And I submit to the Senator that its condition now as it stands is better for his purpose than it would be if his motion prevailed; and I say that for this reason: if the bill were on the Calendar under the rule, it could be read but once on one day; it could not be read more than once except by unanimous consent. The next day it could be read again, and only once except by unanimous consent. Then the question would remain whether it should be referred to a committee; and in the case of a bill like this—I say "like this" only because it is an exceptional bill not falling within the general rule applied to such cases—I take it it would be the judgment of the Senate that some committee should examine it, so that the Senator, should his motion prevail, will only defer the reference of the bill, whereas if it stands now referred to the committee it is ready for action and can get back sooner than it otherwise might.

This last suggestion, however, is not so pertinent to the purpose as that which I rose more particularly to make—that the Senator could not have had it considered at the time, and the Journal states, as he admits, the exact fact and the fact as the Chair was compelled to have the fact under the rules of the Senate.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. President, the question which I rose to submit to the Senate was, not as to the best course to take for this bill in the interest of the bill itself, but whether the record be correct. I should like to have the sense of the Senate upon the fact as to whether an objection made to the reference of a bill in the words that I used at the time is a sufficient objection to prevent its reference to a committee; whether it does not require under such a motion as was submitted by myself at the time some collateral motion afterward by some Senator to carry the bill to a committee. I submit that the bill is not in committee at all, but is still before the Senate upon the Calendar. I should like to have that question decided.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator formulate the proper motion to effectuate his purpose?

Mr. GORDON. I ask the Chair whether the bill is upon the table or whether the Chair considers that it has gone to the committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair refers all House bills and he referred this bill to the Committee on Military Affairs. After he had done that, the Senator made a motion that the Senate proceed to its present consideration, to which the Senator from Vermont objected. That was the real fact as it transpired. This bill is in the committee if the House bills which are daily referred by the Chair are in committee by his order of reference.

Mr. GORDON. The Chair and the Senate will understand that it was impossible physically for me to address the Chair at the time the Chair was talking, or at least so as to be heard. I rose simultaneously with the announcement of the bill by the Secretary, and the very instant I could say "Mr. President" I did so, supposing that it would be quite time enough and that it was not a mere question of a race between the Chair and myself as to what should be the destiny of this bill. I submit that my objection made at the time ought to be considered as made when the bill was announced by the Secretary.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. But the Senator will permit the Chair to state that he did not rise to the question of reference. He rose to ask the Senate to proceed to the present consideration of the bill, which might be done of course by unanimous consent.

Mr. GORDON. There is no difference between the Chair and myself on that point at all. The question is whether the bill is now in the Committee on Military Affairs or whether it is before the Senate; and I should like the Chair to make a ruling upon that point.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair rules, if the Senator desires to submit the question to him, that the bill is in the Committee on Military Affairs by his order of reference, which was not questioned, as the Chair understood, at the time.

Mr. GORDON. Then, without the slightest disrespect to the Chair and without any special concern as to what disposition is to be made of the bill, as it has gone thus far, I appeal from the decision of the Chair merely to get the sense of the Senate as to what the rule truly means.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?"

Mr. THURMAN. I want to know what I am to vote on. Is there a motion made to correct the Journal?

Mr. GORDON. There is.

Mr. THURMAN. What is that motion?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia has moved to correct the Journal as stated by him.

Mr. GORDON. If I am allowed I will submit a motion to correct the Journal instead of appealing from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the motion be reduced to writing.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Georgia, in accordance with the request of the Senator from Vermont, please reduce his motion to writing?

Mr. GORDON. Yes, sir.

Mr. McCREERY. Is it in order now to call for the regular order?

Mr. GORDON. Not until this matter is disposed of.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. This has been entertained as a question of privilege and the Chair trusts the Senator from Kentucky will not interpose.

VOTE ON RAILROAD BILL.

Mr. HOWE. While the Senator from Georgia is preparing his motion I should like to have the Journal corrected in another particular about which I suspect there will be no dispute. I was out when the Journal was read this morning, but my attention has been called to the fact that my name did not appear among the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill which was under consideration during the afternoon yesterday. I voted when my name was called. I responded "nay."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Journal will be corrected in that particular, the Chair hearing no objection.

REVISION OF THE PATENT LAWS.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I give notice that on Wednesday of next week I shall call up the bill (S. No. 300) to amend the statutes in relation to patents, and for other purposes.

BENJAMIN NOYES.

Mr. EATON. I should be glad to ask unanimous consent to take up to-morrow after the morning hour the resolution which I had the honor to offer some days since relating to the arrest of one Benjamin Noyes, a citizen of the United States and of the State of Connecticut.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Connecticut that to-morrow after the morning hour he be at liberty to call up the resolution and proceed with it?

Mr. EATON. I shall detain the Senate but a short time upon it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It ought not to be made a special order. If the Senator gives notice, there will be no objection.

Mr. EATON. Very well, I give notice that I shall call up the resolution to-morrow morning.

ADDITIONAL PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. McDONALD presented the memorial of Franklin B. Hunt, of Richmond, Indiana, praying for the appointment of a committee to investigate certain differences between the Commissioner of Patents and himself and the causes which led to his being prohibited from practicing before the Commissioner of Patents; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. JOHNSTON presented the memorial of merchants, owners, agents, and masters of vessels, citizens of Norfolk, Virginia, remonstrating against the transfer of the life-saving service from the Treasury to the Navy Department; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of citizens of Norfolk, Virginia, remonstrating against the transfer of the life-saving service from the Treasury to the Navy Department; which was ordered to lie on the table.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. TELLER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. No. 20) authorizing the citizens of Colorado, Nevada, and the Territories to fell and remove timber on the public domain for mining and domestic purposes; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOWE, Mr. MITCHELL, and Mr. WINDOM submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the bill (H. R. No. 3740) to provide for deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, and for prior years, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MATTHEWS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 805) to repeal all that part of the act approved January 14, 1875, known as the resumption act, which authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to dispose of United States bonds and redeem and cancel the greenback currency; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

PROPOSED CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. GORDON. I offer the following order:

Ordered, That the Journal of April 9 be corrected so as to read:

"If there be no objection, the bill will be considered read the second time."

Mr. MERRIMON. I beg to say a word. It seems to me that the RECORD is correct in all respects. The simple question is whether the first direction of the Chair shall prevail or the last. The Chair said:

If there be no objection, the bill will be considered read the second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the present consideration of that bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. To which I object, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The objection is well taken. The bill goes over under the rule.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair meant the consideration of the bill, of course.

Mr. MERRIMON. Well, "the consideration of the bill goes over under the rule." Now what do the words "go over under the rule" mean? They mean that the bill lies upon the table until the appropriate time comes to take some further action upon and amounting to a countermanding of the order which the Chair had before that time made. Therefore the sending of the bill to the committee, it seems to me, was an error, and the bill is still legally on the table, and subject to any proper motion to be made. The simple question is whether the first order made by the Chair prevails or the second.

Logically, certainly the second order prevails, and the bill is on the table now, or if it has gone to the committee it is there erroneously. The first order was conditional. Objection was made to the reference, for what the Senator from Georgia said was tantamount to an objection. After he had made his motion, which must be regarded as in substance an objection, the Senator from Vermont interposed an objection which cut off the motion, and cut it off absolutely. The consideration of the bill at that time was impossible. Then the Chair said, "the bill goes over." That means, "it lies on the table to take the regular course of business," and it is on the table now in contemplation of parliamentary law, and subject to any action that is proper and regular. The RECORD is correct. There is no real difference between the Chair, it seems to me, and the Senator from Georgia. The resolution is therefore unnecessary, and the simple question is what disposition is to be made of the bill at this time, for if it is in the committee it is there erroneously.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the resolution of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BAYARD. Let it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be again reported.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That the Journal of April 9 be corrected so as to read:

"If there be no objection, the bill will be considered read the second time."

Mr. INGALLS. Does the resolution refer to the Journal or the RECORD?

Mr. GORDON. To the Journal.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to hear what the Journal says.

Mr. GORDON. I take it the Journal says the same thing as the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The entry in the Journal will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The bill (H. R. No. 4345) last received from the House of Representatives for con-currency was read the first and second times, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. INGALLS. It is very evident that the Senator from Georgia has misapprehended the relation between the Journal and the RECORD. The resolution can in no sense apply to the Journal of legislative proceedings. He endeavors to apply the language that appears in the RECORD to the Journal and have it inserted there, which of course would be entirely inappropriate.

Mr. GORDON. The Journal as I understand it, as read at the desk, precisely corresponds with the RECORD. I ask again for the reading of the words used by the Vice-President.

Mr. WHYTE. The Senator merely wishes to strike out the words "and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs," which appear in the Journal.

Mr. GORDON. That is all. Is it necessary to submit that motion in writing? I wish to move to strike out the words "and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs." That motion I first submitted but I yielded to other gentlemen who offered suggestions.

Mr. HEREFORD. I should like to vote with my friend the Senator from Georgia, but I cannot vote with him on the motion he has made because it does not accord with the facts. The Vice-President did say just what the RECORD says he said. The error I think is in this: I do not think the bill is before the Military Committee at all. In that I agree with the Senator from North Carolina. What occurred?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the bill will be considered read the second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

That is what the Vice-President said when the bill was laid before the Senate. Then—

Mr. GORDON. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the present consideration of that bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. To which I object, Mr. President.

To what did the Senator from Vermont object? The Senator from Vermont objected to the present consideration of the bill. Then the Vice-President said:

The objection is well taken—

That is, to the present consideration of the bill—

The bill goes over under the rule.

Not meaning that the bill goes over, for that would not make sense, but the consideration of the bill goes over. It goes over until when? It goes over until the following day. Consequently, as was said by the Senator from North Carolina, the original statement made by the Vice-President was conditional; that is, "if there be no objection this bill will go to the Committee on Military Affairs." There was an objection made in the shape of asking for the present consideration of the bill, and then the Vice-President said the bill, in other words, the consideration of the bill, will go over under the rule. Therefore it seems to me clearly that the bill is to-day on the Calendar, and I cannot vote with the Senator from Georgia to correct the RECORD, because the RECORD is correct. But with all due deference to the Presiding Officer, if the motion were made to appeal from the decision of the Chair as to where the bill now is, I should be compelled to vote with the Senator from Georgia, for I do not believe that the bill is before the Military Committee. Certainly it is in such a condition that the Senate will readily recognize that there is enough in this case to have misled the Senator from Georgia. There was enough in what the Presiding Officer said to have misled the Senator as to what was the fate of the motion he made. Therefore the Senator from Georgia should be placed in the very same condition that he was then, and then if it be the pleasure of the Senate to refer the bill, all right.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, the statement made by the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. HEREFORD,] which is certainly an ingenious one, is unsatisfactory to me for a reason which I should think would render it unsatisfactory to the Senator. Had the Senator from Georgia at any time objected to the reference of the bill and arrested its reference, all would follow that the Senator from West Virginia argues. He says he did do that. How? He says a motion would have done it. I do not agree to that; but suppose it would, did the Senator from Georgia make a motion, an effectual motion? Not at all. There was but one motion that he could make which would have such an effect. What was that? To postpone the present and all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of this bill. No such motion as that was made.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator from New York permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly.

Mr. COCKRELL. Would not the proper motion have been to move that the bill be read a second time?

Mr. CONKLING. No, sir.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then it could have come up to-day.

Mr. CONKLING. No, sir, the Senator could not make any such motion, and for a reason just as clear as the fact in physics that two bodies cannot occupy the same space at the same time. Under the rules of the Senate the Senate was occupied with the so-called sinking-fund bill. There was no way to replace that by another bill except a motion to displace the pending bill. No such motion was made. What was done? An informal appeal was made for unanimous consent, and the Senator from Vermont objected. Did not that end it?

Then the Presiding Officer, having in the execution of the rules already referred the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs, said, "the objection is well taken, and the consideration of the bill goes over under the rule." Under what rule did it go over? Under the rules which the Vice-President had already executed, and there are several of them, it had gone to the Committee on Military Affairs. There is no escape from that except the argument that the appeal of the Senator from Georgia for the unanimous consent of the Senate to make the motion amounted to an objection. Certainly not. Suppose unanimous consent had been given, then it would have been in order to make a motion to proceed with the consideration of the bill. But the Senator from Georgia did not reach the point when he could make that motion, because leave to make it was refused by the objection of a Senator.

Therefore, I say again, that the record is true. It affirms exactly what took place, and moreover it affirms exactly what should have taken place and is now most conducive to the early and regular consideration of the bill. I take it, no Senator supposes that if this bill could be brought back from the committee now, without an examination, the Senate would proceed with hot foot to vote upon it without its being examined at all. Surely I may say for one, whatever the merits of it may be in my estimation, I would never vote to pass a bill which bill in substance appropriates money, and a considerable sum of money, permanently from the Treasury, in an exceptional case, without any examination of it whatever. Here, in the case of a bill involving $3,000 which had been carefully examined by a committee, the Senate spent most of the morning hour and some time afterward in considering it. Such is the measure of consideration which is thought due to bills, and especially to appropriation bills. Therefore upon the merits of the motion, without reference to its technical right, I should have no doubt that the bill is where it ought to be, before the Committee on Military Affairs, and where it will go eventually, I believe, before it is finally considered in the Senate. Hence I say, in the interest of the bill, the whole effect of this proceeding is to interpose an interval between now and the time when final action can be taken upon it.

Mr. GORDON. I have no objection personally to the bill going to the Committee on Military Affairs, and I certainly did not expect it to pass without consideration. My motion was not made with a view to the passage of the bill without consideration. It was to proceed to the consideration of the bill. I expected, of course, that the Senate would discuss the measure and consider it before voting upon it. But this question is not as to what shall be done with the bill hereafter. The question is what has already been done with the bill under the rule of the Senate. I submit that if the rule as applied here holds in all motions that are made in the Senate we shall never be able to call for the yeas and nays or for a division after the announcement of the Chair, for it is usual for the Chair to say, "By the sound the yeas have it." That ends the question under this ruling. The Chair having said that, if there be no objection, the bill is referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, it is insisted that that ends it. If the interposition of an objection after that cannot be entertained, we can never have an objection entertained after the announcement of the Chair in deciding motions or votes. All I ask is that the Journal be properly corrected so as to represent the facts as appears from the last language of the Chair at the time, as it was understood by himself, which was that the bill or the consideration of the bill went over under the rule. When that is done I am willing that the bill shall take any course that the Senate may regard as proper. I move to strike out from the entry in the Journal the words "and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs." That would leave the RECORD precisely as it is now, and it is absolutely correct, for the Chair did speak the words there as suggested by the Senator from West Virginia. My motion is not to correct the RECORD, but the Journal, which simply pretends to recite a fact.

Mr. HEREFORD. I desire to say one word in reply to the Senator from New York. The Senator from New York says that the position I take in this matter cannot be maintained, as I understood him, for the reason that the Senator from Georgia could not have had the floor to make the motion that he did make except by unanimous consent, and that his motion would have to be to lay aside the pending business before the body and take up this other matter. In that I think the Senator is clearly wrong, for this reason: prior to this matter coming up there had been several other questions before this body. One was "appropriations for detecting trespasses," &c., being a report made by a committee of conference. After that there was action upon the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill, and a resolution was offered in regard to it. Then after that the Vice-President appointed a committee of conference, and after that the RECORD reads thus:

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 4245) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint James Shields, of Missouri, a brigadier-general in the United States Army on the retired list, was read the first time by its title.

That is the matter which was before the Senate. It was this House bill. How it got there it is unnecessary to decide. It was before the Senate, however.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. There was no other business then before the Senate.

Mr. HEREFORD. There was no other business before the Senate then, because, as the Senator from New York has said, it is evident as a proposition in physics that two bodies cannot occupy the same space at the same time. The only thing then before the body was this House bill in relation to General Shields. Then, if two bodies cannot occupy the same space at the same time, there could have been nothing else before this body. Therefore it was not necessary, as the Senator from New York has said, to get unanimous consent to move to set aside all other business and take up this bill. This was the very matter before the body and the only matter before the body. How it got here, whether by unanimous consent or not, is immaterial. Whether it was placed before the Senate by the Presiding Officer or not is immaterial. It was the question before the body, and the motion of the Senator from Georgia was correct.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HEREFORD. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. When the Vice-President made this formal announcement, "the bill is referred to the committee," or "the bill goes over," did the Senate resume the consideration of the sinking-fund bill?

Mr. HEREFORD. I suppose it did. I have not looked at the Record to see how that was.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish my friend would look, and I wish he would tell me whether the Senate did resume the consideration of it owing to a motion or whether that consideration was continued on the ground that it had been all the time before the Senate, because an answer to that question I think will answer the argument of my friend.

Mr. HEREFORD. I will answer the Senator from New York by saying that the sinking-fund bill was informally laid aside, as it had been laid aside at different times for a month, in order that other business might come before the body. When that bill was informally laid aside day before yesterday, and the day before that, and the week before that, and other business was taken up, it was not necessary for a motion to be made to lay aside the regular business and take up any particular measure.

Mr. CONKLING. But my honorable friend will not insist upon that proposition when he reflects upon it. The Senator is on the floor at this moment. Suppose the Clerk of the House appears at the door. The Vice-President says, "Will the Senator give way while the Chair receives a message from the House?" He gives way. Does that dispose of him? Does it take him off the floor? Does it lay aside the matter to which he is speaking? Not at all. It is a mere unanimous consent given that a formality may occur, just as I may ask the Senator—perhaps I sometimes do—if he will yield a moment while I make some request, or inquiry of the Chair, or of him, or of some other Senator. It does not dispose of the business. Nothing else is before the Senate in the sense of the rule at all.

And now, as I have interrupted my friend so far, if he will indulge me a further moment I will call his attention to Rule 43; and I think in the presence of that rule he can hardly insist, on reflection, upon what he has said. Here was the funding bill confessedly pending in the Senate. Now, the rule says:

When a question is pending, no motion shall be received but—
To adjourn,
To adjourn to a day certain, or that, when the Senate adjourn, it shall be to a day certain,
To take a recess,
To proceed to the consideration of executive business,
To lay on the table,
To postpone indefinitely,
To postpone to a day certain,
To commit,
To amend;
which several motions shall have precedence in the order in which they stand arranged.

The rule is exclusive. No motion whatsoever can be made save one of those motions. How can my honorable friend say that when a Senator gave way in order that the Clerk of the House need not stand here and tire his legs waiting for a vacation to deliver his message and his budget of bills, that disposes for the time being of the order to which this rule applies, and that then any motion under heaven is in order, to proceed to take up the bill to repeal the bankrupt law, or to take up this bill, or to do anything else? Certainly not. The other bill was all the time before the Senate, but the Senate for its convenience allowed informally the Clerk to deliver his budget, and when he had delivered it some Senator rose and asked unanimous consent to get a committee of conference, as the practice is, and unanimous consent was given for that, but it did not lay aside the railroad bill at all; that bill was here all the time.

Mr. GORDON. Will the Senator from New York, while he is on his feet, allow me to call his attention to one or two facts?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly.

Mr. GORDON. It will be observed by the proceedings as given in the Record that at one o'clock or about that time yesterday it is announced that "The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 15) to alter and amend," &c., meaning the funding bill. The Senate "resumed the consideration" of that bill. That is the language used at the end of the morning hour. The very same language is used after the intervention of this matter about which we are now talking, showing that there is a difference between the case submitted by the Senator from New York and this one, because when a message from the House is simply announced and a Senator gives way for the Clerk of the House to announce the House bill to the Senate, there is no such record made as that "the Senate proceeded with" or "resumed the consideration of" the bill then pending. The point I call the Senator's attention to is that in both cases, both at the beginning of the regular business after the morning hour and after the expiration of the consideration of the particular business which we are now talking about, the language is the same.

Mr. CONKLING. I agree with the Senator from Georgia; I intended so to state and to argue; I thought I did. My purpose was to bring to the notice of the Senator from West Virginia this fact. If his argument was sound, after the conference committee had been appointed and this interlude took place, it would have been necessary for some Senator to move to take up the railroad bill and to resume that bill. On the contrary, as the Senator has just read to show, the rules by their own operation said that the railroad bill was before the Senate; and now see in confirmation of that what took place:

Mr. WINDOM. I ask leave to make a report from a committee of conference in order that another committee may be appointed.

The report of a conference committee is a privileged report in the House; I do not know whether it is so here. Whether it is so here or not, he asked leave, and every Senator had power to grant or refuse that leave. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] said:

To that I do not object.

And thus, having obtained consent, the Senator from Minnesota went on to make his report. Another committee was appointed; and when that had taken place, without any motion, the Senate went right on with a continuation of the bill and the only bill which was all the time before it. On that state of facts the rule declares that no motion whatsoever can be made save only those enumerated in the rule, which may occur in the order of their arrangement.

Mr. MERRIMON. Will the Senator from New York allow me to propound to him a question?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly.

Mr. MERRIMON. Suppose when the Chair laid this House bill before the Senate and said these words, "If there be no objection, the bill will be considered read the second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs," the Senator from Georgia had simply said, "I object to the second reading," what would have been the consequence?

Mr. CONKLING. The consequence is he would have objected to it.

Mr. MERRIMON. Would the bill have been here to-day?

Mr. CONKLING. He would have objected to the second reading on the same day with the first reading.

Mr. MERRIMON. He would have objected to it, and then the bill would have been here to day. I submit to the Senator that when the Senator from Georgia asked for its present consideration, although that was not in order, still it was to be regarded in a legal sense as an objection to the second reading, which was obstructive of the reference.

Mr. CONKLING. My answer to that, if my honorable friend will allow me, is that the Vice-President had already directed the customary entry, to wit—

Mr. MERRIMON. But he would not—

Mr. CONKLING. If my friend will pardon me a moment—to wit, that this bill be read a first and second time and referred. It was read a first and second time by its title, according to the Record, which I have in my hand. Then the Senator from Georgia said:

Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the present consideration of that bill.

Now it was not the most artificial and technical way in which the Senator from Georgia could have put the motion, but the Senate understood it, and therefore a Senator's objection, who said immediately, "To which I object," showing that he treated it as it was, as an appeal to the Senate for unanimous consent to go to the consideration of this bill, which unanimous consent was refused, and therefore upon that the Presiding Officer said:

The objection is well taken. The bill goes over under the rule.

In the presence of the order which had already been made, when no motion to reconsider had been entered, when the Presiding Officer said, "the objection is well taken and the bill goes over," does anybody doubt that the Senator from Georgia had appealed to the Senate for unanimous consent to consider the bill? The appeal had been refused and the bill had been left exactly where the Vice-President put it by his direction, that under the rule it should be read a first and second time, which was done, and then that it should go to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MERRIMON. But the Senator does not advert to the fact that what the Chair said was conditional. The Chair said "if there be no objection." What I say is that in legal contemplation, although what the Senator from Georgia said was informal for his purpose, still it must be regarded in substance as an objection to the second reading of the bill.

Mr. CONKLING. Now will my friend allow me to put to him a question?

Mr. MERRIMON. Of course, and I will answer it if I can.

Mr. CONKLING. Suppose the Vice-President had said, as he did,

"if there be no objection, the bill will be considered read the second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs," and at that point the Senator from Georgia had risen and said, "Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent of the Senate to put this bill on its passage now," and the Senator from Vermont had said "I object," and the Vice-President had said, "the objection is well taken;" where would that leave the bill?

Mr. MERRIMON. I think that ought to be regarded as an objection to a second reading for the purpose of reference.

Mr. CONKLING. But it had been read a second time; the thing had been done.

Mr. MERRIMON. The RECORD does not say so.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg my friend's pardon.

Mr. MERRIMON. We will see. Here is the RECORD. The Vice-President said:

If there be no objection, the bill will be considered read the second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly.

Mr. MERRIMON. That is what the Chair said at that point.

Mr. CONKLING. Not that it will be read a second time, but it "will be considered read the second time." Did anybody object to that? Not at all. The Senator from Georgia said "I move to go on and consider it." The Senator from Vermont said "I object." My question is this: Suppose the Senator from Georgia had addressed the appeal to the Senate in so many words, "I ask unanimous consent that that bill, in place of going to the Committee on Military Affairs, may be considered now," and a Senator simultaneously had said, "I object," I ask the Senator where that would have left it?

Mr. MERRIMON. I do not think that would have referred it to a committee. The only question is, what effect is to be given to those words? whether in legal contemplation they amount to an objection to the second reading of the bill.

Mr. CONKLING. In other words, if the Senator will pardon me, the question is whether those words amounted to an objection.

Mr. MERRIMON. I think so.

Mr. CONKLING. Or whether they amounted to an appeal to the Senate for unanimous consent. I submit with great deference to the Senator that it is palpable to me that their utmost effect under the rule could be an appeal to the Senate for that unanimous consent, which, being refused, left the tree to lie just as it had fallen.

Mr. MERRIMON. It impresses me just this way: that the Senator from Georgia was not willing that the bill should be referred. He wanted to have it considered without a reference to a committee.

Mr. CONKLING. Why did he not say so?

Mr. MERRIMON. I think he did say so in effect. I want to say here that I think this bill ought to be referred; that is the orderly and regular course; but I am anxious to see this decision properly made. I think it ought to be made correctly, and I believe the bill is still on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair desires to state in justice to himself that he never says, nor did he yesterday, "if there be no objection." Those are the words used by the Reporter. The Journal shows no such words. Since the Chair has occupied this position there has not been a motion made in relation to a House bill referred, and the Chair has referred them by his own order, as he did yesterday, saying "the bill is read the second time and referred" so, and so on. That is always the language of the Chair. He did not use the language, "if there be no objection." That is the phrase of the RECORD, and not of the Journal, nor was it the language of the Chair. The Chair assumes that the reference is to be had.

Mr. GORDON. I merely want to say one word in reference to the manner in which I put this motion. I submit that it is not at all usual to make motions to postpone all prior orders, unless the question is a very grave one. For instance, the Senator from Minnesota yesterday made no motion to postpone all prior orders in order that he might have a report considered and a committee of conference appointed. He simply asked that it be done, just as I asked that the Senate proceed to the present consideration of that bill. However, that is a matter of no consequence, and I ask for a vote on the correction of the Journal.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the motion of the Senator from Georgia.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the following entry in the Journal of yesterday's proceedings: "The bill (H. R. No. 4245) last received from the House of Representatives for concurrence was read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs," be amended by striking out the words "and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the first objection that I have now to that resolution (reserving the point of order which I wish to make and have been trying to get the floor to make) is that it will not state the fact as it is. If the bill was not referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, then it was not read the second time. The two things were together. The Chair in the ordinary course of his duty, as he does every day, said, "This bill will be considered read the second time and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs." Thereupon the Senator from Georgia said, "I move the present consideration of this bill." If he had moved that in time, before the reference, as he might, or if he had moved it afterward, the Chair would have recalled the reference undoubtedly, but he could not move to have it read a second time, which would be the present consideration, without an objection. What I objected to, and what everybody understood on my side just as well as it was understood by the Senator from Georgia and all on the other side, was that he wanted to have the bill put through apparently, and I did not wish to have it put through, without the regular and ordinary course of consideration. If, therefore, I had understood that the object of the Senator's proposition was to put the bill through all its stages then, upon the theory that it had already been read a second time, I should have objected to that, because, as I said, I do not think that is exactly the right way to do a thing, however proper it may be in itself.

This bill, like every other that comes from the House of Representatives providing relief for a citizen of the United States, ought to be considered by a committee. If any Senator had been so hasty about it as to wish to put it through without a reference to a committee, then I should most certainly have objected to the second reading. But that was not what I understood the Senator from Georgia. I understood that the Senator from Georgia wanted to have the bill considered now, and that being objected to then, no objection was made to the order that the Chair had made of reference, because the point that the Senator from Georgia had in view of present consideration and discussion was lost.

Mr. MERRIMON. He desired to object to the reference. That was his purpose.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, Mr. President, what he wanted to do was to have a present consideration of the bill. What I wanted to have was a reference of the bill; but if there was not to be a reference, then there could not have been with my consent a second reading.

Mr. MERRIMON. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes.

Mr. MERRIMON. If the Senator from Georgia desired to have a present consideration, did not that necessarily, did it not logically, involve his opposition to the reference of the bill?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not necessarily, because the present consideration and discussion might have been had upon the question whether the bill should be read a second time, just as much as after its second reading. You may discuss a bill here just as long as the rules will allow, which is just as long as the patience of Senators will stand it, on the question whether a bill shall be read a second time at all. The rules provide that you cannot refer a bill until after a second reading, that you will not trouble a committee with the consideration of a bill that the Senate is unwilling to have read the second time. That is the theory and substance and good sense of the rule. Therefore the real and substantial point of it was that the Senator from Georgia wished to get unanimous consent not to have this bill go to a committee, where the Chair had ordered it to go, but to have it considered then. To that I objected, and then the Chair said, "Very well, the bill has gone over;" that is to say, the usual course of the Senate has taken place about it.

This proposition to amend the Journal in the way proposed would result in the statement of an untruth, in stating as a fact that the bill was read a second time, for if it was not referred it was not read a second time.

Mr. GORDON. May I ask the Senator from Vermont for information merely, in order to get his opinion, (for really it is a matter of entire indifference to me and I am entirely willing for the bill to go to the Committee on Military Affairs or to be considered as there now,) what is the effect of the language used by the Vice-President on page 2371, if the Senator has the RECORD in his hands? The Vice-President said:

The bill goes over under the rule.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understand the effect of it to be, in connection with all that had taken place, that the bill could not be considered to-day, that objection being made to the wish of the Senator from Georgia that the thing should not go to the committee, where the Vice-President had sent it, the Vice-President says, "You cannot consider it to-day, and the bill has gone over;" that is, it has gone over in the regular course to the place where the Chair had sent it. That is my understanding of the common sense of that colloquy, if we can call it that, which took place. I may be wrong, but that is the impression that it produced most clearly upon my mind.

Now, Mr. President, I do not want to waste time about this affair, because the Senator from Georgia says—

Mr. GORDON. If the Senator will allow me, all I desired was to call the attention of the Senate to this fact. If it is the wish of the Senate that the bill shall go to the Committee on Military Affairs, I have no objection and withdraw my motion to correct the Journal.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am very glad that the Senator withdraws his motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion being withdrawn, the Senate proceeds to the consideration—

Mr. EDMUNDS. Lest this should be drawn into precedent hereafter in our methods of procedure I wish to suggest the point of order I should have made and will make the next time; I intended to make it but now it is of no consequence, the motion being withdrawn. It is that the Journal having been read the first business in the morning, under the rules, and approved, it is not competent for any Senator at any time during the course of the day to take it up again and move to change it, and therefore I submit the motion was entirely out of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator hold that where unanimous consent is given?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Oh, no, sir, I should not hold that where there is unanimous consent.

Mr. GORDON. If the Senator will pardon me, I was proceeding by unanimous consent. I was aware it was out of the usual time for such a question to be raised, but I was not present when the Journal was read this morning.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair would rule with the Senator from Vermont on the point of order being made.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I only mention it now and call the attention of Senators to the fact that if there is anything wrong in the Journal it must be corrected when the Journal is read, and not afterward, after it has been once approved.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Unquestionably.

BANKRUPT-LAW REPEAL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The unfinished business of yesterday now comes up.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 35) to repeal the bankrupt law.

Mr. McCREERY. Mr. President, the bill which I introduced at an early day in the extra session to repeal the bankrupt law has been somewhat elaborated and perhaps it has been improved. I accept the bill as returned by the Judiciary Committee, and shall resist all attempts to change, modify, or amend it. If the work of amendment begins it would involve the necessity of a re-reference, which would be equivalent to a last farewell to the repeal of the bankrupt law. If it required five months in winter when business was light to perfect the bill before us, how long would it require in the heat of summer with a crowded Calendar to remodel and reconstruct it? This question is not susceptible of a satisfactory answer. Calculation and observation may determine the rise, force, and direction of the storm that is now prevailing, but the public interest may not be jeopardized for a practical solution of this latter problem.

Hence, having consented that the Judiciary Committee should take charge of this bill, we have the single alternative of accepting their report or of indefinite postponement; and, as they have given such patient and careful consideration to the subject, it is fair to conclude that the measure before us will have their active support. So far as I am concerned, I do not intend to delay its passage by any remarks of my own, nor will I say anything to provoke discussion on the part of others.

More than nine-tenths of the people of Kentucky are earnestly and zealously in favor of the repeal of the bankrupt law, and my action has been prompted solely by a desire to obey their wishes. I am confident that the course of other Senators will reflect the sentiments of their constituencies, and I will not waste your time by an idle effort to influence your votes. The patriotic gentlemen who compose the Legislature of Kentucky have instructed me to use my best efforts to procure the repeal. In that instruction I hear the voice of the sovereign people who have witnessed the operations of the bankrupt law in its assaults upon public morals, in its violations of good faith, in its craft, its falsehoods, and its frauds, until from every hill and from every valley comes the demand for repeal.

Mr. MATTHEWS. I gave notice a few days since of my intention to propose an amendment to the bill of the Senator from Kentucky as reported with amendments from the Committee on the Judiciary, and if it be now in order formally to move that amendment I shall do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, in the chair.) The question first is on the amendments proposed by the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. MATTHEWS. I am aware of that. I have no objection to the question being taken upon those amendments, and then I shall move my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments of the committee go to perfect the text of the bill, and the amendment of the Senator from Ohio is to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert, as the Chair understands.

Mr. MATTHEWS. Then I will delay until the question is taken on the amendments of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments reported from the Committee on the Judiciary will be read by the Secretary.

The CHIEF CLERK. The first amendment proposed is, after the word "amendment," in line 4, to insert the words "or supplementary;" so as to read:

That the bankrupt law approved March 2, 1867, and all acts in amendment or supplementary thereto or in explanation thereof, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert at the end of the bill the following proviso:

Provided, however, That such repeal shall in no manner invalidate or affect any case in bankruptcy instituted and pending in any court prior to the day when this act shall take effect; but as to all such pending cases and all future proceedings therein, the acts hereby repealed shall continue in full force and effect until the same shall be fully disposed of, in the same manner as if said acts had not been repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MATTHEWS. I now move to amend the bill by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting what I send to the Chair. I ask to have it reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert:

That any person having become insolvent or in contemplation thereof, who shall make an assignment, according to the laws of the State or Territory in which he is an inhabitant or in which his place of business or his property is situated, of all his property of every description and wherever situated, for the equal benefit of all his creditors, shall thereby be and is hereby declared to be a bankrupt; and when his assets, upon distribution by his assignee, shall have paid to his creditors, within two years after the date of said assignment, 50 per cent. of the amount of their claims, the said bankrupt shall be thereby discharged from all further liability on account thereof in respect to property acquired after said assignment, and said subsequently acquired property, during two years from the date of said assignment, shall be exempt from seizure upon judicial process upon claims existing at the date thereof; but said discharge and exemption shall not extend to obligations contracted fraudulently or incurred by means of a breach of trust, and shall be void if said bankrupt shall have fraudulently omitted from said assignment or fraudulently concealed any property, or, within six months prior thereto, made any conveyance or disposition of any of his property, or suffered the same to be taken in execution, or incumbered by judicial seizure, with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud his creditors, or with intent, having reasonable cause to believe himself insolvent, to secure to any one or more of his creditors a preference over others.

SEC. 2. That in any action or suit brought on any claim against such discharge, as herein declared, may be pleaded in bar of recovery; and the record of the finding and judgment of any judicial tribunal in which administration of said assignment may have taken place shall be evidence of the matters therein contained, but if said assignment shall not have been judicially administered, the facts may be proven as in other like cases; and any person claiming to have been discharged as a bankrupt by force of the provisions of this act may file his petition in the district court of the United States for the district in which he may have made the assignment for the benefit of his creditors, praying to have said discharge judicially declared, to which the assignee shall be made a party defendant, and of the pendency of which notice by publication shall be given to the creditors as a class, according to the local law in similar cases of constructive service of process, or such rules, orders as may be prescribed by the Supreme Court as to the pleadings, procedure, and practice in such cases; and any creditor shall have the right to appear and defend for his own or the common interest, and on hearing and due proof, at the petitioner's cost in all cases, the court shall determine and declare whether the petitioner is discharged as a bankrupt according to the terms of this act. The petitioner shall set forth all the facts herein declared to be necessary to constitute a discharge, verified by the oath of the petitioner, and shall negative all the grounds of avoidance, and the judgment shall be conclusive evidence upon the question of a discharge, except in those cases which by this act are excepted from said discharge, and in those in which it is declared that said discharge shall be avoided, and in the latter it shall be prima facie evidence only.

SEC. 3. All prior acts on the subject of bankruptcies are hereby repealed, except as to pending cases, which shall proceed as if this act had not been passed.

Mr. MATTHEWS. Mr. President, I desire to engage the attention of Senators briefly while I endeavor to explain the nature of this proposition and state the grounds on which I think it ought to commend itself to the favorable consideration of Congress. It will be perceived that it is a proposition to repeal, as does the pending bill reported from the Judiciary Committee, the entire system of bankruptcy with all the provisions of the existing bankrupt act and all the details for the distribution of the assets of bankrupt estates, and to insert in place of the existing system another and a different one which, whatever may be its defects in other respects, at least has the merit of simplicity and the merit of brevity.

I start out upon the assumption on which the bill of the Senator from Kentucky proceeds, that the present bankrupt system is altogether unsatisfactory, that whether it does any good is perhaps a doubtful question, but the good it does is so limited and hampered by the delay and the expensiveness of the processes by which an attempt is made to confer it, as that it is difficult to determine whether its existence or its repeal is really the greater public and private benefit.

I confess that the strong inclination of my mind, supported as I believe by very general public sentiment in the State which I have the honor in part to represent, the public sentiment of the profession to which I belong, of the business and mercantile and trading classes as well as of the community at large, is that the present system is imperfect, inadequate, unjust, unsatisfactory, a cover for fraud, an obstacle in the way of honest and unfortunate debtors. I am strongly persuaded that, in order to get any better system, if any better is practicable and attainable at all, it is necessary, in the first place, to entirely get rid of the present.

But I should be very sorry to see Congress satisfy itself with the mere exertion necessary to repeal the existing law, and it is in the hope that something can be presented so simple, so inexpensive, so readily comprehensive, so plain in its provisions as that it may be accepted as a substitute for the existing statutes on the subject. My contribution toward that is contained in the provisions of the present amendment; and I shall now explain in what they consist.

This amendment defines a bankrupt in the first place. It defines him as a person who has become insolvent, or who, in contemplation of insolvency, makes an assignment of all his property, wherever situated, under the laws of the locality in which it is situated, for the equal benefit of all his creditors, a general assignment for the payment of all his debts of all his property, without preference and without distinction. The equal distribution of all the effects of an insolvent person among all his creditors, without discrimination, without preference, is that which it is said equity loves. It is that which is sought to be obtained by every system of bankruptcy known to civilized jurisprudence. This definition confines the technical bankruptcy of the statute to the single class of insolvents who choose voluntarily to put themselves in the attitude and invest themselves with the status on which this act, if passed, would operate, by voluntarily executing a conveyance for the purpose of providing for the distribution of all their property for the benefit of all those who have any just and lawful claims against them. It therefore excludes from the class those who are included within it by the present statutes, namely, all those who voluntarily seek the benefits of the present act without having made such an assignment and all those who are compelled to go through with the proceedings of the act involuntarily upon the petition of their creditor.

In other words, this is a system of bankruptcy voluntary in its character entirely, excluding the involuntary feature altogether, and confining its operations to those who choose to avail themselves of its benefits by conforming to its provisions in respect to that initial act at least which puts them in the category of bankrupts, making the assignment. But the mere making of the assignment does not operate to discharge a man from the obligation of his debts. It relieves him during two years allowed as the period for the administration of the assignment, so far as his subsequently acquired property is concerned, from disturbance in the possession and enjoyment of it by legal process, and if at the end of the period of two years allowed for that administration there shall have been paid to his creditors upon their claims one-half of their amount, he thereby becomes a discharged bankrupt.

Mr. EATON. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MATTHEWS. Certainly; with pleasure.

Mr. EATON. I want to ask if the intention of the Senator from Ohio is that the person who applies to the proper court in some State or Territory is to be declared a bankrupt by that State or territorial court? The language of his amendment leaves it in some little doubt. I should suppose from the first section of his amendment that his intention is that the court before whom the assignment is to be made, either in a State or Territory, shall adjudge the party so assigning to be a bankrupt.

Mr. MATTHEWS. By no means. The theory of my bill is that the facts which I have already stated, and the statement of which is contained in the first section, constitute the person a bankrupt and constitute him a discharged bankrupt, without reference to any judicial proceeding or any judicial ascertainment of the fact in any court, State or Federal, as I shall have occasion more expressly to explain when I come to unfold the provisions of the second section of the proposed act. The only reference in the first section to the local law is perhaps surplusage. The legal meaning of the section perhaps would be the same without it that it is with it, for it only refers to the local law of the State or Territory as furnishing the rule according to which the conveyance of the property is to be made.

I suppose that by a general principle of law the conveyance of property would be determined by the law of the situs of the property. That would certainly be the case in respect to real estate, and in respect to personal property the domicile of the party, which is also spoken of, either his business domicile or his personal domicile, might furnish the rule for the transmission by deed of his personality. He is to make a valid conveyance. To be valid it must be valid according to the laws of the place where it is executed, or, in reference to real estate, according to the laws of the State where the real property is situated. That is to be a general assignment for the equal benefit of all creditors, and if in point of fact after two years his assets shall have been distributed so as to net to his creditors full 50 per cent. of their claims, then he becomes ipso facto a discharged bankrupt. The Senator from Connecticut will perceive by reference to the second section that the proof of the two facts to which I have adverted may be made in either one of two ways: that the assignment was made and that it resulted, upon administration, in yielding to the creditors 50 per cent. of their claims. If the assignment, according to the law of the place where it is made and administered, has been administered judicially, by a court appointed for that purpose by the laws of the State, then those judicial proceedings are declared to be proof of the facts which they contain, that is, of the facts relating to the distribution, relating to the assignment, relating to the result of the administration of that assignment, in regard to the distribution among the creditors.

Let me illustrate that. In the State of Ohio there are and have been for many years statutes prescribing the mode of administering assignments in trust for the benefit of creditors, and declaring that all assignments, no matter how worded, shall be construed to be for the equal benefit of all creditors, so that all preferences are prohibited by law. Under that statute and system, the assignee either goes or may be compelled to go into the probate court, file a copy of his assignment, take an oath of office, give security for the performance of the duties of his office, have orders for the sale of the property, have orders for the recovery of the possession of the property, take orders for the distribution of it, take the proofs in respect to the existence of claims on the part of creditors, and go through with the administration of that insolvent and assigned estate precisely as in the case of a deceased person the executor or the administrator does.

Mr. EATON. It is precisely the same in Connecticut.

Mr. MATTHEWS. And I believe it is similar in many other States and I believe would come to be general, if not universal, in the event of the adoption of some such system as this. Such a proceeding, no matter how it eventuates, no matter what takes place in the course of it, does not adjudicate on the question of bankruptcy, nor does it adjudicate upon the question of a discharge. It simply adjudicates upon those questions which arise under the laws of the State in reference to the distribution of the assets according to the terms of the trust. The question of bankruptcy and the question of discharge depend on the facts themselves that are entirely extrinsic to this judicial procedure in respect to the administration of the assignment, and might exist and in all those States in which there are no such systems as those I have mentioned would exist, although there had been no judicial administration of the assignment itself; as, for instance, suppose no law of that kind existed, no statutory mode for the administration of assignments, the assignee as holding the title of the property and loaded with the discharge of the duties of the trust as expressed in the assignment would go on as any other vendee to carry out the object of the trust by reducing the property to cash and distributing it among those entitled, and if he needed any advice might voluntarily go into a court of equity for the purpose of obtaining instructions from that court as to the due administration of his trust; or in case he delayed or in case he defaulted in any particular in the strict performance of the duties of his trust he might be called to account in a court of equity by any creditor who is a cestui que trust under the deed, and compelled specifically to perform and execute his duty.

Now this bill leaves the whole matter at large to be dealt with, so far as the details of the administration of the assets of the bankrupt are concerned, to the local administration whatever that might be, in Connecticut and Ohio under the probate or orphan's court, elsewhere in the absence of any statutory provision to a court of equity or to a general law which charges the assignee with the duty of administering the trust according to its terms. This statute prescribes the terms of the trust, to wit, that it shall be an assignment of all property for the equal benefit of all creditors, and then provides that upon the administration of the assets of the bankrupt so assigned and conveyed if within two years they shall result in a payment to the creditors of 50 per cent. of their claims the fact of that payment under those circumstances shall discharge the insolvent debtor from future liability as to his future acquired property in respect to debts which existed at the date of the assignment.

There are exceptions contained in the first section. So far I have considered the matter in general; and now there are cases in which, no matter if a person does become insolvent and make such an assignment and does pay 50 per cent. of the amount of the claims against him, nevertheless he shall not be entitled to the discharge. They are as follows; it is said:

But said discharge and exemption shall not extend to obligations contracted fraudulently or incurred by means of a breach of trust.

So that every creditor of an insolvent debtor who has made and administered this assignment, whose debt was created on the part of the debtor by a fraud or a breach of trust, still continues to have his debt as a subsisting obligation against the debtor notwithstanding the assignment and notwithstanding the discharge of that debtor as to all other creditors.

In addition to that, the first section provides against certain contingencies which, if they happen by the act of the debtor, make void the whole effect which would otherwise attach to the proceedings under the assignment and prevent them from operating as a discharge in respect to any of his obligations. They are these: if the debtor has fraudulently omitted from his assignment any property; if he has fraudulently concealed any property; or if within six months prior to making the assignment he shall have made any conveyance or disposed of any of his property or suffered the same to be taken in execution or become incumbered by other judicial seizure, with the intent to hinder, delay, or defraud his creditors. In none of these cases shall compliance with the previous provisions of the act have the effect of discharging him from the obligation of these debts; and so, too, if within six months prior to the date of the assignment he has made any conveyance or disposition of any of his property, having reasonable cause to believe himself insolvent, with intent to secure to any one or more of his creditors a preference over the others, that also defeats entirely the operation of what otherwise would constitute a discharge; so that in that event he would still be liable, as to his future-acquired property, to the payment of all his debts existing at the time of the assignment.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Suppose he files an assignment under a State law, legally preferring creditors?

Mr. MATTHEWS. Then he does not come within the purview and operation of this act at all. No person comes within the operation of this act except by one fact, namely, that he makes an assignment in the first place which shall be for the equal benefit of all the creditors without preference; and then, next, he becomes a bankrupt under this statute, if it is passed into an act, if under such an assignment his assets result in a payment of 50 per cent. on the face of the claims of his creditors. Then he becomes a discharged bankrupt; but in no other case, in no other contingency, does he either become a bankrupt or receive a discharge; so that the person making an assignment which, lawful in itself, nevertheless provides for a preference cannot get the benefit of discharge under this act. In order to get the benefit of a discharge under this act the very first step to take is to make an assignment without preference.

The object of limiting the period of distribution to two years as the condition for the discharge is to make it the interest of the debtor that there shall be prompt dispatch made use of in the administration of the trust under his assignment, and he must take the risk of the delays beyond that period; otherwise he gets no benefit of the discharge.

Mr. President, what little machinery is necessary in order to effectuate the intention of the first section is provided in the second. Its first proposition is—

That in any action or suit brought on any claim against any one claiming to have been discharged as a bankrupt, the facts constituting such discharge, as herein declared, may be pleaded in bar of recovery.

Those facts are the two which I have spoken of, the fact of the assignment and the fact that within two years after its date the distribution of assets has been made with the result of paying 50 per cent. of the claims of the creditors. Now as to the mode of proof. The mode of proof may consist, in the first place, of "the record of the finding and judgment of any judicial tribunal in which administration of said assignment may have taken place;" and that is declared to be "evidence of the matters therein contained." The fact of bankruptcy and the fact of discharge are further inferences to be drawn from those facts if sufficient facts are there disclosed, and, if not, they are proof as far as they are competent and relevant. But it proceeds to say that "if said assignment shall not have been judicially administered" then the same "facts may be proven as in other like cases," extrinsic facts depending upon proof which is always, of course, within the reach of the party.

Then follows the further provision in order to prevent multiplicity of suits, for the question of the bankruptcy and of the discharge is supposed to arise in actions brought to enforce obligations which in the event of a discharge are no longer binding upon the person. Now in order to avoid multiplicity of suits, in order to avoid the issues that may be raised in every such suit, the second section goes on to provide a process by which the discharged bankrupt may, upon his own motion and his own petition, obtain a judicial ascertainment and declaration of the fact, and to do that jurisdiction is conferred upon the district court of the United States for the district in which the assignment may have been made. The petition is filed by the bankrupt alleging the facts which he claims to constitute his discharge, and praying for the relief. To that he makes the assignee a party defendant and gives notice according to the local law in other cases of similar constructive service by publication, or as may be determined by orders and regulations made for the purpose of prescribing the course of pleading, procedure, and practice in this litigation by the Supreme Court of the United States, so as to bring in as a class without naming them the entire body of the creditors who are entitled to the benefit of the assets of the bankrupt who may be interested in producing the judicial declaration of his discharge as prayed for in his petition, and the assignee may come in and appear and defend; any creditor for himself or for the common interest may do likewise; a hearing is had, and due proof produced at the petitioner's cost in order that the court shall determine and declare whether the petitioner is discharged as a bankrupt according to the terms of the act. That petition is required to set forth all the facts that are herein declared to be necessary to constitute a discharge, verified by his oath, and also required to negative the various grounds of exception and avoidance specified in the first section.

The judgment in that case, it is declared, "shall be conclusive evidence upon the question of a discharge, except in those cases which by the act are excepted from said discharge." That is, turning back to the first section, those cases of "obligations contracted fraudulently or incurred by means of a breach of trust;" and also from those cases in which it is declared that the discharge shall be avoided; that is, those cases where, upon proof being made, the debtor shall be found to have omitted fraudulently from his assignment property which he ought to have assigned, or to have concealed it, or to have made within six months prior to the date of the assignment the conveyance or disposition of it which, by the terms of the first section, is declared to avoid his discharge, allowed it "to be taken in execution, or incumbered by judicial seizure," or conveyed or disposed of so as to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors, "or with intent, having reasonable cause to believe himself insolvent, to secure to any one or more of his creditors a preference over others."

Mr. DAWES. I am listening with great interest to the Senator from Ohio, but I should like to call his attention to something which does not seem to me to be provided for. He has provided for the mode in which the bankrupt, after he has been declared a bankrupt, shall establish the fact by judicial proceedings. I wish to call his attention to this state of things: After he has made his assignment, and pending the two years, suppose that creditors pursue him with suits, then during the two years is there any provision to meet that case?

Mr. MATTHEWS. The Senator from Massachusetts will observe by recurring to the provisions of the first section of the act, beginning in the fifteenth line, that it is declared that—

Said subsequently acquired property—

That is, property acquired subsequently to the date of the assignment—during two years from the date of said assignment shall be exempt from seizure upon judicial process upon claims existing at the date thereof.

So that this bill, if passed into an act, operates as an injunction during two years pending the administration of the assignment against any attempt on the part of a creditor to levy in execution or take in attachment the property of the debtor.

Mr. DAWES. Perhaps that would secure subsequently acquired property, but it would not secure him personally from a judgment which would bear date subsequent to the day upon which he made the assignment, and back to which day would relate the proceedings adjudicating him to be a bankrupt. I take it that the judgment of the district court would be that upon the day on which he made the assignment he became thereby a bankrupt. Here it might turn out are any number of judgments of a later date, that is, between that day and the end of the two years when he has to perfect the proceedings which, when they are perfected, relate back to that day. Does the Senator see my point?

Mr. MATTHEWS. If I understand the Senator from Massachusetts it is that the bill is defective.

Mr. DAWES. I do not mean to say it is defective. I ask the Senator if that has occurred to him.

Mr. MATTHEWS. If I understand him, he suggests that the bill may be defective in not providing a defense in favor of the defendant in suits brought and decided within the two years during the administration of the assignment. When he speaks of protection of the person, I do not understand him to refer to the right that may exist in any State to arrest and imprison the defendant, but merely to prevent the recovery of a judgment against the person. The suggestion of the Senator is no doubt well-founded. I do not remember, and I do not believe that it occurred to me to make express provision for any such delay in suits brought within that interval as would enable a debtor who might afterward be declared to be a discharged bankrupt to plead that discharge in bar of the recovery in those suits, and the bill ought to be amended, therefore, to carry out its own idea in that respect.

Mr. DAWES. I submit to the Senator that either in the present bankrupt law or in the law of Massachusetts, from which the present bankrupt law was copied largely, there is a provision which requires the courts to continue such cases till the two years have expired, on motion of the defendant, if he desires to have them continued to await that determination.

Mr. MATTHEWS. A similar provision might be and ought to be added to this bill in order to effectuate that which was the intention of the bill itself, for the object of the bill is to give to every debtor who shall be declared ultimately at the end of the two years entitled to a discharge the benefit of that by relation back to the date of his assignment.

Mr. DAWES. Some process that would suspend judicial proceedings against him while he has that opportunity would seem to be necessary somewhere.

Mr. MATTHEWS. It certainly is; I admit it. And now, Mr. President, having, as I think with sufficient clearness, laid before the Senate the specific provisions contained in this bill, I will detain the Senate but a little while longer for the purpose of meeting the only two general objections that I have anticipated may be made to it.

The Constitution of the United States confers upon Congress the power and authority in reference to this subject in these words: in the eighth section of the first article in the enumeration of powers it is declared that the Congress shall have power, among other things, "to establish . . . uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States." That is the charter of our authority; that is the extent of our power; and I admit that no law can be passed under this jurisdiction that does not conform fairly to the meaning and the intent of the Constitution in the clause from which I have read. The law must be "uniform" and it must be a law "on the subject of bankruptcies." Now, does the bill proposed answer to that description in those two particulars? Is it a bankrupt law at all, or is it something else? Is the state of fact in reference to insolvency which is the predicate of this legislation that which is or may be known to our law as a state of bankruptcy? I think that within the terms of the definition of the Constitution as it has been expounded by the Supreme Court of the United States and the ablest text writers, this bill comes within and is comprehended by that definition. And in order to satisfy the Senate upon that point, I call the attention of Senators to the language of the Supreme Court of the United States, speaking by the mouth of Chief-Justice Marshall, in the celebrated case of Sturges vs. Crowninshield, in 4 Wheaton, on page 195. It is there said:

This difficulty of discriminating with any accuracy between insolvent and bankrupt laws, would lead to the opinion that a bankrupt law may contain those regulations which are generally found in insolvent laws; and that an insolvent law may contain those which are common to a bankrupt law. If this be correct, it is obvious that much inconvenience would result from that construction of the Constitution which should deny to the State Legislatures the power of acting on this subject in consequence of the grant to Congress. It may be thought more convenient that much of it should be regulated by State legislation—and Congress may purposely omit to provide for many cases to which their power extends. It does not appear to be a violent construction of the Constitution, and is certainly a convenient one, to consider the power of the States as existing over such cases as the laws of the Union may not reach. But be this as it may the power granted to Congress may be exercised or declined, as the wisdom of that body shall decide. If, in the opinion of Congress, uniform laws concerning bankruptcies ought not to be established, it does not follow that partial laws may not exist, or that State legislation on the subject must cease. It is not the mere existence of the power, but its exercise, which is incompatible with the exercise of the same power by the States. It is not the right to establish these uniform laws, but their actual establishment, which is inconsistent with the partial acts of the States.

In a previous part of the opinion there is a more explicit discussion of what are the essential elements of a bankrupt act as known to the Constitution. On page 193 the court say:

The peculiar terms of the grant certainly deserve notice. Congress is not authorized merely to pass laws the operation of which shall be uniform, but to establish uniform laws on the subject throughout the United States. This establishment of uniformity is, perhaps, incompatible with State legislation on that part of the subject to which the acts of Congress may extend. But the subject is divisible in its nature into bankrupt and insolvent laws; though the line of partition between them is not so distinctly marked as to enable any person to say with positive precision what belongs exclusively to the one and not to the other class of laws. It is said, for example, that laws which merely liberate the person are insolvent laws and those which discharge the contract are bankrupt laws. But if an act of Congress should discharge the person of the bankrupt and leave his future acquisitions liable to his creditors, we should feel much hesitation in saying that this was an insolvent, not a bankrupt, act, and therefore unconstitutional. Another distinction has been stated and has been uniformly observed. Insolvent laws operate at the instance of an imprisoned debtor; bankrupt laws at the instance of a creditor. But should an act of Congress authorize a commission of bankruptcy to issue on the application of a debtor, a court would scarcely be warranted in saying that the law was unconstitutional and the commission a nullity.

And, accordingly, since the date of this decision the voluntary feature in our bankruptcy system has come to be definitely within the power of Congress to establish.

When laws of each description may be passed by the same Legislature, it is unnecessary to draw a precise line between them. The difficulty can arise only in our complex system, where the Legislature of the Union possesses the power of enacting bankrupt laws, and those of the States the power of enacting insolvent laws. If it be determined that they are not laws of the same character, but are as distinct as bankrupt laws and laws which regulate the course of descents, a distinct line of separation must be drawn, and the power of each government marked with precision. But all perceive that this line must be in a great degree arbitrary. Although the two systems have existed apart from each other, there is such a connection between them as to render it difficult to say how far they may be blended together. The bankrupt law is said to grow out of the exigencies of commerce, and to be applicable solely to traders; but it is not easy to say who must be excluded from, or may be included within, this description. It is, like every other part of the subject, one on which the Legislature may exercise an extensive discretion.

I beg also to refer to the same doctrine as expressed by Mr. Justice Story in the second volume of his Commentaries on the Constitution, sections 1111, 1112, and 1113. I call attention specially to the point that Judge Story shows very distinctly that the fact that the English system of bankruptcy was an involuntary system, and in that respect distinguishable from insolvent acts, is not to be regarded as establishing the law under our Constitution as confining bankruptcy to what was known to be bankruptcy according to the definition of the English statute. He says:

SEC. 1111. What laws are to be deemed bankrupt laws within the meaning of the Constitution, has been a matter of much forensic discussion and argument. Attempts have been made to distinguish between bankrupt laws and insolvent laws. For example, it has been said that laws which merely liberate the person of the debtor are insolvent laws, and those which discharge the contract are bankrupt laws. But it would be very difficult to sustain this distinction by any uniformity of laws at home or abroad. In some of the States, laws, known as insolvent laws, discharge the person only; in others, they discharge the contract. And if Congress were to pass a bankrupt act, which should discharge the person only of the bankrupt, and leave his future acquisitions liable to his creditors, there would be great difficulty in saying that such an act was not in the sense of the Constitution a bankrupt act, and so within the power of Congress. Again, it has been said that insolvent laws act on imprisoned debtors only at their own instance, and bankrupt laws only at the instance of creditors. But, however true this may have been in past times, as the actual course of English legislation, it is not true and never was true as a distinction in colonial legislation. In England it was an accident in the system, and not a material ground to discriminate, who were to be deemed in a legal sense insolvents or bankrupts. And if an act of Congress should be passed which should authorize a commission of bankruptcy to issue at the instance of the debtor, no court would on this account be warranted in saying that the act was unconstitutional and the commission a nullity.

It is believed that no laws ever were passed in America by the colonies or States, which had the technical denomination of "bankrupt laws." But insolvent laws, quite coextensive with the English bankrupt system in their operations and objects, have not been infrequent in colonial and State legislation. No distinction was ever practically, or even theoretically, attempted to be made between bankruptcies and insolvencies. And a historical review of the colonial and State legislation will abundantly show that a bankrupt law may contain those regulations which are generally found in insolvent laws and that an insolvent law may contain those which are common to bankrupt laws.

SEC. 1112. The truth is, that the English system of bankruptcy, as well as the name, was borrowed from the continental jurisprudence, and derivatively from the Roman law. "We have fetched," says Lord Coke, "as well the name, as the wickedness of bankrupts, from foreign nations; for banquer in the French is mensa, and a banquer or cashanger is mensarius; and route is a sign or mark, as we say a cart-route is the sign or mark where the cart hath gone. It is not trially it is taken for him that hath wasted his estate, and removed his banque no as there is left but a mention thereof. Some say it should be derived from banque and rumpere as he that hath broken his bank or state. Mr. Justice Blackstone inclines strongly to this latter intimation, saying that the word is derived from the word bancus or banque, which signifies the table or counter of a tradesman, and rumpere, broken; denoting thereby one whose shop or place of trade is broken and gone. It is observable that the first statute against bankrupt "is against such persons as do make bankrupt" (34 Hen. 8, ch. 4.) which is a literal translation of the French idiom, qui font banque route.

SEC. 1113. The system of discharging persons who were unable to pay their debts was transferred from the Roman law into continental jurisprudence at an early period. To the glory of Christianity let it be said that the law of cessio bonorum was introduced by the Christian emperors of Rome, whereby, if a debtor ceded or yielded up all his property to his creditors, he was secured from being dragged to jail, omni quoque corporali cruciatus semoto; for, as the emperor (Justinian) justly observed, inhumanum erat spoliatum fortunis suis in solidum damnari; a noble declaration, which the American Republics would do well to follow, and not merely to praise. Neither by the Roman nor the continental law was the cessio bonorum confined to traders, but it extended to all persons. It may be added that the cessio bonorum of the Roman law and that which at present prevails in most parts of the continent of Europe, only exempted the debtor from imprisonment. It did not release or discharge the debt or exempt the future acquisitions of the debtor from execution for the debt. The English statute, commonly called the "lords' act," went no further than to discharge the debtor's person.

And it may be laid down, as the law of Germany, France, Holland, Scotland, and England, that their insolvent laws are not more extensive in their operation than the cessio bonorum of the civil law. In some parts of Germany, we are informed by Huberus and Heineccius a cessio bonorum does not even work a discharge of the debtor's person, and much less of his future effects. But with a view to the advancement of commerce, and the benefit of creditors, the systems now commonly known by the name of "bankrupt laws" were introduced; and allowed a proceeding to be had at the instance of the creditors against an unwilling debtor, when he did not choose to yield up his property; or, as it is phrased in our law, bankrupt laws were originally proceedings in invitum. In the English system the bankrupt laws are limited to persons who are traders or connected with matters of trade and commerce, as such persons are peculiarly liable to accidental losses and to an inability of paying their debts without any fault of their own. But this is a mere matter of policy, and by no means enters into the nature of such laws. There is nothing in the nature or reason of such laws to prevent their being applied to any other class of unfortunate and meritorious debtors.

Mr. President, we have it established by the Supreme Court of the United States that this power existing in Congress may be exercised or not exercised at all in its discretion; and, if exercised, may be exercised to the extent and degree which the discretion of Congress may choose to establish. It may operate upon all debtors, or it may operate only upon certain classes of debtors, or it may operate only upon a single class of debtors. In other words, having reference to the general nature of the subject, to wit, the distribution of the assets of an insolvent, after he has committed an act of insolvency or become unable to pay his debts in the ordinary course of business as they fall due, Congress is at liberty to choose its definition of what shall be or what shall not be a bankruptcy, as it pleases. So I think the objection cannot be well taken against this sort of bankrupt act proposed in this bill where its operation is limited to the voluntary act of a class of debtors who may choose to come within the purview of its provisions, by making the general assignment which constitutes the foundation of every other step to be taken under it.

The next objection to which I wish to advert is in reply to the question whether, supposing this to be a law on the subject of bankruptcy, it is a uniform law. I understand that a law is uniform which operates in the same way, in the same circumstances, everywhere where it operates at all. It is not essential to the idea of uniformity that it should embrace all debtors of every description. The fact that it operates in reference to some debtors and not to others, I have already shown is not essential to the idea of a bankrupt act; and if a bankrupt act may exclude from its operation certain classes of debtors and still be a constitutional bankrupt act, it is uniform if it applies to that class of debtors everywhere where it operates at all. In other words, the classification of the persons some of whom are to fall within and others of whom are to fall without the definition of a bankrupt, has no relation to the question of uniformity. That has relation only to the question of its being or not being a bankrupt act. Let me illustrate how classifications may take place without destroying the uniformity of the operation of the act. The constitution of the State of Ohio contains a provision which forbids the creation or organization of any corporation except by general law. No municipal corporation can be created in Ohio, no city, town, or village can be incorporated by a special charter; it can be done only by a general charter, it can be done only by a general act. Another provision declares that all laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation throughout the State. It was manifest that municipal corporations were of very different kinds; some were large and some were small, some were situated on rivers, and some on lakes, and some inland, and there was required a different set of provisions according to the different class of corporations into which municipalities might be divided; so that in legislating under that provision of the constitution the General Assembly of Ohio classified municipal corporations into cities of the first class, and cities of the second class, and incorporated villages, giving to each one of the classes powers differing from those powers conferred upon the others, but to each one of a class giving the same power that was given to all the others in that class. Upon that, on judicial contest, it was declared that that classification, that differentiation of the powers conferred on corporate bodies, was strictly within the limits of the constitutional authority of the General Assembly.

Now in this case this bill makes a definition of what shall constitute a bankrupt, and that definition prevails throughout the United States within all the States and Territories. It defines what shall constitute a discharge of that bankrupt so that his future-acquired property shall be exempt from judgments rendered upon claims existing at the time of the assignment, and their discharge is the same throughout all the United States, in every State and in every Territory. How, then, can it be said that the law will act otherwise than uniformly? And if it acts uniformly, then it is a uniform law.

There are variations, to be sure, or may be, in respect to provisions in the States which may be called into exercise by persons who are claiming the benefit of this act in the distribution of the assets, but they do not destroy the uniformity of this bill if it become an act; they do not affect its operation at all. They only provide a means for working out a certain result which would be worked out anyhow under the laws of the State without respect to any legislation on the part of Congress. Congress simply comes in and by virtue of this jurisdiction says "if the debtor does a certain act and that act results in a certain consequence to his creditors, the two taken together shall constitute him a discharged bankrupt," and he is so no matter whether he be a citizen of one State or another, no matter whether his assets are administered under a system of one State or another.

The same facts which create his bankruptcy and establish his discharge exist, no matter where his citizenship or domicile is, and they apply to the citizens of all the States; so that it seems to me that, however it may appear upon first sight, upon examination it will further appear that there is no ground for objecting to or criticising this measure for want of that unanimity in its operation which is required by the Constitution.

Why, Mr. President, even under the present bankrupt act, there are certain inequalities which exist, wrought out by the operation of State systems of legislation, as for instance in respect to exemptions of property made exempt by the bankrupt act from its operation, so as not to be included within the schedule and inventory of the assets, the title of which passes to the assignee in bankruptcy for distribution, and those exemptions are the exemptions established by the local law and adopted into the general act of Congress.

Mr. President, I think that the Senate owes to itself and to the country an earnest effort, even if it requires some delay beyond that which has already occurred, to see if there be no remedy for the existing state of things other than that of an absolute, immediate, and unconditional repeal of the bankrupt act. I, for one, shall be loath to come to that conclusion until I am driven to it, for I know no period in the history of our country in which it seems to me to be less opportune to take away all of that remedial system which belongs to a scheme of bankruptcy. There never was a time when there was more debt, a larger number of debtors, more insolvency actually existing and more insolvency apprehended than exists to-day. And while I admit the inefficiency of the present system, while I am conscious by experience of its costliness, and while I have testimony abundant and conclusive that in many cases it has been made the cover of fraud, still it does seem to me that the experience of the civilized world of commercial nations, and our own experience too, establishes the fact that we ought to have a bankrupt system.

We have had now I believe three bankrupt acts. This is the third. Two of them went into existence, were allowed to have their temporary effect, and were then swept out of existence. Now, after the experiment of these few years, we are called upon to seriously consider the question whether we shall again add the weight of our condemnation to every effort to establish the system. Certainly, Mr. President, there is nothing wrong in the essential idea of the bankrupt system, and that is of furnishing to the honest and unfortunate debtor who surrenders all his property equally for the benefit of all his creditors and who has not been guilty of such imprudence as to waste his estate beyond the extent of one-half the value of his debts, I say there is nothing wrong in the idea, upon those conditions, of furnishing to such a person the opportunity, freed from the burden of his past obligations, of again entering into the strife and contest of business, the opportunity without the leave and license of his creditors to endeavor to lay up something, even if it be a little, in store for a rainy day, for the benefit of himself and of his wife and children, for wife and children in one sense and in a high sense are also the creditors of every man fortunate enough to have them, creditors entitled to consideration, entitled to respect, whose interests ought to be the subject of the fostering care of our national legislation. And in the name and for the benefit of all such debtors similarly situated, I invoke the earnest effort of this Congress to see if some measure cannot be matured and adopted which, while it shall secure to them these benefits to which they are entitled, shall not also work wrong, injury, and injustice to those who give them credit. It is in the hope that something to that end may yet be reached, that I have ventured to submit this proposition.

Mr. McCREERY. Mr. President—

Mr. SARGENT. I suppose the Senator does not wish to speak now.

Mr. McCREERY. I intended to make a brief remark.

Mr. SARGENT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BLAINE. May I inquire of the Senator from Kentucky if he expects a vote to-morrow on this bill?

Mr. McCREERY. I should be glad to have it to-morrow.

Mr. BLAINE. I reported the deficiency bill yesterday, for which the different Departments are under very great pressure. If the Senator will allow me to call it up now, so that it will be the unfinished business for to-morrow, I shall be obliged to him.

Mr. McCREERY. That may be considered informally if it is desired.

Mr. BLAINE. Then to-morrow, at the close of the morning hour, I will ask the Senator to yield for that purpose.

Mr. McCREERY. I having the floor on this question.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

Mr. SARGENT. Before the question is put on my motion I desire to say on behalf of my colleague [Mr. BOOTH] that some ten days or two weeks ago he expressed a desire to speak to the resolution on the Chinese question which I laid on the table and spoke about. I am anxious that the resolution shall go to the committee for consideration, and on his behalf I will ask that he be heard to-morrow morning during the morning hour. I understand his remarks will be quite brief.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will take notice of the request of the Senator from California.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SARGENT. I renew my motion for an executive session.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and fifty-four minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened and (at five o'clock and fifty-four minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, April 10, 1878.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate by Mr. SYMPSON, one of the clerks, announced that the Senate insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 3064) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WINDOM, Mr. ALLISON, and Mr. EATON conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Senate further insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 3102) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to employ temporary clerks and making an appropriation for the same; also making appropriations for detecting trespass on public lands and for bringing into market public lands in certain States, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WINDOM, Mr. DORSEY, and Mr. BECK conferees on the part of the Senate.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WOOD. I desire to say to the House that there was an understanding between the Committee of Ways and Means and the Committee on Appropriations and that the former committee has no intention or disposition to antagonize them in their bills when they are ready. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SMITH] is now prepared to go on with the pension appropriation bill. It is an important bill, and I therefore yield the floor to him for the purpose of reporting the action of the committee on that bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania in a moment. There are three or four gentlemen who desire to introduce bills and who had no opportunity to do so upon Monday and the Chair thinks that their request is not unreasonable; but the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] desires to present a question of privilege to the House.

CEILING OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. YOUNG. I am instructed by the Select Committee upon the Ventilation of the Hall to offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk, and I desire to make a very brief explanation of it. Above the sky-light of this Hall no one is allowed to go, except the electrician. No one else is allowed to go there, but we find it necessary, in order to have this Hall properly lighted, that the glass should be washed and the screens adjusted every day. Now, there is no laborer who can be assigned to that duty, and this resolution proposes to provide for one.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the resolution is a question of privilege, and entertains it.

The Clerk read the resolution of Mr. YOUNG, as follows:

Resolved, That the electrician of the Capitol be, and is hereby, authorized to employ a laborer to attend to adjusting the blinds under the main sky-light, and cleaning the glass in the ceiling of the Hall of the House of Representatives, and that said assistant be paid the salary now allowed to laborers on the Doorkeeper's roll. And be it further resolved, That the lighting of the Hall and the electrician be under the exclusive control of the Architect of the Capitol extension: Provided, however, That no person shall go above the sky-light while the House is in session.

Mr. YOUNG. I ask that the resolution be put upon its passage.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to ask the gentleman whether that resolution does not interfere with the present rule that puts access to the upper part of the Hall entirely in the hands of the Speaker? It was found necessary to do that. An accident occurred here which came near costing us the life of a member; for some employé stepped upon one of these panes of glass in the sky-light and broke the glass so that a portion of it fell to the floor of the House. The upper portion of the House was then placed absolutely under the control of the Speaker.

Mr. YOUNG. I do not think that this resolution will interfere with that rule.

Mr. CLYMER. Can this resolution be considered without unanimous consent? It takes money out of the contingent fund of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has taken exclusive control, under a resolution of the House and under action of the Committee on Rules, and during the session of Congress keeps in his possession the key leading to the room over the ceiling of the House where the gas-jets are located, and prevents anybody from going there during the sessions of the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. I suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee that he allow the resolution to go to the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. That committee has a right to report at any time.

Mr. YOUNG. A man has to be employed to go up there every day to wash the glass and arrange the screens, and there is no one who can now be assigned to that duty, but I have no objection to having the resolution referred to the Committee on Rules.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Rules.

W. J. NEELEY.

Mr. RIDDLE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4250) for the relief of W. J. Neeley, late postmaster at Hartsville, Tennessee; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

WINDER'S BUILDING.

Mr. WARD, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4251) to extend Winder's building, for the use of the War Department; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

GEORGE PENDLETON.

Mr. POLLARD, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4252) granting a pension to George Pendleton; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. POLLARD also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4253) to provide indemnity due to the several States under acts of Congress approved March 2, 1855, and March 3, 1857, relating to swamp and overflowed lands, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

LAND CLAIMS ON LINE OF NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. STEWART, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4254) to authorize claimants upon even-numbered sections of land within the twenty-mile limits of the Northern Pacific Railroad to make proof and payment for their claims at the ordinary minimum rate at $1.25 per acre; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

CURRENCY.

Mr. FULLER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4255) to authorize an issue of Treasury notes, the taking up of the greenbacks and national-bank notes, to prohibit a contraction of the currency, and to repeal the internal-revenue laws; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

GEORGE GOULD.

Mr. HUBBELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4256) for the relief of George Gould, of Stephenson, Menominee County, Michigan; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

ARMY AND NAVY BANDS.

Mr. COX, of New York, by unanimous consent, presented a joint resolution (H. R. No. 154) in reference to the employment of the Army and Navy bands; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

GEORGE A. SCHREINER.

Mr. HASKELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4257) for the relief of George A. Schreiner; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ABSENTEE SHAWNEE LANDS IN KANSAS.

Mr. HASKELL also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4258) for the relief of settlers upon the absentee Shawnee lands in Kansas, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ALEXANDER B. NUCKOLLS.

Mr. BELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4259) for the relief of Alexander B. Nuckolls, of Forsyth County, Georgia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Claims, and ordered to be printed.

UNITED STATES SURVEYOR-GENERAL, CALIFORNIA.

Mr. PAGE, by unanimous consent, presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, relating to the office of United States surveyor-general of California; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

ISSUE OF ARMS TO THE TERRITORIES.

Mr. BANNING. I ask unanimous consent to report back, without amendment, from the Committee on Military Affairs, for immediate passage, the bill (H. R. No. 3679) to amend a joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to issue arms, approved July 3, 1876.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read for information, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The bill was read. It provides that the joint resolution approved July 3, 1876, entitled "A joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to issue arms," be amended by inserting in the fifth line, after the word "States" and before "each," the word "Territories," and by striking out after the word "each," in the fifth line, and before the word "provided," in the sixth line, the words "and not more than five hundred to each of said Territories."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill? [A pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BANNING. A single word of explanation may be necessary in regard to this bill. Under the law as it now stands one thousand arms may be issued to each of the States, but only five hundred to any one of the Territories. This bill proposes to authorize the Secretary of War to issue as many arms, if required, to a Territory as to a State. The matter will be in his discretion. The Department has the arms, and recommends this bill, which was introduced by the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FENN] who says that his Territory is in great need of arms for the protection of its citizens.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BANNING moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NEUFCHÂTEL ROCK PAVING COMPANY.

Mr. DOUGLAS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4260) for the relief of the Neufchâtel Rock Paving Company; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

LOUIS C. SANDS.

Mr. BAGLEY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4261) for the relief of Louis C. Sands, of Herkimer County, New York; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Claims, and ordered to be printed.

CAPTAIN JAMES H. FRAZEE.

Mr. SEXTON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4262) granting a pension to Captain James H. Frazee, of Rushville, Indiana; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

BUILDING FOR USE OF WAR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. BLISS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4263) to extend Winder's building, for the use of the War Department; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

A. H. RICHARDSON.

Mr. DAVIS, of California, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4264) for the relief of A. H. Richardson; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

TREASURY INVESTIGATION.

Mr. GLOVER. I ask unanimous consent to introduce for adoption now the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department be, and they are hereby, authorized to send subcommittees to such points as in the judgment of the committee may be necessary, to take testimony.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I must demand the regular order.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I hope the gentleman will not interrupt the introduction of bills for reference only.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object to bills for reference? Mr. PHILLIPS. I do not object to reference, but will not consent to bills being introduced for action.

Mr. GLOVER. I ask, then, to have that referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

GOTTLÖB GROEZINGER.

Mr. LUTTRELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4265) for the relief of Gottlob Groezinger; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Claims, and ordered to be printed.

R. SPROUL.

Mr. JACOBS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4266) for the relief of R. Sproul, of Washington Territory; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Claims, and ordered to be printed.

ELIZABETH CHANCE.

Mr. REAGAN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4267) for the relief of Elizabeth Chance, widow of Eli Chance, to indemnify her for loss incurred by rejection of her claim for pension under act of February 14, 1871; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

BRIDGE-PIER BOOMS.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4268) to compel the construction of bridge-pier booms on all bridges over the Missouri River; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

DARWIN J. TRUE.

Mr. DUNNELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4269) to remove the charge of desertion against Darwin J. True, late of Company G, Twenty-first Regiment Kentucky Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

EDWARD P. JOHNSON.

Mr. STRAIT, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4270) for the relief of Edward P. Johnson; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

JOSEPH W. HASTINGS.

Mr. NORCROSS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4271) for the relief of Joseph W. Hastings; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN M. LORD.

Mr. COBB, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4272) for the relief of John M. Lord, of Indiana; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

R. W. HUNTER.

Mr. MORRISON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4273) for the relief of R. W. Hunter; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Accounts, and ordered to be printed.

ROBERT TILLSON AND MAITLAND BOON.

Mr. KNAPP, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4274) for the relief of Robert Tillson and Maitland Boon, of the State of Illinois; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

MEMBERS OF CONGRESS AS ADVISORY ATTORNEYS.

Mr. TURNER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4275) to make it illegal for any member of either House of Congress to act as general advisory attorney for certain corporations and patentees; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, and ordered to be printed.

EXECUTIVE PATRONAGE.

Mr. TURNER also, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 155) directing the House and Senate Committees on Civil Service Reform to inquire into the propriety of limiting Executive patronage by constitutional amendment, and inquire into the propriety of adopting some new method of keeping the accounts of the Federal Government, by which they can be held to a more rigid accountability; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, and ordered to be printed.

PEREA'S BATTALION, NEW MEXICO.

Mr. ROMERO, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4276) to provide for the payment of Perea's battalion of militia, organized in the Territory of New Mexico at large in November and December, 1861, and January, 1862, to serve three months in the service of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I demand the regular order.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I desire the House to resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of taking up the regular pension appropriation bill.

Mr. CONGER. I hope we will be allowed to have a morning hour.

Mr. REAGAN. I must insist on the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour can be reached by voting down the motion to go into committee.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Is the gentleman from Pennsylvania desirous to antagonize the morning hour?

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I do not wish to do it if it can be helped.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Then, wait until after the morning hour.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. It is absolutely necessary that this pension appropriation bill should be passed without further delay.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania propose to set aside the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Pennsylvania to make the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] has indicated that he desires to have a morning hour if he can reach it. But the Chair desires to state that the first business in order now, if the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania did not prevail, would be the unfinished business, which is the District of Columbia bill.

Mr. REAGAN. Is the motion to go into Committee of the Whole in order before the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. The motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union is in order at any time.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I insist on my motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and gives notice that his object is to consider the pension appropriation bill.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania, there were—ayes 115, noes 55.

Mr. CHALMERS called for tellers.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Can a majority suspend the rules so as to set aside the morning hour by going into Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. It can. The Clerk will read Rule 104.

The Clerk read as follows:

104. The House may at any time, by a vote of a majority of the members present, suspend the rules and orders for the purpose of going into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The question being taken on ordering tellers, there were ayes 16, not one-fifth of a quorum.

So tellers were not ordered; and the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was agreed to.

CLAIMS AGAINST THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. POTTER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4277) providing for the judicial ascertainment of claims against the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Civil-Service Reform, and ordered to be printed.

SESSIONS OF CONGRESS.

Mr. POTTER also, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 156) proposing an amendment to the Constitution as to the sessions of Congress; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Civil-Service Reform, and ordered to be printed.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House, pursuant to order, resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. GARFIELD in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of the special order, being the pension appropriation bill.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Chairman, I dislike to have the Chair assume what was not stated by the Chair before the House went into Committee of the Whole. There was no motion to go into Committee of the Whole to consider the pension bill. As I was caught yesterday by that assumption I do not propose to be caught again in the same way to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. The occupant of the chair has only at this moment arrived in the Hall and only knows what was the object in going into committee from what the Speaker stated.

Mr. CONGER. There was a notice given, and only a notice, that it was for the purpose when we were in Committee of the Whole of considering the pension appropriation bill. I do not make this point in order to oppose proceeding with the pension appropriation bill, but only that the precedent may not be established.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) We may as well understand this just now as at any other time. The motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union is always in order; and it has generally been supplemented by a statement, as it were in parenthesis, by the gentleman who made the motion that his object was to take up a particular bill. The same majority vote by which the House resolved to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with a statement of the object given under such circumstances, has usually been considered as a test vote, showing the desire of the House when they got into Committee of the Whole to consider the bill to which reference was made. And in addition to that the rules themselves give preference to general appropriation bills when the House goes into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CONGER. There is no doubt about that. But it is only a day or two since, by a remark made in parenthesis, the Committee of the Whole were deprived of the opportunity of determining what they should consider. Now in this particular case I am desirous of considering the pension bill. When the tariff bill was up for consideration, by an addition sotto voce, which I did not understand, the House was assumed to have voted to take that bill up in committee and the Chair so ruled. I make this point now because the Chair has no right to determine, unless the House has so determined, what the committee shall take up.

Mr. SAYLER. I would like to say a word about this. The House has the right under the rules to suspend the rules and go into Committee of the Whole by a majority vote for the consideration of an appropriation bill; and if the gentleman from Michigan knows anything at all about the rules he knows that. Now I would like to know from the gentleman from Michigan whether he means to indicate that it was by any sotto voce arrangement on my part that anything was done.

Mr. CONGER. I made no special allusion to the gentleman, unless the gentleman wishes to appropriate it to himself against my will.

Mr. SAYLER. That I certainly do not desire to do. Then I want to say in the hearing of the gentleman from Michigan that he certainly knows that the House has the right to suspend the rules for the purpose of going into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of appropriation bills by a majority vote; and the only ruling that was made yesterday either by the Speaker or by the Chairman of the committee was that by unanimous consent the House could suspend the rules and go into the Committee of the Whole for any purpose.

Mr. CONGER. No one disputed that. But the question then was not upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I would like to state further for the information of the gentleman from Michigan as to the special order—

Mr. CONGER. On this floor the gentleman from Pennsylvania and I are equal; and I was speaking at the moment.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I thought the gentleman was through. The gentleman from Michigan is quite my equal, whether I am on this floor or in the chair.

Mr. CONGER. I said that to the motion made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] yesterday there was added a motion to go into Committee of the Whole to consider a particular bill, which according to all the authorities of parliamentary law required unanimous consent, but, by the decision of the Chair, it not being objected to, was made a part of the resolution. And when to-day the Chair announced that the motion was to go into Committee of the Whole to consider a particular bill, I simply stated that while I was in favor of considering that bill I did not wish the decision of the Chair to be taken as a precedent.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) Is the gentleman through?

Mr. CONGER. I am through.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) The gentleman states he is through and therefore I would like to say that yesterday a motion was made to go into Committee of the Whole upon a special order. On reflecting over the matter and examining the decision of former Speakers I have come to the conclusion that such a motion is admissible as to the tariff bill. But the Chair did not yesterday assume that that was the rule of the House. He stated that no point of order was made against the introduction of the motion as made by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD,] and therefore the gentleman who occupied the chair in the Committee of the Whole decided that it had been adopted by unanimous consent, no objection having been raised. The question the gentleman now raises is whether the House has not a right after having made a special order to vote on a motion to go into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of reaching that special order. I recollect very well, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] who was present at that time and had something to do with the subject will recollect it also, that General Schenck, the then chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, always maintained the right to go into Committee of the Whole upon the tariff bill.

Mr. WOOD. The gentleman from Michigan says he did not hear or understand my motion yesterday. He should not therefore undertake to criticize what he did not hear or understand.

Now, I go further than either the Speaker or the gentleman who presided yesterday in Committee of the Whole. I hold that it is competent for the House to instruct a Committee of the House, as it did yesterday, by what was tantamount to a unanimous vote, what they shall do, what bill they shall take up. The House having thus unanimously resolved to go into Committee of the Whole to take up a special bill, when the House goes into Committee of the Whole it is not necessary to go over the Calendar of bills and lay them aside until the bill which the House has ordered them to consider shall be reached.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to say one word further. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD,] contrary to his usual custom, begs the question. The Chairman of the committee stated yesterday that the bill came up upon the theory that unanimous consent was given in the House for its consideration. The gentleman says it was by unanimous consent, when the record shows there was a vote and that some members voted against it.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) The Chair did not state that. The Chair stated that the introduction of the motion, in the manner in which it was stated by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD,] had been allowed by unanimous consent, and that then that having been done it was within the competency of the House to pass upon it.

Mr. CONGER. The Chair decided that it was equivalent to unanimous consent.

Mr. BURCHARD. I do not understand that any point of order is made against the consideration of the appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. In assuming the chair, the Chair understood that a special order had been made to go into Committee of the Whole to consider a particular bill. The Chair is informed now that the motion was to go into the Committee of the Whole, with an intimation that the gentleman who made that motion would move to consider the pension appropriation bill. We are therefore in Committee of the Whole subject to the will of the majority as to what we shall do, but the Chair finds that the pension bill is not a special order, but Rule 114 gives appropriation bills preference, and if the gentleman in charge of the pension bill moves to take it up the Chair will entertain that motion.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) The effect of that rule is to give preference to that bill over any other.

The CHAIRMAN. In obedience to that rule, the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SMITH] to move to consider the pension appropriation bill.

Mr. McMAHON. I hope there will be no objection to that motion. We have passed a bill providing for pensioning the soldiers of the war of 1812, but this bill has to pass before they can realize on their claims. Under this bill they are authorized to be paid immediately, and I trust there will be no objection to its consideration.

The question was taken on Mr. SMITH's motion; and it was agreed to.

The bill was read.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to offer the amendments which I send to the desk. The Clerk read as follows:

In the thirty-seventh line, after the word "Treasury" insert "and the Secretary of the Interior;" so that the last paragraph will read: "That from and after July 1, 1878, or as soon thereafter as practicable, pensions shall be paid by the Treasurer of the United States, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of the Interior," &c.

In the thirty-eighth line strike out "96" and insert "130;" so as to read: "and the sum of $130,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary," &c.

In the forty-first line, before the word "provided," insert the following: "Provided, That the pensioner and his witness may make affidavit to the voucher before any United States officer authorized to administer oaths or before any collector of the internal revenue, who is hereby authorized and required to administer the oath, said oath to be administered free of charge: And provided, That where the affidavit has been made before such officers or justices of the peace, a certificate of the prothonotary or clerk of the court shall not be necessary unless specially demanded by the Third Auditor: And provided further, That false swearing before the said United States officers shall be deemed perjury and subject the offender to the penalty of the same: And provided further, That the voucher may be modified or dispensed with if, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior, the Treasurer of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury, the same can be done without detriment to the Government."

In the forty-seventh line, and after the word "and," insert "an act establishing paying pension agencies and;" so as to read: "And an act establishing paying pension agencies and all acts and supplements of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed."

The CHAIRMAN. The bill will be read by paragraphs for amendment, and as the paragraphs to which these amendments relate are reached they will be voted on.

Mr. POWERS. I wish to inquire how much time is to be allowed for general debate.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. It was not expected that more than an hour would be desired for general debate.

Mr. POWERS. The arrangement, as I understood, with the gentleman reporting this bill was that of the hour for general debate he would yield half to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT] and myself, representing the Committee on Invalid Pensions, who have some interest in this measure. This is the arrangement as we understood it. I wish to say something on this bill.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I did not understand that the gentleman wanted half an hour.

Mr. POWERS. I only wish fifteen minutes for myself, but the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT] will desire some time. I supposed that we would be allowed half an hour on behalf of the Committee on Invalid Pensions and that the other half would be occupied by the gentleman.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I want an hour for myself.

The CHAIRMAN. There is as yet no limit fixed for the debate.

Mr. POWERS. It is understood, then, that after the gentleman from Pennsylvania has concluded I shall be recognized on behalf of the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. HANNA. I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill whether it is the bill that undertakes to abolish all pension agencies in the several States.

A MEMBER. It is.

Mr. HANNA. If it is, some of us would like an opportunity to examine it. It is a measure that vitally affects the pensioners in every State of the Union. It proposes a radical change, to which some of us are decidedly opposed. I trust there will be no effort to force the measure through without having it properly considered.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will remind the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HANNA] that no limit for general debate has yet been fixed. Only the House can fix such a limit.

Mr. POWERS. Is it understood that I am to be recognized after the gentleman from Pennsylvania is through? I have an amendment which I desire to offer under instruction of the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I have no objection to allowing the gentleman from Maine [Mr. POWERS] and his committee to be fully heard. In reply to my friend from Indiana, [Mr. HANNA,] I will say that there is no disposition on my part or on the part of the Committee on Appropriations to rush this bill through without due consideration. The bill has been reported for some weeks past and gentlemen will find it on their files. It was reported on the 19th of March last.

The provisions of this bill are somewhat new. Two features in it particularly claim attention. The first relates to the increase of appropriations over and above those of last year. This increase is the result of the passage of the act of March 9, 1878, by which the surviving soldiers of the war of 1812 and their widows are placed on the pension-roll. It is estimated by the Commissioner of Pensions that the number entitled to pensions under that act will not be less than twenty-two thousand; but he asks at this time an appropriation for only fifteen thousand, which will require the sum of $1,499,474. These beneficiaries of the Government being far advanced in life and many of them in stringent circumstances, their claims should be promptly adjusted. I am assured by the Commissioner that every effort will be made in this direction.

I have here a table showing the number of pensioners on the rolls at the termination of each fiscal year since 1861 and the amount of pensions paid each year from 1861 to 1877, inclusive. It is an interesting table. The number of pensioners in 1861 was 8,636, and the amount then paid was $1,034,599 73. The number on the rolls in 1877 was 232,104, and the amount paid in that year was $27,963,752 27. I incorporate the table as part of my remarks.

Number of pensioners on the roll at the termination of each fiscal year since 1861, and the amount of pensions paid each year from 1861 to 1877, inclusive.

Year.	Number.	Amount.
1861.....	8,636	$1,034,599 73
1862.....	8,169	852,170 47
1863.....	14,791	1,078,513 36

1865.....	85,986	16,347,621 34
1866.....	126,722	15,605,549 88
1867.....	153,184	20,936,551 71
1868.....	169,643	23,782,386 78
1869.....	187,963	28,476,621 78
1870.....	198,686	28,340,292 17
1871.....	207,495	34,443,894 88
1872.....	232,229	38,533,402 76
1873.....	238,411	39,359,426 86
1874.....	236,241	39,038,414 66
1875.....	234,821	39,456,216 22
1876.....	232,137	28,257,395 69
1877.....	232,104	27,963,752 27

The other feature of this bill is entirely new, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HANNA] is correct in stating that it deserves to be carefully considered. I propose to state certain facts for the consideration of the Committee of the Whole; and if those facts induce them to reach the same conclusion that I have reached in the examination I know what will be the result.

By the act of 1867, the President of the United States is authorized to establish pension agencies for the purpose of paying pensioners at such places as he may deem proper, and appoint agents, not less than three for each State and Territory. Under this privilege he would be authorized to appoint one hundred and thirty-eight agents. Under this law the President appointed fifty-eight, who continued to act as such until May 7, 1877, when they were consolidated into eighteen agencies.

On this subject I read from the report of the Commissioner of Pensions, page 9:

On the 7th of May an order was issued by the President, which was afterward modified as to the location of two of the agencies, by which the number of the agencies for the payment of pensions was reduced from fifty-eight to eighteen, by consolidating seven agencies in Maine, New Hampshire, and Vermont into one agency at Concord, New Hampshire; four agencies in Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Rhode Island into one agency at Boston, Massachusetts; four agencies in New York into two agencies, one at the city of New York and one at Canandaigua; three agencies in Pennsylvania into two agencies, one at Philadelphia and one at Pittsburgh; four agencies in New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, and District of Columbia into one agency at Washington; five agencies in Virginia, West Virginia, Tennessee, and North Carolina into one agency at Knoxville, Tennessee; two agencies in Kentucky into one agency at Louisville; three agencies in Arkansas, Mississippi, and Louisiana into one agency at New Orleans; three agencies in Indiana into one agency at Indianapolis; four agencies in Illinois into one agency at Chicago; four agencies in Wisconsin and Minnesota into one agency at Milwaukee; two agencies in Michigan into one at Detroit; four agencies in Iowa and Nebraska into one agency at Des Moines; four agencies in Missouri, Kansas, and New Mexico into one agency at Saint Louis; two agencies in California and Oregon into one agency at San Francisco; and three agencies in Ohio into one at Columbus, the consolidation to take effect July 1, 1877.

The fifty-eight agents received in 1876 $452,500, in 1877, $457,490.56, as compensation for their services. Eighteen agents located at the following places are paid the following amounts. I send to the clerk a tabular statement showing the number of agents, the salary received by each, the number of vouchers paid by each, the amount paid, the amount of contingencies, and the total amount. It shows that the amount of salaries is $72,000; the amount of voucher fees, $209,389; the amount of contingencies, $23,514.98; and the total amount, $304,903.98. I ask the Clerk to read it.

Mr. CONGER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania propose in this bill any new legislation in regard to these pension agents?

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. The bill which I have reported from the Committee on Appropriations does recommend such legislation.

Mr. CONGER. Then I give notice I shall make the point of order against it.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. It is new legislation in the direction of economy—in the line of retrenchment and reform, and is therefore in order.

Mr. CONGER. When we come to that point I give notice I shall raise the point of order.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman can reserve his point of order until that time. I now ask the Clerk to read the tabular statement which I have sent to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

* Section 4781, Revised Statutes of the United States.

† Section 4789, Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. PRICE. I wish to know whether it is possible we pay pension agents $4,000 salary and from six and ten to fifteen and eighteen thousand dollars voucher fees in addition to that, and, in addition to both, incidental expenses?

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. It is not only possible but it is what actually has been done; and it is that abuse which this bill now proposes to remedy.

Mr. HANNA. I wish to say in this connection that out of these pension fees the pension agents pay their clerk hire and all the expenses of their office.

Mr. PRICE. I do not care how that may be, the showing by the official statement just read exhibits a condition of things which ought to be remedied.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. And that is what the Committee on Appropriations propose to do.

Mr. HANNA. This bill instead of being entitled "A bill making appropriations for invalid and other pensions," ought to be entitled a bill to rob pensioners of their pay.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I do not wish to be interrupted at this time. These points will come up for discussion in their proper place.

Mr. Chairman, as has been indicated already, these extraordinary figures have struck the members of the committee with surprise. Without knowing what effect it would have upon them I will now state how they influenced me when I first found them out. The pay of these agents for mere clerical duty seemed to me to be excessive. They got a salary of $4,000 each and twenty-five cents for each voucher and contingencies in addition. It struck me this whole system was wrong and that the consolidation from fifty-eight to eighteen agents did not go far enough, as in my judgment the agencies should have been entirely abolished and the Treasurer of the United States made, as is provided in this bill, the national paymaster.

Mr. FINLEY. I should like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania what duty is charged by these pension agents for which each receives a fee of twenty-five cents, that is, twenty-five cents for each voucher?

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I will explain all these matters at the proper time.

Mr. FINLEY. What is meant by reducing that fee of twenty-five cents to ten cents in the present bill?

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. Not being ready for the adoption of the system proposed in the bill until some time after the first of July, it is provided during the few weeks which may transpire before the system can be carried into full effect that the pension agents shall receive ten cents instead of twenty-five cents for each voucher.

Mr. FINLEY. But what I wish to know is what labor that ten cents or twenty-five cents covers? Is it a payment for making out the application?

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. No, sir; but for filling up the vouchers. There are blank vouchers sent by the Pension Bureau to each one of these agents and each pension agent charges twenty-five cents as a fee for filling up one of those blank vouchers.

Mr. FINLEY. Then I am to understand there is a distinction made between a voucher and an application?

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. This has nothing whatever to do with applications. I will explain the whole matter to the gentleman if he will now allow me to proceed without interruption.

Mr. FINLEY. My only object is to have information on the subject.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. The Commissioner of Pensions himself attends under the law to all matters coming within the purview of applications for pensions. In the regular order of business they go to the Pension Bureau, where they are investigated and where the Commissioner finally decides whether the party making the application is entitled to a pension or not.

When the Commissioner has decided favorably on an application for a pension he sends the applicant a certificate. Then comes the question of payment. The proper pension agents are notified who are upon the pension rolls. When the successful applicant for a pension presents himself to the pension agents a blank voucher is filled up before payment can be made to the pensioner, and for that service of filling up the voucher a fee of twenty-five cents is charged.

Mr. JOYCE. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Vermont?

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I decline to yield. If I did it would derange what I desire to submit to the House, and I am going to state substantially the matters about which gentlemen have been addressing to me interrogatories.

The method of paying pensions under the present plan is as follows: The Commissioner of Pensions furnishes blank vouchers to these pension agents, who fill up the same and send them to the pensioners. These pensioners, after executing them in the mode directed, return them to the agent, who then forwards his check to the pensioner, and at the end of the quarter sends the voucher to the Third Auditor.

The plan proposed under the bill is to pay the pensioner by a check from the Treasurer of the United States. Two methods have been suggested for preparing the vouchers—one through the Commissioner of Pensions, who will fill up the voucher and send it to the pensioner, who would sign it and return it to the Third Auditor, who would certify it to the Treasurer, if correct. The other method is to have the Third Auditor fill up the voucher and send it to the pensioner, who would execute it and return it to the Third Auditor. The Third Auditor would then certify to the correctness of the voucher and notify the Treasurer, and the Treasurer would then forward the check to the pensioner. I give the preference to this method, especially as the voucher might be very much simplified and all the essential features necessary to identify the pensioner and protect the Government against fraud might be embodied in the check, which, when indorsed and returned, would be a full and complete receipt. And as the pensioner would have to be identified by the banker or merchant who presented the check and indorsed the same, fraud would be almost impossible, as each indorsement would be a warranty of the genuineness of each preceding indorsement.

Is this plan practicable? If the experience of business men and corporations is to be taken as our guide, then this question must be answered in the affirmative. Substantially the same kind of work proposed to be done by the Treasurer is now performed by assignees, trustees, and corporations. Dividends, semi-annually and quarterly, are paid by banks and railroad companies by a single disbursing officer. One agent, stationed now at Washington, pays pensioners in Delaware, New Jersey, Maryland, District of Columbia, those at the national asylums located at Hampton, Virginia; Dayton, Ohio; Augusta, Maine; Milwaukee, Wisconsin, and District of Columbia, and about seven hundred foreign pensioners, most of whom reside in Ireland and Germany. If this is practicable by a pension agent, why may not the disbursing officer of the United States pay all the pensioners from Washington, no matter where located? The Treasurer pays the warrants from the Postmaster-General and from the Secretary of the Treasury, and interest on the funded debt. What is required of him in this bill is strictly in the line of his duty.

If it is practicable, is it expedient? It is manifestly in the interest of economy. Retrenchment with us is a duty. Officially we are informed that the estimated expenditures will exceed the estimated receipts by $11,000,000. Under this bill we have increased this deficiency $1,500,000.

The report from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue indicates a very large deficiency in his department. Imperatively, therefore, retrenchment is needed. By this proposed change we save:

First. The salaries of these eighteen agents, amounting to $72,000.

Secondly. We save the filling-up of a million of receipts signed by the pensioners, intended for the protection of the agents.

In the third place, we save a hundred warrants issued to the depositaries by the Treasurer of the United States and the letters to the pension agents notifying them that the money has been placed to their account.

In the fourth place, the Treasury has but one account to keep in place of eighteen.

In the fifth place, the modified voucher will save a large amount to the Government, and the combined saving will be at least $200,000 annually.

This plan will also inure to the benefit of the pensioner. It gives him a check from the Treasurer equivalent to gold. It is paper that may command a premium, for it will be used by merchants to make remittances. The holder is always sure of his money. Not so when he has the agent's check. It may not be honored when presented. This has frequently happened, and then the pensioner is subjected to long and tedious delay before he receives his pay. This plan will also protect the Government against fraud from agents. Under the existing law the agents are paid twenty-five cents for each voucher. It is to their interest to increase the number of vouchers. This is a standing temptation to evil and fraud. And this plan will also protect the Government against loss from defaulting agents.

The following table shows the amount of defalcations of these agents since 1853:

NOTE.—The amounts shown above are due under "Army pensions," except those marked under "Navy pensions." Army pensions are settled by the Third Auditor. Navy pensions are settled by the Fourth Auditor. The cases of pension agents owing balances in the Southern States are very difficult to settle, owing to the seizure of money and the destruction of the books and papers in their hands by the confederate government.

I will explain this to the committee, who may not thoroughly understand it, although the explanation may be somewhat prolix and tedious in its detail. Attached to each of these vouchers, a copy of which I have here, is a receipt which each pensioner must sign, not for the protection of the Government, but for the protection of the pension agent, who tears that off, and, after having it labeled in his office, keeps it for his protection. The other, received with the voucher, is at the end of the quarter forwarded to the Third Auditor, and, after some time, the amount is adjusted. And when there is any difficulty between the Government and these paying agents it is the interest very often of the agents to conceal all these papers, and it is with great difficulty that they can be made to produce them in order to effect a settlement.

If we abolish these eighteen agents, we in their stead place it in the power of the pensioner to make an affidavit before any legally authorized officer of the United States, before any revenue commissioner of the United States, and there are one hundred and twenty-six revenue districts, so that we give all these additional facilities to the pensioner to go before these regularly constituted officers and take the oath required without cost.

There is another advantage. It must be very obvious the pension agent is paid according to the number of vouchers he presents. Now it is clearly his interest to increase the number of vouchers. You hold out a temptation to him, therefore, to aid a fraud, and there is no possible way on the part of the Government to detect it. This is done away with. What next? You bring all these rolls that are now scattered all over the United States in the eighteen pension agencies direct to headquarters; you bring them here to Washington City, where the Pension Office is, where the Commissioner is who passes on the validity of the application. Then you need not write out to those eighteen men, scattered all over the United States, to say A's pension has been increased or that B's pension has been decreased. You have the party at hand, right here at your door, with whom you communicate. And you may say this person is entitled to so much more or that one to so much less than before. Why not have that system introduced? What possible reason can there be for sending your money out to these eighteen agencies and running the risk of losing it? The Commissioner of Pensions says there are over $300,000 now lying uselessly in the hands of these pension agents which ought to be in the Treasury of the United States, and not in their hands. When we want to get it we may not be able to obtain it, and then suit will follow; and you know what happens when suit is brought on behalf of the United States Government against a party who is indebted. It is very frequently the case that neither from him nor his sureties is there any likelihood of anything being recovered.

I hope I am not treading upon anybody's toes in what I am now saying. My own State has furnished defaulters. So have New York, Brooklyn, and Washington. I want to remedy the system and prevent a recurrence of the mischief. It is radically wrong and demoralizing, and should be speedily changed.

I have here a table which shows the amount lost to the Government by default on the part of these agents. When I wrote the letter, Mr. Chairman, which has been referred to, I had no idea there was any of this in arrears. I sent it after having obtained the necessary facts as to the pay of these agents; and then I followed it up in order to ascertain whether any of them had been guilty of any dereliction of duty that required the abolition of the system, and this is the result of my inquiry. I do not ask the Clerk to read the whole of it. It shows the amount unpaid is $262,948.43. I find here W. T. Collins,

Washington, District of Columbia, was a defaulter to the amount of $53,074.81. This is the marginal note:

Suit entered July, 1872. Nothing recovered.

I refer now to the case of W. H. Lawrence, of New York City, a defaulter to the amount of $65,884.01. The marginal note is as follows:

Suit entered, judgment returned nulla bona.

Take the case of Dudley W. Haynes, of Brooklyn, New York, who was a defaulter to $6,006.35 against whom suit was entered July, 1872. Now go to Philadelphia, in my own State; I am sorry for it, but I suppose that it has been copying after that virtuous city of New York, and we find that W. T. Forbes was a defaulter to the extent of $42,834.74, and the account is not yet adjusted. Take the case of A. R. Calhoun, of the same place, who is a defaulter to the extent of $11,187.76, and his account is not yet adjusted, and the arrears are unpaid and checks unadjusted.

Mr. O'NEILL. I hope my colleague is not reflecting upon the present pension agent at Philadelphia, whatever other man he may assail.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. Oh, no, my dear sir; I did not name him.

Mr. SPARKS. He was only reflecting upon the defaulter.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. My dear sir, I have not a word to say against the present agent.

Mr. O'NEILL. I heard the gentleman say something about the pension agent at Philadelphia following the practices of New York.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I beg my colleague's pardon; he had better come near to me and hear what I am saying.

Mr. O'NEILL. I do not want any one to reflect upon Philadelphia or Philadelphians unless there is occasion for it.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I think the city was disgraced by a defaulter in this agency. I find here that there are a number of unpaid arrears and unpaid checks, precisely what I indicated, and although the pensioner puts in his voucher and gets a check it does not follow that he gets the money he will get invariably when he gets a Treasury check for it.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to ask the gentleman whether the law has not been changed so that instead of the money being in the hands of the pension agent, it remains in the Treasury; and if it is not drawn from the Treasury upon his check?

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. The law is now as it has been; the money is placed in the hands of the pension agents and they draw their own check for their own salary and for such contingencies as they think proper.

That protection to the Government is anything but secure under the present system of security on unincumbered real estate; but there is no protection to the Government, for there is no telling how soon it will be cumbered.

Mr. SPARKS. Under the present law the money is paid over to the pension agent, and what is to prevent him from appropriating it to his own use? How are the banks to know anything about these checks? They simply pay them, and if the agent be a bad man he can draw the money out himself and thereby defraud the Government?

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I want to refer to the present system briefly, so as to see if there is any gain in this matter. We propose to pay these pensioners now directly from the Treasury of the United States at an annual saving of $200,000. I have a letter from the Treasurer of the United States upon this matter, and also letters from the Secretary of the Treasury and from the Secretary of the Interior, although perhaps I ought to say frankly that the Commissioner of Pensions does not approve of this change. It will put the total expense in the Treasury between $45,000 and $55,000, in the Auditor's Office between $15,000 and $20,000, and in the Commissioner of Pensions' Office about $55,000, aggregating in round numbers about $130,000 instead of $330,000, the sum they now ask.

Now that strikes me as being in favor of the proposition. It is not a matter that I have looked into for the love of the thing, but as a member of the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations I was compelled to investigate the subject and I found this result. I came to the conclusion that there was a terrible wrong and the sooner we could get rid of it the better. Of course some pension agents now in receipt of salaries may object to it, but they were not consulted when the system was changed. When President Hayes upon the 7th of May last issued an order consolidating the fifty-eight pension agencies into eighteen he did not consult the occupants of the office. He issued his order and forty agencies were abolished.

Now I propose instead of reducing them to eighteen to reduce them to one and make that one, who is the disbursing officer of the nation, the disbursing officer for this purpose. Let him send to each man entitled to a pension a Treasury check, and when he receives it he will indorse it and the party who receives it from him will also indorse it, and thus warrant it as genuine.

This is exactly what a business man would do. Any man would undertake to do this business for from $50,000 to $75,000 a year without running any risk whatever.

For instance, a widow with children under sixteen years of age is entitled to a pension. It may be provided that in her receipt she shall say that she is the widow of A B, that she is entitled to a pension, number so and so; that she remains unmarried; that she has so many children who are under sixteen years of age and that none of them have been abandoned. All this is capable of being put easily and without trouble into the check; and this check comes back with the voucher, if you insist on having one, four times a year. It will be utterly impossible that fraud can be perpetrated upon the Government with these guards thrown around the administration of the system.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as I have said that this bill commends itself to the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior, I will have read his letter on this subject. I desire to present all the facts so that every member may act intelligently even though he reaches a different conclusion from myself.

Mr. BROWNE. Will the gentleman also send to the Clerk's desk to be read the letter of the Commissioner of Pensions so that we may know his views in regard to this matter?

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. That can be done hereafter.
Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] will find the letter of the Commissioner of Pensions in Senate Miscellaneous Document No. 33.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. It is all in print.
The Clerk read as follows:

D.
DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, D. C., March 14, 1878.

SIR: I have the honor, in compliance with your verbal request of this date, to transmit herewith a copy of my letter of January 9, 1878, to the chairman of the Committee on Pensions of the Senate, in reply to his request for an expression of my views upon the expediency and practicability of providing for the payment of pensions at the Treasury of the United States and upon the subject of readjusting the salaries and fees of pension agents, with a copy of the papers therein referred to, other than the letter of the Commissioner of Pensions, a copy of which, I understand, is now in possession of the Committee on Pensions of the House of Representatives.

Very respectfully,
Hon. A. HERR SMITH, /
House of Representatives. C. SCHURZ, Secretary.

E.
DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, D. C., January 9, 1878.

SIR: In reply to your letter of November 9, 1877, in which you request my views as to the expediency and practicability of providing for the payment of pensions at the Treasury of the United States, and also on the subject of readjusting the salaries and fees of pension agents, I have the honor to state that, in relation to the readjustment of salaries and fees of pension agents, I approve the plan suggested by the Commissioner of Pensions in his annual report: the substitution of a fixed sum to be allowed for every one thousand payments made each quarter, to cover postage and clerk hire, the department to furnish stationery and assume the expense of rents, fuel, lights, and making new rolls; this in lieu of the present allowance of twenty-five cents for every payment made by an agent, the agent paying rent, fuel and lights, stationery, clerk hire, and cost of making new rolls.

In regard to the expediency and practicability of paying all pensions by the Treasurer of the United States, I deem it both expedient and practicable. There is no good reason why payments that are now made from eighteen different offices should not be as promptly and safely made from one.

The majority of payments are now made by draft, and with our present excellent mail facilities but little delay would be experienced in reaching the most distant sections of the country.

In fact, after the first payment under the proposed system, there is no reason why even a day's delay should occur.

As a measure of economy there can be but little doubt as to its expediency. One competent man, at a salary not exceeding $3,000 per annum, could supervise the details of the payments, while the clerical force needed would, in my opinion, cost the Government less than it now pays in the shape of fees for the employment on the part of the agent of the necessary assistance. On salary account alone $60,000 would be saved, while the payments now made indirectly by the Government for rent, fuel, and lights, and other incidental expenses would increase the probable saving to at least $90,000 per annum. The objections urged against the consolidation will in my opinion be found to be more imaginary than real. It is true that under the new plan payments cannot be made to pensioners in person, but it is questionable whether this change will not prove, instead of an inconvenience and loss to certain pensioners, a positive convenience and gain to them.

The receipt by mail of a draft from the United States Treasurer, acceptable as cash by any business man, should certainly be more desirable to a pensioner than the loss of time and necessary delay incident to a personal application. While I see no formidable objections to the abolishment of the present agency system, I see much to favor the payment of pensions by the United States Treasurer.

1. A uniform system of payments and rolls would be secured.
2. The Government would exercise a direct and immediate supervision over its disbursements.
3. The labor now bestowed upon the work of keeping eighteen different accounts would be lessened by having but one account to keep.
4. Prompt communication could be had by the Pension Office with the Treasurer in the transaction of official business.
5. The delays which at times occur in the transmission of funds would be done away with.
6. The expenses of payment would be reduced nearly one-half.

If Congress will authorize the United States Treasurer to pay all pensions from the end of the present fiscal year, I doubt not every needed arrangement can be made by that time to carry the proposed plan into successful operation.

Several plans have been suggested for the payment of pensions by the United States Treasurer.

One provides for the sending out of the quarterly vouchers by the Pension Office and on return their certification to the Treasurer of the United States.

Another plan provides for the sending out of the quarterly vouchers by the Pension Office, their return to the Third Auditor, and their certification by that office to the Treasurer.

Both of these plans would require considerable addition to the clerical force of the Pension Office and that of the Third Auditor.

The Commissioner of Pensions estimates that under the first plan the increased cost would be at least $137,000.

Under the second he estimates the increase at $27,000.

The Third Auditor informally estimates the increased expenses of his office at $45,000. I should favor the more simple and economical plan of leaving the sending out of the vouchers and their examination on return to the office authorized to make the payments.

Under the present system, the vouchers are sent to the pensioners by the pension agent; and on their return to him payment is made. I see no good reason why the office making the payments should not be entrusted with the preliminary work incident thereto.

I would confer upon the Treasurer an individual responsibility, and while it would necessarily call for a large increase of clerical force in his office, no addition would be necessary either in the Pension or Third Auditor's Office.

Deeming it proper to submit to you all the information in my possession relating to a change in the system of paying pensions, I submit herewith copies of letters from the Commissioner of Pensions; also suggestions made by a gentleman who has given considerable attention to this subject.

Very respectfully,
Hon. R. E. WITHERS,
United States Senate. C. SCHURZ, Secretary.

F. WASHINGTON, D. C., June 1, 1877.

SIR: I beg leave to submit for your consideration the following remarks in regard to a change in the manner of paying pensions, believing that the present system (by pension agents) is not as simple and economical as one could be made.

In order to show the correctness of this opinion it seems to be necessary to find, first, what the duties of the pension agents are, and then whether those duties cannot as well, and with less expense, be performed by other already existing officers of the Government.

The duties of pension agents are: First, to send to the address of each pensioner a blank voucher, (section 4764, Rev. Stats.) after receiving back the voucher properly filled out and signed by the pensioner, to remit to him by check the amount due for pension, (section 4765;) further, to pay amounts due examining surgeons for services rendered as stated in section 4777; and, lastly, to take and certify (without fee) the affidavits of pensioners who personally appear before them for that purpose, and to give direct to the hand of such pensioners the check for pension, (section 4784.)

These being the duties of the pension agents, I now come to the point whether such duties cannot be performed by other officers of the Government as well and with less expense; and in regard to that I would say that the Pension Office has a roll containing all pensioners, whose post-office address can be found on the records now in the hands of the pension agents, if it should not be already on the books at the Pension Office.

The blank vouchers, which are now furnished (in bulk) to the pension agents by the Interior Department, could as well be sent by the Pension Office directly to the pensioners, to be by them returned to that office.

At the Pension Office each returned voucher should then be examined, stamped as correct, and forwarded to the Treasurer of the United States as a certificate upon which a draft would be issued by him and mailed to each pensioner.

In this way the duplicate receipts now attached to each voucher would be superfluous, as the draft of the United States Treasurer, after payment, would be returned to him with the indorsement of the pensioner, and would be his voucher.

The number of the pension certificate might be written on the envelope containing the draft, and the United States postmaster be required to deliver such letters only when certificate of pension (held by the pensioner) with the same number is shown.

I believe that the object of promptly paying pensions to the holder of the certificate, who has before sworn that he is the identical person named in the certificate, can be reached in this manner without the assistance of the pension agents; but I must admit the necessity of otherwise gaining as good (or better) information as is now said to be furnished by the pension agents in regard to the numerous cases in which it becomes necessary to decide whether the pension should cease or be increased or decreased.

In regard to this I would respectfully refer you to the report of the Commissioner of Pensions of last year, in which he recommends the appointment of regular pension surgeons, who could undoubtedly be relied upon to give more trustworthy and disinterested information than is now gained.

It is true that the pension agents every three months save the amount of twenty-five cents to each pensioner, for taking and certifying his affidavit, if the pensioner personally appears before a pension agent for that purpose. The law favors to this extent the comparatively small number of pensioners who live at or near the same locality with the pension agent.

In regard to the expense of paying pensions in this way, as compared with that connected with the system of paying by pension agents, I would say that the Pension Office would do all the preparatory work, (preparing and mailing of vouchers, and examining the same after their return;) that the Treasurer's office would perform all the work necessitated by the actual paying of pensions, (drawing drafts and mailing them;) that a large amount of work of the same character obviously can be done cheaper when it is all done at one place; that it would be less work to the Third Auditor's Office to settle with the United States Treasurer than with a number of pension agents; that a considerable part of the work now necessary would become superfluous, namely the filling out of duplicate receipts attached to each voucher, and that there would be only two chiefs of division to superintend the work, instead of a number of pension agents.

The actual expense of the present system of paying pensions for the fiscal year ended June 30 1876, was $447,702 13, while the cost of a pension division in the treasurer's office would be about $50,000, and the cost of a division in the Pension Office, necessitated by the change, could not well be more than $50,000.

There are at present about 230,000 pensioners to be paid every three months. About 920,000 vouchers, therefore, would have to be filled out each year, as well as mailed and examined (after their return) in the Pension Office. The same number of drafts would have to be written, stubbed, examined, mailed, and accounted for in the Treasurer's office. Taking three hundred as the number of working days in the year, this would give somewhat more than three thousand drafts a day, and would employ in the Treasurer's office probably:

One chief of division, per annum.....	$2,500
One principal book-keeper, per annum.....	2,400
Four book-keepers, (and signers,) $1,800 each per annum.....	7,200
Three book-keepers, at $1,600 each per annum.....	4,800
Two clerks at $1,400 each per annum.....	2,800
Twelve draft clerks, at $1,200 each per annum.....	14,400
Six mailing clerks, at $1,200 each.....	7,200
Four examining clerks, at $900 each per annum.....	3,600
One messenger at $75 per month and one messenger at $60 per month.....	1,620
	46,520

This force can be used in such a manner as to enable the division to forward each day in the beginning of each quarter about ten thousand drafts to the pensioners, paying the large majority of them as quickly as they are now paid.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

AUGUST DUDENHAUSER.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I will ask the Clerk to read the letter from the Treasurer of the United States.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, February 25, 1878.

SIR: I am in receipt of your letter of the 14th instant in which you ask my opinion of the propriety of paying pensions through the Treasury, and what would be the saving to the Government by such a system as compared with the present system of payment by agents.

As to the saving in the cost of the proposed mode of payment, I am unable to give an opinion, not knowing what expenditures will be required in other bureaus to be affected by the contemplated change.

I, however, have the honor to submit the following estimate as to the force which would be required in this office provided the payments are made in accordance with the following conditions:

1. That all preparation for payments, preliminary correspondence with pensioners and examination of vouchers shall be performed by some other bureau—the Third Auditor, for instance.
2. That (printed) schedules be furnished this office each quarter, or, if practicable, once permanently, giving the name, address, amount due, and when payable.
3. That the schedules be so furnished that there need be no intermission in the daily drawing of checks which, for the shortest quarter and allowing for holidays and ordinary hindrances, would be at the rate of about 3,500 checks per day. At that rate, I estimate that the following force would be necessary in this office alone:

	Num-ber.	Salaries.
Chief of division.....	1	$2,500
Assistant chief.....	1	2,000
Clerks at third class.....	4	6,400
Clerks at first class.....	12	14,400
Clerks at $1,000.....	10	10,000
Clerks at $900.....	20	18,000
Messengers.....	3	2,160
Total.....	51	55,460

The estimate for the subordinate clerks is based upon the force required for the following duties:

	Num-ber.	Salaries.
Writing margins of checks.....	8	$900
Drawing checks.....	12	1,200
Examining checks.....	5	1,000
Countersigning checks.....	4	1,600
Registering checks.....	4	900
Addressing envelopes.....	5	900
Mailing.....	3	900
Preparing accounts for Auditor.....	5	1,000
Messengers.....	3	720
Total.....	49	9,120

The above estimate is based upon actual personal experience in drawing checks for the payment of interest upon the funded loans issued under the act of July 14, 1870, and as the head of this office I would not wish to undertake the work with a less force at the outset. When the business shall have become fully systematized there might be a reduction made, but it would not be practicable during the first year.

The checks should be made payable at the New York office, and the additional force needed there might be appointed under the provisions of section 3604, Revised Statutes, for which no estimate is made in this communication. Should checks be made payable at other points, additional force would be needed, for which no estimate is made in this communication.

Very respectfully,

JAMES GILFILLAN,
Treasurer United States.

Hon. A. HERR SMITH, House of Representatives.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. HARTZELL. Before the gentleman from Pennsylvania takes his seat I wish to ask him whether this change in paying pensioners will necessitate the employment on the part of the pensioner of agents or attorneys in this city.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. No, sir; no attorney whatever will be required.

Mr. HARTZELL. The checks will be drawn to the order of the pensioners?

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. They will be drawn directly to the order of the pensioner. The great difficulty now is that there is a go-between between the pensioner and the Government. We propose that the Treasurer of the United States shall draw his check payable directly to the pensioner.

Mr. HARTZELL. That is satisfactory.

A MEMBER. May not these checks in some cases be at a discount?

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. A discount! On the contrary they will command a premium.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to offer at the request and by the direction of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to the latter part of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can indicate the amendment, but it will not be in order at present.

Mr. POWERS. I will state the substance of it in the course of my remarks and have it read as a part of them.

Mr. Chairman, according to my view this is a measure virtually affecting not only two hundred and thirty thousand or two hundred and fifty thousand pensioners whom the Government should care for and pay speedily and promptly, but it affects almost that number of families.

Now, sir, every proposed change is not necessarily an improvement; and I am confident, speaking after some examination, that the proposed change is anything but an improvement. I am referring now to that part of the bill which transfers the payment of pensions to the Treasury Department. I object to this change, first, on the ground of economy, because if it be made, the payment of pensions will cost much more than it does even now, and I think this susceptible of proof; and, second, for the very important reason that it will entail delay and expense upon the pensioner, who should be paid promptly and without cost.

As to my first proposition, before I discuss it at length, let me premise that what has been said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SMITH,] with reference to the large salaries of pension agents is, I believe, substantially correct. The Committee on Invalid Pensions were aware that these salaries were too large, and we have taken measures to remedy that evil. I do not believe in paying large salaries. I think it is our duty to have every employé of the Government paid a fair compensation and no more. The amendment which I propose to offer on behalf of the Committee on Invalid Pensions will reduce the present expenses as they are, even since the recent consolidation, $106,000 per annum. Under this amendment the several pension agents, by carefully attending to their duties and giving it their whole time and attention, will receive somewhere in the vicinity of $4,000 each per annum for all the labor, responsibility, and trouble connected with their offices. I do not think they ought to be asked to work for a much less sum. While we go thus far in the interest of economy, I do not think we can go further without doing manifest injustice.

In reply to the question why not pay these pensions from the Treasury Department, I answer that the cost will be so great as to make it impracticable. You will find that some $440,000, if I mistake not, was appropriated last year to pay the expenses of the several offices and agents for paying pensions. The Committee on Invalid Pensions by the adoption of the amendment offered by me propose to appropriate $216,000, not one-half of the sum appropriated one year ago and, as I believe, not one-half the sum that it will cost the Government should we adopt the proposition offered by the Committee on Appropriations. Why? In the first place it costs more to get the same work done in Washington than it does in Concord or in any of the smaller towns or cities away from Washington. When you bring this business here you must do it under Washington regulations. You must do it under the rules and practices that prevail here. And I venture the assertion that where clerical labor is performed by contract as it now is by the several pension agents, where they employ their clerks and discharge them when they please, and negotiate with them and contract as to the amount to be paid, that with the same amount of money they are getting to-day they will continue to receive double the amount of service you can get in Washington under the system here adopted and regulating clerical service and wages in the Treasury Department.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania read a letter from the Treasurer of the United States. I have carefully examined that letter and have a copy of it. I find, first, that what he says will cost $55,460 is an item we never take into consideration in making this appropriation, except as an incident; that it is simply the drawing, the signing, the countersigning, the registering of the checks and making memorandum of them to send to the Third Auditor. And after careful examination into all that is to be done in paying pensions, (and I think I know something about it, and I have the same statement from the Commissioner of Pensions, and I think there can be no one who will carefully look into it but will come to the same conclusion.) I am prepared to say that what the Treasurer of the United States declares he must have $55,460 for is not one-tenth part of the work that is necessary to pay these pensioners. Under existing laws it has nothing to do whatever with making up the pension-rolls and correcting them, and there are some fifteen thousand changes on these rolls every quarter. It has nothing to do whatever with the preparing of vouchers and receipts and forwarding them to the pensioners, examining them, and computing the amount due the several pensioners.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Is the gentleman from Maine correct in saying that fifteen thousand is the number of variations? I asked the Commissioner of Pensions, and he stated to me the number was ten thousand.

Mr. POWERS. I was present when the Commissioner told the gentleman from New York there were ten thousand. He said there were ten thousand variations; that is, the roll last paid differed in ten thousand particulars from the one previously paid, and would differ in ten thousand particulars from the next one which would be paid. But, sir, since that time the Commissioner has taken pains to examine into the whole subject, and he has informed me he had ascertained the number of variations to be over fifty-eight or fifty-nine thousand, and he had no doubt it would amount to sixty thousand in the whole year, which would be about fifteen thousand a quarter.

And furthermore the Treasurer said, when he made that statement which has been referred to, that he based it upon the presumption that he could draw consecutively every day; and you will see his letter presupposes that the checks were to be drawn every day continuously and he was to be furnished with a schedule or a statement of the amount due each pensioner and was to draw them as he draws the great number of nine thousand checks to pay the interest on the bonded debt. As I had heard from the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] that this was a matter which could be done as well as not by the Treasurer of the United States as the interest of the bonded debt was paid by checks at the Treasury Department, I thought I would inquire into it a little. I found while the persons to whom that interest is paid may vary, instead of having two hundred and thirty or two hundred and fifty separate and distinct checks to draw and separate vouchers to examine, the whole number issued on a non-changing basis were not over nine thousand a quarter. That is a mere bagatelle in comparison with this matter which so directly affects so many invalid and wounded men, widows and orphans whom we ought to care for and pay promptly. The Treasurer of the United States in his letter states that he wants the pension-rolls and vouchers prepared elsewhere, and when the Commissioner of Pensions was before our committee we asked him how many clerks he would have to hire to prepare the rolls and make the vouchers and do all the work thus required and note all the changes, and he said he could not do it or undertake to do it with less than one hundred and fifty clerks, and he gave us the classes and said it would cost $210,000 to pay them at the present Washington rates.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Was that the Commissioner of Pensions?

Mr. POWERS. Yes, sir; if it would cost $55,460 to draw and sign checks, certainly it would cost fully $210,000 to fill vouchers, fill receipts, make records, make rolls, and do all that is necessary outside of drawing checks and making a return thereof to the Third Auditor, and much more.

Mr. FINLEY. That is not done now.

Mr. POWERS. What is not done?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maine yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. POWERS. Certainly.

Mr. FINLEY. The applications you speak of, the cost of which you include in the estimates you made, are not now filled up by the pension agent. If he does fill them up he charges for them in addition to the sum now allowed by law.

Mr. POWERS. I beg to state to the gentleman that such is not the case.

Mr. FINLEY. One word further. They are usually filled up by attorneys and notaries public.

Mr. ALDRICH. No, no; not at all.

Mr. FINLEY. The application for payment, I mean.

Mr. POWERS. I am speaking of the application for payment on the voucher.

Mr. FINLEY. What voucher are you referring to?

Mr. POWERS. The voucher which every pensioner signs and swears to before he gets his pay.

Mr. FINLEY. The check?

Mr. POWERS. Not the check. He signs no check. He indorses it when sent to him in payment.

Mr. FINLEY. The receipt?

Mr. POWERS. He signs duplicate receipts. He also signs and swears to a voucher which states that he belonged to such a company and such a regiment or so fully describes his services as to sufficiently identify him. And if that pensioner happens to be a widowed mother with minor children then some neighbors are brought to testify who know that those children are still alive and supported by the mother, and a paper to that effect is executed and sent to the Department and is filed after careful examination before payment is made. So far as making an abstract of the record is concerned, including the company and the regiment and the names of the children, in case there has been no death, that is done as far as it can be in the different pension agencies and is then forwarded to the pensioner.

Mr. FINLEY. Now the gentleman is talking about the same document I was talking about. I called it an application. He calls it a voucher.

Mr. POWERS. That is what the law calls it—a voucher.

Mr. FINLEY. Is that included in your estimate of cost?

Mr. POWERS. It is.

Mr. FINLEY. It must be under a recent law.

Mr. POWERS. Whenever the pensioner goes in person to the agency then the agent makes voucher and receipts, administers the oath, and nothing is paid him. When he cannot go to the agency he has to pay the claim agent or magistrate or other person whom he employs to administer the oath and complete the papers. I know very well what I am talking about, and I say that nearly one million of these vouchers have to be sent to the pensioners every year.

This payment of the pensioners from the Treasury Department involves more separate transactions than all the different separate transactions in the Treasury Department to-day. It will create a larger bureau than you have got there, and it will entail an expense, I feel justified in saying, of more than $500,000 to do it. The $440,000 that was appropriated last Congress, when you come to do this work and prepare this nearly one million of vouchers in Washington, from the best data I can get, would not answer the purpose. And that is one reason why I urgently object to this novel and it seems to me unmatured and uncalled for experiment.

Now let me refer to another important fact. There is a rivalry at present in the different eighteen agencies to see how fast they will pay the pensioners. They keep a regular statement of the number of arrivals each day and the number paid. And I know from the information that I have that they work from the 4th of every month till they get up with the applications either the whole twenty-four hours—which they can do by getting in a little extra force—or at least as many as eighteen hours of the twenty-four. And this year, by the 15th of March, their report shows they were paying the pensions as fast as they received the applications. Does the gentleman contend that any such results will be realized if the proposed change is carried?

How would it be here? You send a quarter of a million of those vouchers to the Treasury Department to be taken by the clerks in the proposed bureau and examined. The initials are put on in one room, and then they go to another, and so they go from place to place. And with all this red tape and regulations, when would the poor soldier receive his pay? How long would it take to get through the circumlocution offices of this city? How long would be the delay till the time was reached when the soldier could get his pension? We ought to do something for the crippled soldiers, and for the widows and orphans of those who are not here to take care of them, and I confidently declare that instead of concentrating all this labor here and making this great bureau, we should devise some means by which if possible the soldiers and their widows and orphans should be paid speedily and without expense to themselves by establishing pension agencies in almost every congressional district.

There was a decrease in expense and a saving to the Government when the Secretary of the Interior consolidated the agencies. I believe it is claimed $130,000 have been saved, but when I take into consideration the fact that it put a great many of those pensioners in the power of attorneys, sharks, and claim agents, and that they were compelled to pay them for completing and executing their papers, I doubt very much whether every dollar saved to the Government has not been taken from the maimed and diseased soldier and widows and orphans, through the increased expense it entailed upon them. Protests and considerations of cost to the pensioner have weighed nothing. Still it has been done, and I know not how we can undo it now; but I trust to see this wrong righted in the not far distant future; but when you ask us to do this thing, to send these two hundred and thirty thousand or two hundred and fifty thousand pensioners to a bureau of this kind, without prescribing the way or manner or method in which they are to be paid, it seems to me that we are entering upon a new and untried course of legislation in reference to a matter that is of vital importance to very many persons and families throughout a great many of the States, and that the expense and delay which must of necessity follow this scheme should cause every true friend of the pensioner to oppose it.

The letter read from the Secretary of the Interior stated that $90,000 can be saved he thought by the proposed change. The amendment which I propose to offer, and which I will now have read as a part of my remarks, saves $106,000—$16,000 more than even the Secretary of the Interior proposes to save by this new method. And his saving was mere speculation and opinion.

I propose after the words "seventy-eight," in line 35, to strike out all of the bill and insert in lieu thereof what I send to the Clerk's desk to have read as a part of my remarks for the information of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Agents for the payment of pensions shall, in lieu of the percentage fees, pay, and allowances now provided by law, be allowed and paid the following compensation for their services, postage upon vouchers and checks sent to the pensioners, and all the expenses of their offices:

First. A salary at the rate of $4,000 per annum.
Second. Fifteen dollars for each one hundred vouchers prepared and paid by any agent in excess of four thousand vouchers per annum.

Third. Actual and necessary expenses for rent, fuel, and lights, and for postage on official matter directed to the Departments and bureaus at Washington, to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior; and the sum of $216,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated to pay the salaries, fees, and allowances to said pension agents.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Do I understand the gentleman from Maine to offer this amendment by the direction of the Committee on Invalid Pensions?

Mr. POWERS. I do, as a substitute for all that part of the bill after the words "seventy-eight," in line 35 on the second page, to the word "and," in line 47, page 3. One member of the committee, the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. RIDDLE,] had some doubts about it, and reserved his conclusions till further investigation, but I think it is now the unanimous opinion of the Committee on Invalid Pensions that this amendment should be adopted.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Of the subcommittee?

Mr. POWERS. The whole committee, after looking at the facts in the case, believe that this matter of paying pensioners was something more peculiar to ourselves than to the Committee on Appropriations; but, of course, we would treat the action of the Committee on Appropriations with great deference. I cast no censure upon that committee. The Committee on Invalid Pensions have carefully examined this subject, and we think we are capable of giving to the House an amendment which will answer the requirement, namely, a reduction of the salaries and pay of these pension agents without additional cost and delay to the pensioner, and also that our amendment is more economical and much better than the change proposed by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. You propose, then, to appropriate $216,000?

Mr. POWERS. Yes, sir; but if some arrangement could be made by which the letters going to the pensioners could pass without the payment of postage; if the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads would report a measure by which these envelopes could go free through the post, then the cost would be $30,000 less, leaving the amount $186,000. It costs about fifteen cents for each pensioner to pay postage in sending these vouchers and checks. Now, in this amendment we propose we state specifically what postage shall be allowed to the pension agents. The amount of postage now paid by them out of the $216,000 is about $31,000, which has to be paid in order to transmit the several vouchers to the pensioners. The amount we propose will be about $185,000 outside of the sum paid for postage. As to the cost and actual expenses paid by the several agents I have returns for the last six months from them, and I find that it costs them $70,000 for clerk hire in the eighteen agencies during that time according to their statements.

But there were new rolls to be prepared to some extent, and this was the year for the biennial examination of invalid pensioners. These facts, I have no doubt, increased the expenses. Hence we have not allowed so large a sum. If gentlemen will make the calculation, they will find that these pension agents will not receive $4,000 each as their salaries if their expenses should be $140,000 a year as clerk hire, nor near $4,000 under my proposed amendment.

Mr. PAGE. How will the gentleman's proposition affect the salaries?

Mr. POWERS. Instead of paying these agents a commission, we pay them a salary; and the only agency that it affects, if I mistake not, is the agency in San Francisco, and there it adds a few hundred dollars to the salary. But out of this $4,000 salary the agent must pay the expense of preparing and sending away four thousand vouchers and paying postage thereon, before he receives the fifteen cents each which goes for clerk hire and postage. Thus we believe there will be saved to the Government more than can be saved in any other way, while the pensioner will still be paid as speedily as he can be paid since the consolidation of the pension agencies.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. There is no complaint, I believe, that the pensioners are not now speedily paid.

Mr. POWERS. Yes, sir; I have several letters complaining on that subject, and I think that if we should create this immense bureau here at Washington for the payment of pensioners, every one of us would receive dozens upon dozens of letters every day (for many of us have from two to three thousand pensioners in our districts) asking us to go to the Department and see about getting the checks for the amount due them and long delayed.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Did not the gentleman say in the first part of his remarks that there is such rivalry between the pension agents that the work is now practically done within a very few days after the 1st of each month?

Mr. POWERS. I said there was such rivalry that the number of vouchers paid was by the 15th of the month equal to the number received, as appears by the returns of the last March payment. Yet there would be many delayed, and speedy payment is a matter of great importance to most pensioners.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Then the delay is in the receipt of the voucher from the pensioner, and not in the Pension Office.

Mr. POWERS. No, sir; that does not follow. When we had a larger number of agencies I know that in the district which I represent the payments were made within some four days. But the more you consolidate, the longer the delay. The pension agent now hires the clerks; the work is done by contract; and he gets more work for $1 than you can get for $2 under your Washington system. There is every inducement for each agent to have his work done as fast as at any other of the eighteen agencies; and I know that while payments are being made these officers work night and day. Hence at present pensions are paid in a very reasonable time in view of the amount of labor involved. Yet the loss to the pensioners by delay and fees paid has been no trifling sum, and I reiterate that the recent consolidation was a saving of money at the expense of widows, cripples, and orphans, of which I do not approve. But when you transfer this business to a bureau at Washington and have it done as all other business is done here, we know too well how it will be done and what will be the effect on the pensioner. In the first place the poor soldier or soldier's widow must go to some attorney and pay him whatever he may ask to execute the papers; then those papers must be sent here and wait till they are examined. They must pass through the hands of various clerks whose initials must be placed on the corner to show that they are all right. Under this system the poor pensioner would be lucky indeed to receive his pension in thirty or sixty days after it was due him.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The gentleman will allow me to refer him to the report of the Commissioner of Pensions, who states that under the present system 41,211 pensioners were paid in the first four days of the month, and 158,361 (considerably more than one-half) in the first nine days. That is the present rate of payment. Now, surely the delay is not a grievance when it does not extend beyond nine days.

Mr. POWERS. I said that by the 15th of the month the number of vouchers paid equals the number received. Yet there would be a large number on hand not reached.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. But I understood the gentleman to say that he receives innumerable complaints of delay in these payments. Now I refer him to the report of the Commissioner of Pensions, who says that there is no delay.

Mr. POWERS. I am extremely sorry that I cannot make myself understood by the gentleman from New York. I have no doubt that it is all my fault.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I desire to understand the gentleman.

Mr. POWERS. The gentleman asked me if I had received any complaints. I answered that I had; but I do not think he will find, however carefully he may scan the reporter's minutes, the word "innumerable."

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I understood the gentleman to say "a large number" or something of that sort.

Mr. POWERS. I have letters here, which I will furnish the gentleman to read, complaining that pensioners do not receive their money as promptly as they should. And it stands to reason that, since the agencies were consolidated and more business is thrown into the offices that are continued, the pensions cannot be paid as promptly as before.

Mr. SPARKS. The gentleman has quoted the Commissioner of Pensions, I believe, quite freely. Does he not know that the Commissioner on this very point of delay suggests that no delay will be produced by the consolidation of this business in one office here?

Mr. POWERS. I have never seen anything of that kind; and if the Commissioner does make any such suggestion I must beg leave to differ with him. I will add in this connection that yesterday I asked the Treasurer whether this would cause more delay, and he said it would, he thought.

Mr. SPARKS. If the gentleman will allow me a moment, while we are on this point, I will read what the Commissioner says. It is but a sentence:

About 80 per cent. of the pensioners have usually been paid within thirty days after the day when their pensions became due. This fact, however, will not materially affect the practicability of a transfer of the pay-rolls to the capital, since a system may easily be devised which will spread the payments evenly over the entire quarter, paying each pensioner at regular intervals of about three months. After the first payment, if they were promptly and regularly paid, no inconvenience would be experienced by the pensioners.

Showing thereby in the first quarter it might produce a little delay, but after that there could be no more delay than under the present system. That is the sense of Commissioner Bentley's letter.

Mr. POWERS. In answer to that I have this to say, first, that the pensioners are now paid according to law. I have heard of no bill, and there is nothing in connection with this bill, which changes the law that provides no pensioner shall swear to his voucher until on or after the 4th of March, June, September, and December. You propose a transfer of payment here, and you have nothing in your bill which changes the law, so you can extend payments through the year and have a pension in one State due at one time and in another at another in case this is to pass.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. There is a provision that all laws and parts of laws inconsistent herewith are repealed.

Mr. POWERS. Does the gentleman think that very indefinite clause will repeal the law which declares when and where and how a pensioner shall execute his voucher? Do you, as a lawyer, say that clause declaring all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this are repealed, in an appropriation bill, with a transfer of the payment from the pension agents to the Treasurer—do you say that repeals the law which prescribes when he shall swear to a voucher, how he shall swear to it, and that he shall not swear to it until on or after the 4th of certain months?

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I have provided in the amendment which I have submitted that modifications may be made, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury or the Secretary of the Interior, in such way as to promote the object sought to be accomplished.

Mr. POWERS. And let me ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether it repeals section 4784.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I provide expressly for the matter referred to by the gentleman from Maine in the amendment which I have offered, but which will come up for action at the proper time.

Mr. POWERS. Does that amendment propose to repeal section 4784 of the Revised Statutes?

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. It repeals all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this bill. I affirm, if this bill should pass and there is anything inconsistent with its provisions in the section referred to it will repeal all that is inconsistent with it.

Mr. POWERS. I have a little note in my hand from the Commissioner of Pensions, and he says that which was read by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] he, after fuller consideration of the entire subject, now takes back.

Mr. SPARKS. I did not hear the remark made by the gentleman, and hope he will repeat it.

Mr. POWERS. What I stated was that the clause read from the report of the Commissioner of Pensions by the gentleman from Illinois, on reconsideration, is taken back by the Commissioner in the note which I have from him.

Mr. SPARKS. I presume he would take back one day what he said the day before.

Mr. POWERS. When he made the statement he had not so fully considered this plan. Upon examination he has very properly corrected his error, and I submit that the pensioner should not be wronged because, forsooth, the Commissioner may in some hurried report have made a mistake which he subsequently rectifies.

Mr. SPARKS. I read from his letter, and from what the gentleman now states it seems he takes back what he then said, when the fact is brought to the notice of the House.

Mr. POWERS. He has since given the matter more careful consideration.

Mr. SPARKS. And backs out from his deliberate statements in this official record.

Mr. POWERS. That is the gentleman's view of it. Now, Mr. Chairman, one thought more and I will leave the subject. The gentleman from Pennsylvania talks about defalcation by agents for the payment of pensions. I believe since the money was placed in the hands of the several assistant treasurers, to be drawn by the several pension agents in 1873, the amount of defalcation has been about $16,000. It is not $18,000.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I have given the exact amount.

Mr. POWERS. There has been nowhere else in any branch of the public service twenty-eight or thirty million dollars a year paid in four or five years where there has not been a loss of more than $4,000 a year, in my opinion. This is but little more than one mill out of $100.

Mr. BRIDGES. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. POWERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRIDGES. Have you not heard that pensioners have complained under the present system of pension agents charging them for pretended services rendered, which they had no right to do?

Mr. POWERS. I have not heard of that. But there is an express statute providing distinctly that they shall not make any such charge; and I never heard of one charging in my section of the country. And let me say, while I am contending for this payment of the soldiers through pension agencies for the two reasons I gave, that it will save money and pay the pensioner quicker. I have no personal acquaintance with any pension agents. There is not one in my district or my State. And I have never had, directly or indirectly, any communication with any one of them on this subject.

Mr. BRIDGES. I am well aware this matter is governed by law. But what I ask is whether pension agents do not disregard their duties and transgress the law, making charges on pensioners, which they ought not to make.

Mr. POWERS. If the gentleman knows of such cases it seems to me the proper thing to do would be to bring it to the attention of the Department and have the man who is guilty of such conduct removed. For the Government pays him for all his services, and the law provides that he shall make the voucher, administer the oath, and pay the pensioner without charge, whenever he presents himself at the office. If any one charges the pensioner for any service he is violating the law, and I think the Government, if it got notice of such a violation, would, or at all events should, immediately dismiss him.

Mr. BRIDGES. I desire to ask the gentleman another question. Have you heard pensioners complaining of having their pensions delayed by agents not sending their money when due?

Mr. POWERS. I have already alluded to that in my reply to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT.] I have heard complaints of that kind and suspect it is a very common thing. They do not all get their checks for a considerable time, and, notwithstanding the agents were paying as many of the vouchers that came in as they could, yet a good many accumulate before all get paid in the first part of the month. I have already consumed more time than I had intended and will now yield the floor to some other gentleman.

Mr. FINLEY. Before the gentleman resumes his seat, will he yield to me that I may ask him a question for information?

Mr. POWERS. Certainly.

Mr. FINLEY. I desire to make an inquiry as to the gentleman's amendment, the second division of which reads as follows:

Second. Fifteen dollars for each one hundred vouchers prepared and paid by any agent in excess of four thousand per annum.

Does that mean in excess of four thousand vouchers or $4,000?

Mr. POWERS. Four thousand vouchers.

Mr. FINLEY. Does the agent receive $15 for each one hundred vouchers prepared by him in addition to his salary?

Mr. POWERS. He will if this amendment is adopted.

Mr. FINLEY. What is that for?

Mr. POWERS. He has to pay for his clerk, his stationery, his postage on transmitting the vouchers to the pensioner, and on the checks. This is given to pay him for all this and for his office expenses.

Mr. FINLEY. What, then, is meant by the third division of the gentleman's amendment?

Third. Actual and necessary expenses for rent, fuel, and lights, and for postage on official matter directed to the Departments and bureaus at Washington, to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. POWERS. I will tell the gentleman what is meant by that. There are specifically enumerated what allowances he is to have. He is to have his necessary expenses for rent, fuel, and lights. In three-fourths of the cases, or nearly that proportion, the agents occupy places in the custom-houses or other Government buildings. There, of course, there would be no charge for rent. Instead of his running up an account for stationery and incidentals, I thought it much better to state specifically what should be allowed him. The reason why I so stated it was that I found that a very large amount was put in for contingent expenses. I have enumerated exactly what expenses of that character may be allowed when approved by the Secretary of the Interior; and all other things, all charges for stationery, for office furniture, and the many incidentals that now swell their contingent account, will be precluded.

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman allow me to make a further inquiry? The necessary expenses for rent, fuel, and lights, and postage on official matter are to be paid in addition to the salary of $4,000 and in addition to the $15 for each one hundred vouchers.

Mr. POWERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. FINLEY. Now what does the payment of $15 for each one hundred vouchers cover? The gentleman said in his answer a little while ago that fuel, postage, and a number of such items were covered by that.

Mr. POWERS. I said postage on the vouchers sent to the pensioner. This is postage on official documents sent to the Department after the voucher comes back and the agent makes up the statement of his accounts. It is postage on the documents sent to the Departments and the bureaus at Washington. The fifteen cents cover the postage on the voucher which is sent four times a year on the check sent to pay the pensioner and the hire of the clerks he has to employ. Then there is the stationery and the cost of the office furniture. And I believe, taking the various pension agencies throughout the United States and figuring out what is covered by this fifteen cents per voucher, it will not pay them so large a sum as the agents now certify they are paying on those separate items.

Mr. HALE. Will my colleague state the amount of postage the pension agent will have to pay himself in correspondence with the pensioner?

Mr. POWERS. It has been found that it averages about fifteen cents to the pensioner. Some, of course, are paid in person.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Is this for a year or for what?

Mr. POWERS. Fifteen cents a year is about what it averages to a pensioner.

Mr. FINLEY. I ask the gentleman to answer me one other question. What will be the amount of this additional sum provided for in the second clause of $15 per hundred on the vouchers that exceed four thousand per annum?

Mr. POWERS. I have made a calculation based on the number of pensions, and I believe that the appropriation of $216,000 will cover the whole expense incident to the several agencies. Four hundred and forty thousand dollars was appropriated last year.

Mr. FINLEY. My question is, what part of that appropriation is covered by the second division of the gentleman's amendment? I mean the payment on vouchers exceeding four thousand per annum.

Mr. POWERS. I believe that every agency exceeds four thousand per annum except the San Francisco office, and I am not sure even as to that.

Mr. FINLEY. By what amount does the number exceed four thousand?

Mr. POWERS. Some go above eighty thousand per annum, all told.

Mr. FINLEY. They get $15 for each one hundred vouchers over four thousand?

Mr. POWERS. Yes, sir; and that is paid by the Government, not by the pensioner.

Mr. MARSH. I desire to ask the gentleman from Maine a question. I understand that these pension agents now expend, according to their own statement, fifteen cents postage for each voucher.

Mr. POWERS. For each pensioner. That is the statement for a given number of pensioners on a given pension-roll of an agency. Some are paid in person. Some have vouchers sent to them twice. And it is stated that it costs fifteen cents to a pensioner as a rule.

Mr. MARSH. Then your amendment allows them fifteen cents?

Mr. POWERS. No, sir; my amendment allows fifteen cents for a voucher. That leaves forty-five cents to pay for clerk hire, office furniture, stationery, and other incidentals. And for those fifteen cents they have to make up and correct the pension-roll, make up their returns to the several Departments, make and send the vouchers, compare them when they get back, figure up the amounts due on these constantly changing vouchers and be careful everything is done correctly. And I have returns from every pension agency showing it costs them over sixteen cents to a voucher to do this at present.

Mr. BANNING. And you cut them down from twenty-five cents to fifteen cents.

Mr. POWERS. Yes, sir, and we thought that on account of reducing it to fifteen cents scarcely any of them would resign. It is well known they have to give a very large bond, and under the present arrangement it is a very difficult bond to give.

And let me say that I see by referring to the letter read from the Treasurer of the United States that in place of a salary to a pension agent of $4,000 one of $2,000 and one of $2,500 a year will be required for two officers to take charge of that branch of the business. In short, it does seem to me that this matter has been brought in here without being very fully matured. You propose to appropriate $130,000 to pay for work for which you appropriated $440,000 or about that last year, and at the same time you appropriated $85,000 or $86,000 to pay the pension examining surgeons.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. That is the estimate of the Pension Bureau. It has not been changed.

Mr. POWERS. This whole matter is all speculative. No one knows what the system will cost. No one knows what the result will be. Whereas if you adopt the amendment proposed by the Committee on Invalid Pensions it is susceptible of being ascertained so we can know just what it will cost. It can be figured out; and it reduces the present expenses $106,000 and appropriates not one-half what was appropriated one year ago to do the same work with.

I have received a copy of the Chicago Times, and also copies of several other papers. The Chicago Times styles this measure as a bill to oppress the widows, cripples, and infants; and while I do not charge upon the Committee on Appropriations that they had any such purpose or design, yet I believe that if the bill reported by them be adopted its effect will be to oppress the widows, cripples, and infants, and place many of them more effectually under the control of unscrupulous attorneys. Now, if there is any class of people whom we ought to protect and whom we ought to pay promptly and faithfully and at Government expense it is our maimed soldiers and the widows and orphans of our dead soldiers. Representing, as I do, a district where there are more than twenty-five hundred pensioners, I feel that I cannot permit this radical change in the system of paying pensioners to be made and require the crippled men and these widows to send their vouchers here and await the delays of any circumlocution office, without, as one member of the Committee on Pensions and of this House, entering my protest and raising my voice against it.

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has seven minutes.

Mr. POWERS. I yield that time to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. BRAGG.]

Mr. BRAGG. Mr. Chairman, I oppose this bill, as it comes from the Committee on Appropriations, proposing to change the means and method of the payment of pensions and to take the payment away from the agencies where they are now paid and transfer it to the hands of the Treasurer of the United States. I am opposed to it for two reasons. First, because I believe it to be wrong in principle, and that the effect of it will be to delay prompt payment to women and children who are in actual necessity of the money at the earliest moment possible when the pay-day arrives. I am opposed to it on another ground: because it comes from a committee that has not charge of the means and methods of paying pensions and recommending amendments to the law to regulate the matter of payment. I believe that to the Committee on Invalid Pensions properly belongs this business, and when that committee antagonize a bill reported by the Committee on Appropriations and introduce a measure of their own I believe that they have had more opportunity to examine and understand the subject and are better prepared to present a bill that will meet the needs of the case. The Committee on Appropriations acts as a naval committee, as a war committee, and in fact as all the other committees of the House.

I think that the man who suggested the idea that this was to be a measure of economy deserves to be classified with the inventor of the Keeley motor.

What do they propose to do? We have at present a system which works so as to pay the pensioners promptly, one that the pensioner understands; he knows where to send his voucher; he knows at what hour he will get his pension. Is there any complaint of the present system? If not, why do the committee propose a system which is a speculation to pay over two hundred thousand needy people scattered all over the United States? Is it because they propose a better way? Is there any complaint that will authorize a radical change and the adoption of a new system for experiment? Does the present system cost too much? If so, adopt the views of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. POWERS] and reduce the expense; but do not cut adrift from the old land-marks and go to the Treasury to seek relief on the score of economy. Under the existing system the pension agent has clerks, and they are responsible for doing the work that he requires of them, and he is subject to removal if he does not discharge his duties promptly. If you send it to the Treasury, who is responsible? All the pensioners in the United States might form themselves in line and protest against the delay in their payment as a great outrage and the Treasury Department would be as deaf to their cries as the grave. If you want these pensioners paid promptly you must have them paid by some person who is within reach of them. If you want them paid economically they must be paid and their papers made out by clerks who work by the hour and who receive pay in accordance with the amount of labor they perform.

Transfer it to the central power and you place the work in the hands of men who do the least work they can for the pay they receive; whereas, when you go out into the country and have your agencies there, each clerk is required not only to work from ten to three o'clock, but beyond office hours so long as the necessities of the pensioner require him to work.

Again, as to the expense: if it costs $55,000 to make the checks alone, what will it cost to make out the vouchers, to keep up the corrections on the list quarterly? Sir, you will find one of these fearful deficiency bills coming in next year, and it will be urged that the deficiency must be promptly met, because it is the money required to pay these poor cripples, widows, and orphans. Sir, in my judgment this thing is only an experiment.

If you allow the agents to hire clerks to do this work, they will do it not only during office hours, but as long as may be necessary. But if it cost the pension agent too much to do it, how much will it cost the Government to take the drones who go into the Treasury Department Building, for no other purpose than to get pay from the Treasury and do as little work as they can for it, to do the same work?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HEWITT, of New York, obtained the floor.

Mr. BUTLER addressed the Chair.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I will yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts. How much time does he desire?

Mr. BUTLER. Not long.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I yield to the gentleman as much time as he may wish.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, in the Forty-third Congress I obtained leave by a two-third vote to move an amendment to the appropriation bill in regard to this matter of paying pensions. With great pains, aided by such instruction as I could get, I prepared the bill which I hold in my hand. It provides in the first place that the payment of pensions shall be bi-monthly. This was to meet a great evil which is that pensioners, in spite of all we can do, pledge their pensions to sharks at usury; and the more you legislate against the sharks the more usury they take, so that it is no use to legislate in that direction.

The bill further provides that the several postmasters in each county or parish (where parish is the proper designation) shall be ex-officio pension agents, and shall be required to attend to the business of examining vouchers, and that the amount of pensions to be paid in each county shall be transmitted to the postmaster. The bill then goes on to provide a mode of working out this system. It requires the postmaster to know personally who the pensioner is, as he may do. It allows the chief clerk to assist him in this business and authorizes both the postmaster and chief clerk to examine the pensioner and his witnesses under oath. It also provides that where a person is under guardianship the pension shall be paid to the guardian. In addition to this the bill makes provision for appropriate penalties. It then abolishes all of the present system in conflict with these provisions. The whole of the existing system is to my mind exceedingly vicious. It has safeguards where they are not needed, and has none where they are needed. Under the system I propose, the payment of these pensions will be a neighborhood matter. Every postmaster can know, when it is made his business to know, the pensioners in his county. The bonds given by these postmasters can be regulated in accordance with the additional duties thus imposed.

Under this bill, it will be the duty of the Commissioner of Pensions to send to each postmaster as early as the third day of every second month a draft on the Treasury for the amount which the pension roll, as brought up to date, shows to be due. By this means bi-monthly payments of pensions could be made without any expense and with better safeguards than you now have. Under this system there would be hardly any human possibility of the United States being defrauded.

After I had introduced this bill and had it referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, the Committee on Invalid Pensions, as I remember, goaded me a little for taking their business out of their hands, as they wanted to deal with the question. I wanted to be good-natured, as I sometimes do, and allowed the measure to go into their hands. But it "slept the sleep that knows no waking;" and for this reason: as soon as the bill was published and distributed over the country, a pension agent (on duty I believe in Philadelphia) who thought it would be a great wrong to everybody, if this bill should pass, called a convention of pension agents to meet in this city. Thereupon all the pension agents came here and button-holed their members; and as they were, in many cases, nephews or cousins or some other relatives of members, they succeeded in persuading them that these pension agencies must not be abolished. Thus they beat me. The only revenge I had, if it can be so called, was that the man who called the convention (a Philadelphia man, if I remember rightly) defaulted soon afterward and ran away. [Laughter.] So my bill has slept from that day to this.

Now, in my judgment, there is no more need of this great expense in the payment of pensions than there is of throwing money into the fire. If I were carrying on a mill in Massachusetts, I could hire a man in civil life to make out the roll of twenty-five hundred employes, keep the accounts, handle all the money, and pay them every month—I could hire without difficulty a perfectly competent man to do this for \$1,500 a year. And he would pay those twenty-five hundred men in three hours with perfect ease. Of course he would make all his preparations during the month. He makes out the roll putting every man's name on it, subject to change up to the last hour; then he sends it round for them all to sign; he puts each man's money in an envelope; and as they pass out on a Saturday afternoon (work being stopped an hour earlier for that purpose) he passes to each man the envelope containing his money. There is not the least difficulty about the matter. I do not want to bid for a contract; but I will make a pretty public bid. I will agree to undertake the payment of these pensions, giving bonds to be responsible for all losses of money over $\frac{1}{2}$ of 1 per cent.; and I will agree that it shall not cost the Government one-quarter of what it costs now. I do not know that I would not resign my seat in Congress to take the matter in hand.

Under the present system vouchers are sworn to before justices of the peace; and within the last five years more than twenty of these justices (I speak within bounds) have been convicted for making false vouchers, they themselves getting up the vouchers.

These men charge the pensioner fifty cents, or a dollar, or $1.50—anything they dare to charge—for making and signing these vouchers. I know of one case in which a justice of the peace required a pensioner and every one of his witnesses who swore to a voucher to pay fifty cents apiece for the oath. This is one way in which pensioners are defrauded, as other gentlemen, I have no doubt, can testify from their own experience.

Now I am speaking of this merely as a business proposition. I would have this business done as I would any other business. I have not sufficiently examined the plan of the Committee on Appropriations to give an opinion upon it; but in framing the measure which I have described I labored with a good deal of assiduity, simply in the interest of the pensioners, in order to prevent them from being preyed upon by those who will take them and board them for a month, furnishing them with all the liquor they want, and then, after drawing their pension money, kick them out; somebody else picking them up and dealing with them in the same way for the next month.

All those things ought to be remedied by the Government. And I know no way of remedying abuses under the Government except to bring the whole matter as near the people as possible. And I know of no way of bringing this near the people better than to bring it to the postmasters of the county seat, generally men of respectability—almost always—very few defalcations—all bonded officers, all men with ample time to do this business and who for ten cents a pensioner will do the business and be glad to do it. And whenever any postmaster of a county seat refuses to do the business for this, I can find a good disabled soldier who will do both the postmaster's business and this business, to be appointed in his place if the President will listen to it. [Laughter.]

I have simply sought the floor to bring this matter to the attention of the House and to the attention of the Pension Committee and to ask them to take a day or two to consider this bill which has very many faults I have no doubt. If they do not like this I will introduce another, [laughter;] I will introduce another bill upon the same subject so as to have it done through the money-order office precisely as money orders are now sent so as to insure the safety of its transmission. Checks cannot always be safe. That would make trouble. I submit to the honorable and learned gentleman who has charge of this bill whether all this, instead of being done by checks, cannot be done by money orders—money-order offices are so numerous over the country—to reach the pensioner in perfect safety.

There is one difficulty about the check system which I beg leave to call attention to. If the check is lost by transmission through the mail then before the pensioner can get another he has to give bonds and various matters to get it again and to be paid, whereas a money order can always be taken care of—never can be got away so it cannot be paid. I have no doubt if the Committee on Pensions or the Committee on Appropriations will call upon the very able and learned gentleman who is at the head of the money-order office in the Post-Office Department he will devise a scheme for them by which it can be done. While I think he will be reluctant to add to his present labors, yet I believe he has enough of right feeling for the soldier to undertake it. It is a shame, it is a disgrace to the administration of the country—I do not mean party administration, but to the administration of the laws—that we cannot have a sum of money devoted to high charity paid out and disbursed without a toll of nearly all told three-quarters of a million of dollars, more than 2½ per cent.

Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. POWERS. I wish to know whether the gentleman is aware that when you take out the amount pension agents pay for postage it only costs about $\frac{1}{10}$ of 1 per cent. to do this business?

Mr. BUTLER. In reference to the economy of the plans now proposed, I have only to say that belongs to the proper committee. I believe the committees of this House in doing their duty always examine details, and their conclusions on matters of detail ought to be taken. I am now on the great question of securing the pensioner from being wronged by those who take advantage of him outside and to secure the Government against the expense of half a million which we can have very much better used in paying more and other pensions to disabled soldiers not now on the pension list. I do not know I can have any profit to say anything more on this question to the House; but I beg leave to send this bill to the chairman having this bill in charge, because it may be inconvenient to him to get another copy of it. I will now yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I beg leave to say to the gentleman from Massachusetts I will hold this in trust for the chairman of the subcommittee having the bill in charge, for I am only second on the committee. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SMITH] standing behind the gentleman from Massachusetts is chairman of the subcommittee.

Mr. BUTLER. I amend then what I said, the gentleman having charge of the bill.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Mr. Chairman, this debate discloses the fact that there is a substantial agreement on two points: first, that nothing shall be done to interfere with the certainty that the pensioner shall receive his just dues promptly from the public Treasury. No member of the Committee on Appropriations or of the Committee on Pensions will assent to any system by which the soldier who served his country in the hour of peril or the family of that soldier shall suffer one iota of delay or wrong by the legislation of this House. The second point of agreement is that a great economy can be effected on the mode of paying pensions. The difference between us, therefore, is only as to methods of payment, and not as to the results which we all seek to accomplish. The Committee on Appropriations have felt constrained to deal with the subject, because under the rules of the House it is made their duty to suggest legislation that will tend toward retrenchment in the public expenditures, and at the time they began the preparation of this bill no proposition looking to economy in this respect had so far, we knew, been made by the Committee on Pensions. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. POWERS] in the course of this debate is the first formal attempt to bring the matter to the consideration of the House by the Committee on Pensions, so far as I have any knowledge.

The Committee on Appropriations propose a method by which the payment of pensions will in their judgment cost only $130,000. The Committee on Pensions propose a system by which in their judgment it will cost $216,000, and they complain rather of the Committee on Appropriations that they have brought in any measure here which looks to this economy, and they seem to regard it as a special and peculiar function of the Committee on Pensions to report legislation in reference to this question.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. The gentleman will allow me to say that the distinction between the proposition of the Committee on Appropriations and that of the Committee on Invalid Pensions is that the one is a certainty and the other is an uncertainty; the one can be calculated and the other cannot. The proposition of the Committee on Appropriations is a mere speculation; the proposition of the Committee on Invalid Pensions is a fixed amount and can be calculated by figures. That is the difference.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I beg leave to say to my friend from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT] that there is no more certainty in the one method than in the other, and I think I shall be able to prove before I get through that the sum which the Committee on Appropriations have reported to the House will be amply sufficient to cover the entire cost; and I venture the prediction now that we shall not be called on next year to report more than a hundred thousand dollars to cover the expenses of this service, so great will be the economy developed in practice.

Now, I wish the House to understand how this matter came up in the Committee on Appropriations. The expenses last year of this service as reported by the Secretary of the Treasury was $452,676.77, and the estimate for the fiscal year ending on the 30th of June, 1879, was $315,000, the difference in the expense being due to the consolidation of the fifty-eight pension agencies into eighteen agencies now remaining. The attention of the Committee on Appropriations was directed to the remarkable fact that this consolidation had reduced the expenses more than $140,000. The question naturally arose whether a further consolidation would not reduce the expenses still further.

The first thing we inquired into, was whether consolidation from fifty-eight to eighteen had interfered with the interests of the pensioners, and we found by personal consultation with the Commissioner of Pensions, and also from his official report, that the pensioners have received their pay with equal promptitude and certainty and with as much if not greater satisfaction than at any previous period. That fact is not controverted. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. POWERS] did not controvert it; and in answer to a question which I asked him he said that he had reason to believe that the complaints were very few; but the House will readily see that no system can be adopted under which there will not arise some grounds of complaint.

The next point was to consider how the consolidation from eighteen to one, for that is the practical effect of the bill proposed by the Committee on Appropriations, could be effected. Examination shows that now three pension-rolls are kept, one in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions, one by the pension agents, and a third by the Third Auditor of the Treasury, in order that he may settle the accounts of the pension agents. The process by which the money reaches the pensioners is this: the Commissioner of Pensions has printed blanks which he forwards to the pension agents; they fill up the blanks and send them by mail to the pensioners; the pensioner swears to the affidavit attached to the blank and returns it to the pension agent, and then the pension agent pays the money by check, and his voucher goes forward to the Third Auditor. It is there compared with the roll in his office and the account of the pension agent finally settled.

Now, then, there is certainly no necessity for three rolls. One roll in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions and another roll in the office of the Third Auditor are all that is necessary for the settlement of the pension accounts; and according to the best estimate I can get the cost of maintaining these rolls is very large, probably $40,000 a year for each set. Here, then, is a chance of economy by saving the annual cost of one of the rolls. The fees of the pension agents now allowed by law were estimated to amount to $225,000. In the estimate submitted to us the compensation to pension agents and their expenses was about $90,000. Now, it is perfectly evident if you adopt this provision of the bill doing away with the pension agents you save their salaries.

But if the pension agents are discontinued, the first question is who shall fill up the vouchers? It is now done by the Government, and not by the pensioners. It is paid for by the Government, and not by the pensioners. That system should continue. The vouchers must then be either filled up in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions or in the office of the Third Auditor of the Treasury. Either can do it, because both offices contain copies of the pension-rolls. That in the Pension Office is not now altogether perfect, but it can readily be made so with but little additional expense.

We applied, of course, to the Commissioner of Pensions for an estimate of the cost of doing this work; and he furnished us with a copy of his letter on that subject, in which he estimates the cost of filling up the vouchers on what is termed the second plan at $84,140. Now gentlemen have in a loose way undertaken to intimate that the expense will be far in excess of this sum; but will any man pretend that the Commissioner of Pensions, who is accustomed to this class of work, would send to our committee a lower estimate than he thought the work could be done for? Is that the practice of the Departments of this Government? Whatever shortcomings there may be, they are certainly not to be found in not estimating largely enough for the expenses of the machinery of Government; and it is in this class of expenditures, if anywhere, that we are to find the opportunities for retrenchment and the restoration to that economy in administration which is almost one of the lost arts in this country.

Now on looking at this estimate I found immediately that the Commissioner had made an error; that he had added to the cost of making out these vouchers 8 per cent. for leaves of absence which he had already included in a previous item of the account. Thus $6,290 must be deducted from his estimate. I asked the Commissioner how much time was usually granted for leave of absence. He answered, a month. I then asked him how many hours a day the clerks worked at the office; he told me they came at nine o'clock and left at four, and that they had half an hour for lunch, leaving six and one-half hours as a day's labor. Now the law requires that the clerks in the Departments of the Government shall work eight hours a day. If they do this, all deductions for leaves of absence and other percentages will be far more than counterbalanced; and if this reform were introduced into the clerical service of the Pension Bureau, the new work could be done without any additional cost whatever.

From my conversation with the Commissioner and my general knowledge as to how this class of work is done, I am satisfied that his estimate of $84,000, reduced by the process I have mentioned to $78,000, might be very readily brought down to $65,000. If this work is confided to the Commissioner of Pensions, I know so well his efficiency as a public officer that I am sure the expense will not exceed, if it comes up to, $65,000.

Now, after filling out the vouchers the next thing is to compare them, when they are returned, with the pay-rolls, in order to see that they are properly executed and the amounts properly computed.

Mr. POWERS. Does the gentleman from New York know that the Commissioner of Pensions, when examined before the Committee on Invalid Pensions, stated that he could not do this work for less than $210,000?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I hold in my hand the letter of the Commissioner of Pensions, addressed to Hon. Carl Schurz, Secretary of the Interior, in which, replying to the question what it will cost to do this work, his answer is (as the gentleman will find by referring to the Senate Miscellaneous Document No. 33, page 11) that he can do it for $77,800, exclusive of the allowance which had been erroneously included in the estimate. If the Commissioner has given any one any other information than this, I leave him to reconcile his statements with each other.

As I was saying when interrupted by the gentleman from Maine, the next point is the comparison of the vouchers with the pay-rolls. This work is now done by the pension agent. When this office is abolished it must be done by somebody else. There is now a roll kept in the Third Auditor's office. The Third Auditor now has to do this very work after the payment of the pension. He can just as well do it in advance of the payment. Hence this labor on the part of the pension agent is altogether superfluous under any proper system of payments. The Third Auditor was applied to for information as to how much additional force he would require to accomplish this work. He estimates the additional expense at from $40,000 to $45,000, but it has since been stated unofficially in the Treasury Department by a competent and experienced officer that it can be done for $20,000. Now, adding this $20,000 to the $55,000, and we have $85,000 as the estimates of these officers themselves for doing this work up to the time the completed pension list reaches the Treasury.

Then comes the last piece of work to be done which is after the voucher is compared to get the check to the pensioner. Now gentlemen must bear in mind that the pensioners are not to any considerable extent paid by the hand of the pension agent. The returns show that 87½ per cent. of all the payments are now made by the pension agents by mail. The evidence of this statement is to be found on page 11 of the annual report of the Commissioner of Pensions for the year 1877. Therefore, when you send all these checks by mail you will practically do what is now done by the pension agent as to this large proportion of them. And even as to those who now apply to the pension agent in person, you will save time and expense, and in the cases of women and cripples very great inconvenience, for the postman will deliver the check at the residences in all the large cities, and in the rural districts the post-office is the natural resort of the neighborhood.

The cost of making out the checks is the next thing to be considered. This is now done by the pension agent. When this office is abolished somebody else must do it. The Treasurer of the United States is the proper man to pay the debts of the United States. Any system which imposes upon any other officer the duty of paying the debts of the Government is a vicious system and should be abolished, because it puts the public money at risk unnecessarily in the hands of subordinate agents. We applied to the Treasurer for an estimate of the cost of making out the checks and transmitting them to the pensioners. He has given us a detailed estimate based upon his experience in filling out checks in payment of interest on the public debt. His estimate is $55,000. He says, however, that this is an extreme estimate; that after the system gets working he thinks he will be able to do it for less. If you add eighty-five thousand, the amount at which I had previously arrived, to this fifty-five thousand, you have $140,000 as the cost. Now I am frank to say that I urged my colleagues upon the committee to make the sum $140,000 instead of $130,000 because I wanted to give every dollar these gentlemen could in reason require to do the work. I believe $130,000 is ample; I believe it is more than sufficient; I believe that after the first year the expenses will be reduced so as not to exceed $100,000.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Will the gentleman from New York yield to a question?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Certainly, sir.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Let me ask the gentleman from New York whether in the calculation of the Secretary of the Treasury there is or not included the cost of postage which will be required?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. It does not include any cost of postage. He includes only the cost of clerks and time required to fill out addresses and mail the checks. The cost of postage will be three cents four times a year, which would be twelve cents a year on about two hundred and thirty-two thousand vouchers, and would amount to about $28,000 if paid. But the gentleman should be aware that the Treasurer pays no postage—that all these public documents are carried without extra expense to the Government. There is no more money paid to the railways or mail carriers than if they were not sent.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I should like to ask the gentleman whether it does not cost something to carry them.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. It costs the Government no more. It may cost the railways and mail carriers something more, but they no doubt, from what we have seen, are perfectly able to take care of themselves in this House.

I wish to say to my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] that his system of paying by postmasters at ten cents a voucher would cost, as there are between nine hundred thousand and one million vouchers, between $90,000 and $100,000; and then somebody would have to fill out the checks, which would cost $55,000, so that the system under his bill would cost $145,000, or $15,000 more than the plan submitted by the Committee on Appropriations.

But it is alleged with great earnestness that it will cause delay to the pensioner if the pension agents be dispensed with. If that allegation were sound it would be a serious objection, but it will cause no delay. The organization of the Third Auditor's Office, where the comparison of vouchers must be made—and it is this comparison only which is likely to cause delay—is such that he can put a large force at any time upon any particular class of work. And he is never so engrossed in the general work of the Government that it will be inconvenient for him to use a large force temporarily for this purpose.

So if the quarterly system of payment as now in vogue be continued on the present plan, the comparison of the accounts which vary from quarter to quarter, as stated by my friend from Maine to be about fifteen thousand in number, can be made with as much rapidity as now made by the pension agents, and by a class of men drilled and trained for the express work of comparison and computation.

It is said there will be delay in drawing checks in the office of the Treasurer. Doubtless there would be delay if the Treasurer were forced to draw all his checks after the receipt of vouchers from the Third Auditor's Office; but there is no such obligation. He can keep his force signing checks according to the last pay-roll during the entire quarter, and at the end of it, when comparison comes in, he would be subjected to the trouble and responsibility of filling ten or fifteen thousand checks which might be found to be changed from the last pay-roll. If that were to be done in that way it would delay the payment as to these ten thousand or fifteen thousand accounts from three to five days.

But there is a far better system than the quarterly system. It is one which will commend itself to the judgment of the House as it has to the mind of every public officer who has taken it into consideration; and that is to divide the roll of pensioners into twelve equal parts and let one-twelfth be paid the quarterly pensions each month, so that the work goes unceasingly on and the payment of pensions will be made with perfect regularity. The only delay which will be caused by that change in the system would be in the first month to the pensioner who is changed from the time when he was paid his pension before.

Now, sir, I think I have shown this system will work; that it will cost only $140,000 at my figures and $130,000 at the figures of my colleague, the chairman of the subcommittee; that it will save on the system now in existence $185,000 and on the system proposed by the Committee on Pensions $86,000; that it will dispense with eighteen officers who are mere supernumeraries; that it will substitute trained clerks accustomed to this business for those men who, according to the statement of the gentleman from Maine, cost $140,000 a year to do what the Commissioner of Pensions says he can do for $78,000.

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Certainly.

Mr. FINLEY. I desire to inquire of the gentleman whether he can give us a statement of the amount that it will now cost for clerk hire, office rent, and postage to the Department.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The amount allowed for compensation to the pension agents is $72,000 a year and the amount allowed for incidental expenses is $18,000 a year. Then they have $225,000 a year in addition to that, out of which to pay clerk hire which the Commissioner of Pensions says will cost in his office not to exceed $78,000. That is the statement of it, and that is the wrong of the present system, so unnecessarily extravagant.

Now gentlemen talk about this being a bill—let me give the exact language—"to oppress cripples, widows, and infants." The gentleman who said this forgets that when any public money is wasted, needlessly expended, it is raised by taxation upon the hard earnings of the laboring people of this country. He forgets that these very cripples, widows, and infants must contribute their share of this unnecessary taxation. And if this House fails in its duty to prohibit all unnecessary expenditures of public money then they oppress cripples, widows, and infants as well as the suffering industry of this country. And it is from that point of view only that this committee have approached this subject. They have no pride in coming in this House and arrogating to themselves the duties of other committees. To some gentlemen it seems to be enough that a bill in the interest of economy shall be brought into this House by the Committee on Appropriations, in order to oppose it. For one, I will take economy from any committee of this House, from any member of this House, whether he be republican or democrat, and I will give him the credit for it. And if this bill be not in the interest of economy, I say to this House vote it down. But I ask any gentleman here and now to show me any defect in the figures I have presented, any error in the reasoning I have adopted, any mistake in the results I have reached.

Mr. FRYE. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York a question.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I will hear the gentleman.

Mr. FRYE. The gentleman from New York makes a proposition which strikes me as being a very sensible one; and that is, that the roll be divided by twelve and that payments be made monthly to each division. I desire to ask him whether or not the bill reported by the Committee on Appropriations makes such a provision?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. It does not. I am sorry to say that it does not. My reason for not urging it upon that bill is this, and I wish the gentleman from Maine to understand it. I am very reluctant, and so long as I serve on the Committee on Appropriations I shall always be very reluctant, to assume any more right to legislate than is absolutely necessary to bring about economical results. I am very jealous of the arrogation of that power by the Committee on Appropriations, and for that reason that provision is not in this bill. But I do hope a bill will be reported by the extremely industrious Committee on Pensions to effect that object, and such a bill will receive my hearty support.

Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Yes, sir.

Mr. POWERS. I wish to ask the gentleman from New York whether his remark about the extremely industrious Committee on Invalid Pensions was intended as a slur or a compliment?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. It was intended as a compliment. I have known no committee in this House that has been more industrious in trying to take the floor away from every other committee than the Committee on Invalid Pensions. My friend from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT] in season and out of season has tried to get the floor of this House for the Mexican pension bill; and my friend from Maine [Mr. POWERS] has been most industrious in taking the floor on all occasions where pensions were concerned, and I commend him for his zeal in behalf of the wards of the nation, in which I fully sympathize. There is no committee in this House which does its work more thoroughly and satisfactorily than the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and I regret that in this measure of economy, and as I believe of beneficence to the pensioner, we have not had their hearty support.

Mr. FINLEY. I ask the gentleman from New York to yield to me five or ten minutes.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. How much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has ten minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Then I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FINLEY.]

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania, rose.

Mr. FINLEY. If the gentleman in charge of the bill desires to move that the committee rise I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I desire to move that the committee rise for the purpose of limiting the time for general debate. I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and, Mr. POTTER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. GARFIELD reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 3974) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I move that the rules be suspended and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and pending that motion I move that all general debate on the pending bill be limited to five minutes.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I hope the gentleman will allow a longer time than that.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I will modify the motion so as to limit all general debate to one half hour.

The motion limiting debate, as modified, was agreed to.

The motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. GARFIELD in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the pension appropriation bill.

Mr. FINLEY. I only desire to say a few words. I have attentively listened to the debate upon this subject for the purpose before voting of arriving at a conclusion, if possible, as to which plan for paying pensions will be the better and cheaper, the bill as reported by the Committee on Appropriations or the substitute of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. POWERS.] The amount appropriated by the substitute offered by the gentleman from Maine is $216,000. Now, in order to arrive at the amount of the expenses incurred in paying pensioners under his substitute we must look to what is provided for in the three clauses making payment of salaries and expenses to agents; and if in so doing we can arrive at what is paid to the agents as salaries and what is allowed them in the shape of fees and what is allowed them for office expenses, including rent, fuel, light, &c., then we can approximate the actual cost that would be incurred in paying pensions if the substitute were adopted.

The first provision of the substitute is that the salaries of each of these eighteen agents shall be $4,000 a year. Then, in order to enable each agent to pay for clerk hire, he is allowed in the second clause the sum of $15 for each one hundred vouchers prepared by him in excess of four thousand per annum. Now, what will that amount to? There are eighteen agencies. I have selected a few. At the Washington office there were issued 52,000 vouchers last year, and that would amount to $7,200 to pay clerk hire. At Indianapolis there were 56,000 vouchers issued, and the amount allowed for clerk hire there would be $7,800, in addition to the $4,000 salary. At Columbus, Ohio, there were issued 80,000 vouchers, which would make the allowance for clerk hire $11,400, in addition to the salary. At Louisville there were 20,000 vouchers issued, which would involve a cost of $2,400 for clerk hire. At Concord there were 64,000 vouchers issued, which would involve, besides salary, an additional cost of $9,600 clerk hire. At Boston there were issued 60,000 vouchers, which would involve an additional cost of $8,400. All this, as I understand it, is to go to the agent in addition to his salary of $4,000 per annum.

Mr. POWERS. I will state to the gentleman that in Columbus, Ohio, there are twenty clerks required.

Mr. FINLEY. But that is not all that is allowed to these agents; there is a third provision, which is that he shall be allowed for actual and necessary expenses for rent, fuel, lights, and postage.

Mr. POWERS. That is not money to be paid to him.

Mr. FINLEY. It is money paid him as part of his expenditures in addition to his salary and in addition to the allowance of $15 for every one hundred vouchers made out in excess of the four thousand.

Mr. POWERS. It is for actual expenses where the agent is not in a Government building, and two thirds of them are in Government buildings.

Mr. FINLEY. Now, if we knew the amount of the actual cost and expenses of rent, fuel, lights, &c., incurred annually—and I am frank to say that so far as that is concerned I have not the data to speak from—we could arrive at the amount which would be necessarily expended annually under the substitute of the gentlemen from Maine in the payment of pensions; but it occurs to me, from the data that have been furnished us, that the amount to be expended annually will be at least as much as the sum appropriated by the gentleman's substitute, $216,000.

Mr. POWERS. What amount? The amount under the last clause of the substitute? What do you mean?

Mr. FINLEY. I mean that the amount to be expended in paying pensions, including salaries paid and the $15 for each one hundred vouchers in excess of the four thousand, and the money paid for the necessary expenses of rent, fuel, light, &c., under the gentleman's substitute will amount to more than the estimated amount necessary to cover the total expenditures in paying the pensioners under the bill now under consideration.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I now yield to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HANNA.]

The CHAIRMAN. By the order made by the House debate is limited to one half hour, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] has not control of the floor.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I am sorry, then, that I lost control of the floor.

Mr. THOMPSON. This whole matter is a mistake. My colleague [Mr. SMITH] neither moved nor intended to move that the House should go into Committee of the Whole; he simply moved that when the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union debate should be limited; but the motion was put on going into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and now I understand that he wishes to reverse that decision by moving that the committee do now rise.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I desire to do so at the suggestion of gentlemen around me. I move that the committee do now rise. The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 60, noes 40.

So the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. SAYLER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. GARFIELD reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 3974) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1879, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed and requested the concurrence of the House in bills of the following titles:

A bill (S. No. 15) to alter and amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862; and also to alter and amend the act of Congress approved July 2, 1864, in amendment of said first-named act;

A bill (S. No. 55) for the relief of John W. Douglass; and

A bill (S. No. 1033) for the relief of J. C. McBurney.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 1412) to prevent depredation upon property in the District of Columbia.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I move that the House do now adjourn.

PRINTING OF SMITHSONIAN REPORT.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, by unanimous consent, pending the motion to adjourn, laid before the House the following concurrent resolution of the Senate; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That 10,500 copies of the Report of the Smithsonian Institution for the year 1877 be printed; 1,000 copies of which shall be for the use of the Senate; 3,000 shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, and 6,500 for the use of the Smithsonian Institution; provided that the aggregate number of pages shall not exceed five hundred and that there be no illustrations except those furnished by the Smithsonian Institution.

TAX ERRONEOUSLY ASSESSED.

On motion of Mr. POTTER, by unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 1012) authorizing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to abate a certain tax, erroneously assessed, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

IMPROVEMENT OF COLUMBIA RIVER.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting an estimate of survey of the channel of the mouth of the Columbia River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

TRANSPORTATION OF ARMY OFFICERS, ETC.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of the Quartermaster-General as to the amount paid for the transportation of officers and their clerks traveling under orders; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. BANKS for withdrawing from the files of the Committee on Invalid Pensions papers in the case of Martin Binney, for transmission to the Commissioner of Pensions.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Leave of absence was granted—

To Mr. BUNDY, for four days, on account of important business;

To Mr. STONE, of Michigan, for ten days, on account of important business;

To Mr. MCGOWAN, for ten days, on account of important business; and

To Mr. WALSH, for one day, on account of important business.

Several members called for the regular order.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania, that the House adjourn, it was agreed to, there being—ayes 90, noes 36; and accordingly (at four o'clock and five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BELL: A paper relating to the establishment of a post-route between Hiwassee, Georgia, and Shooting Creek, North Carolina—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post Roads.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, April 11, 1878.

Prayer by Rev. C. C. KIMBALL, of Erie, Pennsylvania.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Second Auditor of the Treasury, transmitting copies of accounts received by him from persons charged with the disbursement or application of moneys, goods, or effects for the benefit of the Indians from the 1st of July, 1876, to the 30th of June, 1877, inclusive; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Commissioner of Patents making an estimate of $5,000 for continuing the work of restoring the models injured by the late fire in the Patent Office; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the 27th ultimo, a report of the Quartermaster-General giving certain information in regard to the Atlantic and North Carolina Railroad; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. ANTHONY. There is a great deal of important business before the committees, and I think it would expedite the transaction of the public business if we should adjourn over until Monday and give the committees an opportunity to act. I move, therefore, that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. MORRILL. I suggest whether it would not be well to wait until later in the day to see how far we get along in the business of the day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion is not debatable. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented the petition of the heirs of Walter Hunt, praying for an extension of his patent for paper collars; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. DAWES presented the memorial of J. A. Beauvais and 101 others, citizens of New Bedford, Massachusetts, and the memorial of C. O. Chapin and others, citizens of Massachusetts, remonstrating against the passage of any act imposing a tax on incomes; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BARNUM presented the petition of M. W. Galt, H. A. Willard, W. H. Clagett, and 60 others, citizens of the District of Columbia, praying for the removal of the tracks of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company from certain streets in the city of Washington; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HARRIS presented the petition of John G. King and others, citizens of Bristol, Tennessee, praying that the city of Memphis, in that State, may be made the eastern terminus of any southern railway which may be constructed connecting the waters of the Mississippi River with the Pacific Ocean; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. EUSTIS presented the memorial of Horace Tyler, W. M. Owen, and 799 others, engaged in mercantile pursuits in New Orleans, Louisiana; the memorial of Louis F. Garie and 102 others, engaged in mercantile pursuits in New Orleans, Louisiana; and the memorial of A. Jackson and 117 others, sea-faring men, having trade with New Orleans, Louisiana, remonstrating against the proposed transfer of the life-saving service from the Treasury to the Navy Department; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MORGAN presented the petition of James E. Slaughter, of Mobile, Alabama, praying that payment of the claims of Benjamin Weil and of the La Abra Silver Mining Company may be suspended, as payment of the Venezuelan awards was suspended, until an investigation can be had of charges of fraud made by the Mexican government in regard thereto; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented additional papers in relation to the claim of Dr. John B. Read, praying compensation for improvements in projectiles for rifled ordnance, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BECK presented the petition of Emily Hughes, of Clay County, Kentucky, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. McCREERY presented the petition of Eliza A. Frizell, of Russellville, Logan County, Kentucky, administratrix of the estate of Benjamin B. Frizell, deceased, praying compensation for horses taken from her husband and appropriated by the United States Government during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented the petition of Marian W. Thurmond, of Logan County, Kentucky, praying compensation for horses and mule taken from her during the late war by order of the military authorities of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented the petition of N. M. Powell, of Allen County, Kentucky, widow of Patrick Raney, deceased, late of the Twenty-first Regiment Kentucky Infantry Volunteers, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

THE PRESIDENTIAL ELECTORAL VOTE.

Mr. DENNIS. I present a joint resolution of the Legislature of Maryland, authorizing judicial proceedings to give effect to the electoral vote of Maryland. I ask that it may be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be reported at length, the Chair hearing no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the General Assembly of Maryland, That the attorney-general of the State be, and he is hereby, instructed, in case Congress shall provide for expediting the action, to exhibit a bill in the Supreme Court of the United States, on behalf of the State of Maryland, with proper parties thereto, setting forth the fact that due effect has not been given to the electoral vote cast by this State on the 6th day of December, 1876, by reason of fraudulent returns made from other States and allowed to be counted provisionally by the Electoral Commission, and subject to judicial revision, and praying said court to make the revision contemplated by the act establishing said commission; and upon such revision to declare the returns from the States of Louisiana and Florida, which were counted for Rutherford B. Hayes and William A. Wheeler, fraudulent and void, and that the legal electoral votes of said States were cast for Samuel J. Tilden as President and Thomas A. Hendricks as Vice-President, and that by virtue thereof and of 184 votes cast by other States, of which 8 were cast by the State of Maryland, the said Tilden and Hendricks were duly elected; and praying said court to decree accordingly.

Attest:

MILTON G. KIDD,
Chief Clerk of the House of Delegates.
AUGUSTUS GASSAWAY,
Secretary of the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL. I suppose that will lie on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. What disposition does the Senator from Maryland desire?

Mr. DENNIS. Mr. President, if the Senate will bear with me a moment I will explain my relation to this resolution. There are no instructions coming to me from the Legislature of my State in regard to it, and I am opposed to it. I shall act with good faith. I voted for the appointment of the electoral commission, and I will stand by the decision of that commission. I feel in honor bound to sustain it. I feel that if I were to do otherwise I should be unworthy as a member of the Senate to a seat upon this floor. Moreover, I am sure that while reason holds her sway over the minds of our people any attempt to reverse the decision of that commission will not succeed. I do not consider this Senate a suitable arena for the exercise of such a power as the joint resolution which has been read would propose.

Our people desire peace. We have had enough disturbance throughout this land. No man within the confines of my State desires to witness a renewal of such scenes as have been enacted within the last fourteen or fifteen years. No one can desire to see brothers weltering in brothers' gore. We want unity, peace, and concord, and never while I hold a position on this floor shall there be one act of mine, the effect of which would be otherwise than to contribute and aid in bringing about fraternal accord between every section of our country.

Sir, we are one people, identified and bound together by all the ties of relationship and by every tie that can bind man to his fellow-man. Let those who died in that sanguinary strife rest in peace. Let those who were baptized by the blood of that strife, and slumber among the dead, sleep in peace until the day of final resurrection when the archangel shall assemble the uncounted millions by the sound of his trumpet and call upon the sea and all the earth to give up their dead.

Sir, we are united as a people in all and in every respect. We are bound by bands of iron, and I may say by a network of nerves in a telegraph so arranged that when you touch one point you touch the whole. Sir, to the Pacific Ocean I have sent one of my children, who is as dear to me as my own heart's blood. His destiny is fixed with those people in that growing, rich, and populous section. While he sleeps by the gentle murmurs of the placid Pacific, whose waters are rolling within the sound of his ears, I, in a noonday sunshine almost, am here, and shall labor to do whatever I can to promote the interest of that section in which his future destiny is fixed, and of every section of our common country. In the presentation of these resolutions I have performed a duty which respect for the Legislature of my State demands. But, believing that the interest of every section of our Union calls for acquiescence in the decision made by the electoral commission, I feel constrained to state that I shall deem it incumbent on me to oppose any action by this body in furtherance of the intent of the resolutions.

I ask that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so referred.

FAMINE IN CHINA.

Mr. MITCHELL. I received this morning the following cablegram from Tien Tsin, China, in relation to the famine in that country, which I deem it not improper to call to the attention of the Senate. It is addressed to myself at Washington, and reads as follows:

Famine spreading; cannibalism exists; no rain; worse next year; will indemnity bill pass?

It is signed by Owen N. Denny, the United States consul at that point.

I believe the Committee on Foreign Affairs had the subject under consideration some time ago. I do not know what action has been taken upon the matter by the committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The dispatch will be referred to that committee.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 385) for the relief of settlers on the public lands, moved its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 1071) for the relief of settlers on the public lands.

The bill was read twice by its title, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BOOTH, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 379) for the relief of William Wheeler Hubbell, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. McMILLAN. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 576) to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of imported merchandise, to report it with the recommendation that it pass. I call attention to a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, suggesting some views in opposition to the bill.

Mr. CONKLING, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3739) to prevent the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1639) making an appropriation for pier-lights at the entrance of the jetties at South Pass in the Mississippi River, reported it without amendment.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to call up for present action, if the morning business is through—

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair has not completed the call of the Calendar.

Mr. SARGENT. I gave notice to the Senate last night that I desired to call up for reference to-day the joint resolution (S. R. No. 20) relative to Chinese immigration. My colleague [Mr. BOOTH] has been ill for some time and therefore has not been able hitherto to speak upon the joint resolution. He is extremely desirous to speak upon it, and it is our desire to have the resolution referred to the committee for their action at this session. I trust, observing the ordinary courtesies in the Senate, that the Senator from Vermont will allow my colleague to submit his remarks this morning.

Mr. MORRILL. The bill I desire to call up will not take five minutes' time.

Mr. SARGENT. It may take an hour. I understand my colleague will be quite brief.

Mr. MORRILL. I desired to bring up the bill yesterday morning. The VICE-PRESIDENT. The introduction of bills and joint resolutions is next in order.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. DORSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1072) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to register the schooner Ida B; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. McMILLAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1073) granting lands to the State of Minnesota in lieu of certain lands heretofore granted to said State; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. GARLAND asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1074) for the relief of Winfrey N. Swayne and Philip K. Howard; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BUTLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1075) to fix and regulate the status of brevet rank in the Army of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CHAFFEE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1076) for the relief of the heirs of John S. Fillmore, late of Denver, Colorado; which was read twice by its title, and, with the papers on the files relating to the case, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. McCREERY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1077) granting a pension to Mrs. Narcissa Powell; which, with the accompanying papers, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1078) for the relief of Mrs. Eliza A. Frizell; which, with the accompanying papers, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1079) for the relief of Mrs. Marion W. Thurmond; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WALLACE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1080) authorizing the issue of passports free to colored citizens going to Brazil; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. MORGAN, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Dr. John B. Read be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion of Mr. COCKRELL, it was Ordered, That in the matter of the application of Louis Koerth, late of the Seventh Missouri Cavalry, to be allowed a pension, he have leave to withdraw the papers from the files of the Senate.

AMENDMENT TO POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. CONOVER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. No. 802) establishing post-roads in the several States and Territories; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BURNSIDE. If the morning business is through—
The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under the notice given, the Chair will recognize the Senator from California, [Mr. SARGENT.]

Mr. MORRILL. I ask the Senator to allow me five minutes to take up a bill. If there is any discussion I will let it go over.

Mr. SARGENT. If the Senator will not take more than five minutes I shall yield.

Mr. MORRILL. No, I will not.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I thought the understanding was yesterday that after the morning business to-day Senate bill No. 178 regarding enlistments of the colored citizen should be taken up. There was no objection to the arrangement.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Several Senators in the order of the proceedings yesterday gave notice of business that they would call up to-day.

Mr. BURNSIDE. It was specifically understood that that bill should come up this morning after the morning business.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator from Rhode Island has occupied the morning hour for several mornings with the bill, and it is obvious that it must be taken up at some other time than during the morning hour because there are Senators who desire to discuss it.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I give way every morning.

Mr. SARGENT. We are now frittering away the morning hour in talking about the order of business.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Every morning the bill has been up I have given way. I ask that a vote be taken. I will say to the Senator from California that I am perfectly willing that the Senate shall take a vote on the motion of the Senator from Maine for the indefinite postponement of the bill in order to test the sense of the Senate. I do not want to discuss it at all. We all understand it, and I can see no reason why there should be any delay in voting upon it.

Mr. SARGENT. I move to take up the joint resolution (S. R. No. 20) relative to Chinese immigration, to test the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from California, pursuant to notice given by him, moves to take up the joint resolution which he has named.

Mr. MORRILL. Will the Senator yield after he takes up the bill?
Mr. SARGENT. If the Senator will not take more than five minutes, I will yield.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from California to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution.

The motion was agreed to.

NEW ORLEANS MINT.

Mr. MORRILL. Now I ask the Senate to take up the bill (S. No. 1058) to repair and put in operation the mint at New Orleans, authorizing the coinage of silver and gold thereat and making an appropriation therefor. I will state in advance that the Committee on Finance report this bill unanimously. We have considered all the sites that have been recommended and urged for new mints, and have finally concluded that this is the only mint that we shall be likely to need to put in operation at the present time. It will be a considerable convenience for the purpose of receiving bullion from Mexico and also for the distribution of the coin. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the coinage of gold and silver, according to existing law, at the mint in New Orleans, and appropriates $75,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, in placing the mint in condition for coinage; but before the expenditure of any money for this purpose the city of New Orleans is to release and quit-claim to the United States all title and all claim of every character and all conditions of forfeiture to the lands and premises upon which the mint is located.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

Mr. SARGENT. I call for the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution is before the Senate. The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. No. 20) relative to Chinese immigration.

Mr. BOOTH. Mr. President, no question of graver importance or more absorbing interest to the people of the State I have the honor in part to represent has ever been presented to the consideration of the Senate than that to which I invite attention. To most of you, Senators, it is an abstraction; to them it is vital, touching not only the dominance of parties, forms of government, and methods of law, but the organization of society itself. I do not think I overstate the gravity of the situation in asserting my belief that early legislation by Congress upon this subject may prevent a convulsion in California which will shake the foundation of social order. I deem it my solemn duty to express my conviction that if it shall be decided that the policy of free, unrestricted immigration of Chinese is right and must be maintained, the Government should be prepared to maintain it by force and to overawe a community which on this subject is rife with dangerous discontent.

It may be that it is wrong that it is so; doubtless many of you believe it to be grievously wrong, but you are entitled to know the truth, however it may influence your opinions or action.

GENERAL UNANIMITY OF SENTIMENT ON THIS SUBJECT IN THE PACIFIC STATES.

On this question there is as general unanimity of public sentiment in California, and I believe in her sister States on the Pacific border, as is ever attained upon any political question in time of peace, and there is a deep-seated feeling that the sentiment of the community immediately interested in and practically familiar with the subject is not to be put aside as an exhibition of prejudice, ebullience of passion, or treated as a corrupt humor of the blood, but is entitled to grave consideration.

AGITATION.

Public opinion is agitated in California and the most conservative sentiment is alarmed. We constantly decry agitation, but the only agitator to be feared is the presence of wrong; and while that continues there will be agitation or the stagnation of political death. The theory of our Government is not one of repression, but of voluntary obedience to laws which represent public opinion. When Enceladus stirs beneath the surface, the foundations of the temples are but as straw and stubble.

THE PEOPLE OF THE PACIFIC COAST

are widely separated from the great mass of their countrymen in distance, but they are blood of their blood, bone of their bone, and they yield to none in their devotion to the traditions of the Republic and love for its institutions. California is not yet a generation old. Its active men of to-day, its forming minds, went out from your midst, carrying with them American ideas, to meet new and strange conditions of life. It was a novel experience, and to those who enjoyed it it is like first love, the memory of which is sweeter than present possession.

No community ever better illustrated the American capacity for self-government. Social order preceded the restraints of law. The pioneers of the new "El Dorado" carried the American State in the "book and volume of their brain." There was no necessity for vice-roy or charter or letters-patent. Men from every section of our common country, thousands of miles from the homes they had left behind them, met in a land so recently acquired that it still seemed foreign soil, under conditions so novel they seemed hardly a part of the daily life of human experience, and by a common impulse improvised a State. It is a new chapter in history and the best imprint of American civilization is upon it.

I trust I have not transcended the limits of good taste. I am not endeavoring to exalt the State of my adoption above other States, but to illustrate the adaptability of American character and the American idea of government. There are no States, few counties in any State, which were not represented in the early emigration to the Pacific coast. There is probably no Senator on this floor who was not bound by some tie of kindred or personal friendship to some of the pioneers of Oregon and California, who crossed the continent and buttressed the arch of the Republic on the shores of the western sea. No communities to-day better represent the average type of American character than the people of the Pacific States. And I reassert the claim that their general verdict on a question which lies at their doors, comes home to them, is entitled to grave consideration. The conditions which created unanimity of sentiment there would create it elsewhere.

If China were situated relative to our Atlantic coast as it is to the Pacific, and a Chinese immigration had entered our Atlantic ports of the same character as that which enters the Pacific, and in volume as large in proportion to the population of the Eastern States as that is to the population of the Pacific, there would be no occasion to argue this question. It would demand and receive prompt, decisive action. If there were in New York, Massachusetts, or Iowa, or Georgia, one hundred Chinese male adults to every one hundred and fifty American voters, and it were realized that this was but a beginning, that the stream might swell to an Amazon without visibly affecting the vast reservoir from which it flows, the subject would be regarded here as it is in California, as one of paramount, supreme importance, touching the whole future of the Republic, its political institutions, industrial and social life.

Mr. President, if we confronted Asia as we do Europe; if we realized that this continent might become, not the opportunity for the full development of that civilization which is the highest achievement and most precious inheritance of our race, but a conflict between two forms of civilization opposite in tendency and in the types of character they produce, every power of the Government would be invoked to avert such a catastrophe. This civilization in which we live is so familiar to us that we accept it as a matter of course, as much a part of our daily life as air and sunlight. Free institutions are its bright consummate flower. They are possible in no other. They depend for their maintenance not upon discipline of law, but upon the devotion of the people.

Introduce into the people a foreign element, incapable of assimilation, of a type fixed in its unchangeableness by immemorial ages, alien in race, tradition, custom, and you will inevitably modify the social conditions which underlie government and give it form and character. Free men are necessary to create and preserve free institutions; independent, self-relying citizens are essential to an enlightened stable popular government, men imbued with American ideas to the American Government. It is the people who give form and character to the government, not the government to the people. They may interact, but the primary source and governing influence is from beneath.

Sir, the center, the source of the civilization in which we live, of the institutions we believe to be its highest outgrowth, is

THE FAMILY.

Take away the bond of family, the feeling which identifies home with country, the ties of blood which give the strong kinship of race, from our civilization, and what is there left which is worth retaining? The immigration which comes to us from kindred races and plants the family on our soil is welcome. It will add to our strength, and its blood will soon blend with and become a part of the American type. But any immigration which does not come under these conditions will attack and destroy the foundations of our institutions, social and political, in proportion to its volume.

Mr. President, I appeal to all who are personally familiar with the subject to corroborate or refute my statement, that in the ninety-odd thousand Chinese population in California, eight-ninths of which are male adults,

THERE ARE NO FAMILIES.

Among them the marriage relation is practically unknown. Their numbers are recruited from China. Their presence will eventuate, not in a blending of peoples of a common race, nor in a blending of races, but in a conflict of races. It is only a question of time and numbers.

Sir, the problem of popular government on this continent is difficult enough, doubtful enough, without this new disturbing quantity, this insoluble complication.

I appeal to history, when and where have races so diverse, so antagonistic in character, been able voluntarily to maintain the same form of government? When has their commingling failed to reach the subordination of one to the other or collision injurious to both?

We are the creatures of a day, but time and universal experience do not change. We are not exempt from their conditions. We must meet this question at the threshold. It is the riddle of the sphinx. We must solve it or it will destroy us. If the advocates of the policy of unrestricted Chinese immigration are right, we should open wide the doors to the four hundred million Chinese who are practically nearer to us to-day than Europe was fifty years ago.

Mr. President,

THE COMPETITIONS OF MODERN CIVILIZED LIFE ARE SHARP.

It is a competition not merely for precedence but for existence. The character, the future, the destiny of our Republic depend far more on the condition of those who toil than of those who enjoy.

I am not speaking to California; I am not speaking to the western coast; I am trying to speak to the East, and above all to you, Senators, to your patriotism, reason, and judgment; and I ask you what will become of the American idea which is founded upon the personal independence of American citizenship, of American institutions, and of that civilization on which they are based, and whose cornerstone is if the American laborer, if the great mass of our fellow-citizens who bear life's burdens, fight life's battles—our battles—whose daily sweat waters the tree of luxury whose fruits we enjoy, is brought into direct competition for daily bread with a class who have no families to support, and give no bonds to fate and country, if the family becomes a luxury of those who have achieved success, and not a condition of daily life?

LABOR AGITATION.

Mr. President, you have been taught to look upon this question as one of mere labor agitation. If it were that only, it would be entitled to consideration and not sneers. The essential conditions of society are to be found, not upon its surface, but in its depths. It is far more necessary to peace, progress, and good order that the daily laborer should be satisfied with the conditions of his life and the rewards of his toil than the capitalist, banker, or we who sit in senatorial chairs. He should be able to feel at all times

THAT PROMOTION IS FROM THE RANKS.

His burden is heavy, and he should not be deprived of the hope, which is the solace of his toil, that his children may obtain the prizes of life which fortune has denied to him. That hope is one of the great conservators of society, reconciling men to the distinctions in life which if they were regarded as unchanging as they are inevitable would result in the sullen acquiescence of caste or the open revolt of communism. Destroy that hope and you must substitute the armed repressive force of absolute government for voluntary obedience to law or relapse into the tideless sea of despair.

When the common interest of labor speaks, the statesmanship which does not heed its voice is drunken with pride or besotted with folly. The laborers of the Pacific coast say to the American public, "We have families to support, children to educate, the burdens of citizenship to carry. We contribute to the support of the State in peace, are prepared to defend it in war to the shedding of our blood, to the sacrifice of our lives, and we are brought into direct competition for daily bread with a class who claim the protection of our laws but who bear none of these burdens, acknowledge none of these obligations, and we must renounce the ties of family or of country." Is it any reply to him to say that cheap labor hastens the development of the material resources of the State and increases the aggregate of its wealth? He will answer, "Of what benefit is it to me if the resources of the State are developed and its wealth increased if my share in these advantages is diminished by the very means adopted to secure them?" Will he listen with patience to the argument that cheap labor increases production as labor-saving machinery does, and is a like factor in progress and civilization? Will he graciously regard that progress which reduces or eliminates him?

Few great mechanical inventions have ever been made which did not at the time of their introduction cause distress among artisans and operatives, whose employment was suspended and whose skill was rendered useless. Even these great triumphs of peace, like the splendid triumphs of war, have their human victims and are bought with sacrifice.

The compensation, and I admit it to be a general compensation, and of little worth to him who is crushed beneath the "Jugernaut," is, that ultimately labor will arm itself with these improved implements and share in the benefits of increased production.

Here you propose not an arming, but a substitution; not an increased power of production, but an elimination in favor of another human factor which will produce more at less expense. This is to consider man as a mere machine, whose value is to be ascertained by the amount he produces less the amount he consumes. It is to leave out of the calculation blood and brain, aspiration, want, and despair. It is to ignore the elemental forces by which and for which society exists. I know these cold speculations of the economists which assume that the tree would flower if the root were destroyed. I know these calculations which estimate the value of society by the amount which is heaped up and not by the distribution—whose end is splendor and not happiness.

Chinese immigration simply plants a foreign colony in this country constantly recruited from abroad, alien in race, distinctive in laws, manners, habits, and in so far as it tends to cheapen labor it also tends to degrade it by making the toilers a class; fixing and hardening the social distinctions which the spirit of our civilization and the genius of our institutions require should be fluid and changing.

Mr. President, in the sentiments I have endeavored to express there is no feeling of hostility to the Chinaman. There is no man so poor, so humble, so despised that I do not recognize and reverence in him the likeness of that image after which we are all made. I rejoice at the advancement of every race, at the amelioration of all of human kind. But I love my own race, my own country best, and believing this question touches the interest of these, I ask for it, Senators, your early, earnest, and candid consideration.

Mr. SARGENT rose.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President—

Mr. SARGENT. I was going to move the reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations, but the Senator from Oregon desires to say a word.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, as one of the representatives of one of the Pacific States I desire to say that it had been my intention before this resolution was referred to submit my views with regard to the matter, but as it is important that an early reference should take place, and as I expect to have that opportunity when the measure is reported, I shall reserve what I have to say until that time. I only say now that I agree most fully and cordially with all that has been said by the two Senators from California in the able speeches they have submitted on this question.

The joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

ENLISTMENT OF COLORED CITIZENS.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. President, I have nothing to say now in reference to the bill which I desire to have the Senate act upon at this time. I simply ask that a vote be taken on it. It is Senate bill 178. I move that it be taken up.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 178) to remove all restrictions now existing in regard to enlistments of the colored citizen in any arm of the United States Army.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] that the further consideration of the bill be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. BLAINE. I did not mean to imply by that that if the motion should be negatived I should be willing to have this bill come to a vote without further discussion. There is a great deal in the bill. If the Senator who reported it is willing to have it submitted to the summary test of a vote on indefinite postponement, I am quite willing; but if that motion should be negatived I should ask a further and somewhat elaborate discussion on it, for it involves a great principle.

Mr. BURNSIDE. The bill has been before the Senate very often, and the Senate has had full opportunity to discuss it. There is nothing in the bill except just what it expresses and I see no occasion for further discussion; but if the Senator from Maine desires to be heard upon it, let any day be set for a vote upon it and if he will then take occasion to express his views upon the subject and allow us to have a vote, I will be very glad.

Mr. BLAINE. I am entirely willing to have a vote immediately on the question of indefinite postponement.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I would prefer not, but I was willing that a vote should be taken on the motion of the Senator from Maine. I do not believe Senators will vote to indefinitely postpone the bill.

Mr. BLAINE. It was precisely because of that fear that I wanted to advise the Senator in advance that I should not accept that as a final decision on the bill.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I do not believe there is any Senator on the floor, no matter to which side he belongs, who will vote for the indefinite postponement of so important a bill as this, without meeting the issue. The reason why I acquiesced in a vote on that motion was because I believed it would be voted down. If the Senator chooses to insist on his motion, well and good. If not, then I ask for a vote on the passage of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine, that the further consideration of the bill be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. BLAINE called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I was necessarily absent from the Senate pending the discussion of this bill a few days ago, and have only by a hurried reference to the RECORD been able to ascertain the views of Senators touching it. I heartily indorse the bill as reported by the Senator from Rhode Island, with the amendment of the Senator from Maine. I think I comprehend the scope and effect of the measure. I do not see that the passage of this bill will confer any additional rights and privileges upon the colored citizen. Under existing laws, exclusive of sections 1104 and 1108 of the Revised Statutes, they have a right to enlist in any arm of the service, whether artillery, cavalry, infantry, or engineers, subject to the same conditions that are applied to other citizens, but sections 1104 and 1108, which the pending bill proposes to repeal, are supplemental in their character, making mandatory provisions for the creation of four regiments that should be constituted exclusively of colored soldiers. These sections doubtless were enacted after careful consideration and from just and honorable motives and with the belief not only that the efficiency of the public service would be increased, but that protection of this class of citizens from the dangers to which their rights were supposed to be exposed from the prejudice of the recruiting and distributing officers of the service would be secured.

It was evidently apprehended that these officers would not be willing to enlist colored soldiers in the absence of these positive provisions of law, but would rather use their power to prevent such enlistment.

I am inclined to believe that this danger of unfriendly discrimination existed and that for a year or two or more these gentlemen will relax their efforts in some instances to secure colored enlistments.

But admit the grounds for this apprehension and suppose further that the passage of the bill reported by the Senator from Rhode Island should result temporarily in the elimination to some extent of the colored soldier from the Army, still I am in favor of the bill.

I believe that under the influence of a healthy public sentiment this discouraging prejudice against this class of our citizens will pass away, and that the day is not far distant when all men, without regard to complexion or previous condition, will be received into the Army as they are to-day admitted into the Navy. So far as I am informed, there are no such discriminating provisions of law existing relative to enlistments in the Navy; yet we find the naval crews are mixed, and that, too, without impairment of their efficiency.

There is an additional reason why I am in favor of repealing these sections. If they are stricken from the statutes I believe that a better class of colored men will apply for enlistment. Whatever the purposes of this legislation, we have looked upon them as creating an opprobrious distinction. I think I may say safely that there are hundreds of our people who are unwilling to enlist in the Army because these special provisions of law are supposed to limit their enlistment and distribution exclusively to these four regiments.

We are American citizens, and are beginning to appreciate the value and dignity of the rights of our citizenship. We believe we are competent for military service and are entitled to enlist in any arm thereof, and I assert that we are willing to stand upon our own merits and rest our fortunes upon the same forces that give success to other citizens.

Mr. President, I am anxious to see the color line drop out of the business and politics of this country. Its introduction thereto is contrary to the genius of our institutions, and when it is obliterated from the legislation of the country every interest of every class will be greatly subverted. The time has been when it was necessary for the protection of the rights of this class that a peculiar sort of legislation should be provided, but is it to be presumed that this necessity must last always? Is there no time in our history as citizens when we—

THE VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. CONKLING. I hope the Senator from Mississippi will be permitted to conclude his remarks.

THE VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I believe I have said all I desire to say. I hope a vote will be taken. ["Go on!" "Go on!"] No; I have said enough.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I hope the Senate now will consent to vote on the motion of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. MAXEY. I hope unanimous consent will be given to the Senator from Mississippi to conclude his remarks.

THE VICE-PRESIDENT. There was no objection to that. The Senator from Mississippi is entitled to the floor if he desires it.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I do not know that I have anything more to say at present, but I may, perhaps, add that we do not ask special legislation now. We believe that, clothed with all the powers and privileges of citizens, we are able, if I may use the expression, "to paddle our own canoe;" and, indeed, if we fail to do so successfully under just and proper laws, I do not know but that it is about time for us to sink. We do not ask particular favors. We believe we have passed that period. We believe now that we must rest our claim upon our manhood, and that our integrity, industry, capacity, and all those virtues that go to make up good men and citizens are to measure our success before the American people. I repeat now the sooner we can get rid of class legislation the sooner the necessity therefor will cease.

We are amenable to the same laws that you are, and we are to be held amenable; and now let every man who wants to go into the Army present himself to the recruiting officer, and let him be accepted or refused, not because he is white or black, but because he fills the requirements of the branch of the military service into which he wants to enlist. Just so long, however, as it is deemed proper and necessary to keep up these distinctions in the Army, just so long will there be found a large class in this country ready to assault the rights of these people. I hope we have passed the critical period in our history in which race distinctions even for protection are to be considered necessary, and that we will in this and all other matters of public concern forget the question of complexion or previous condition and go forward hand in hand as American citizens.

THE VICE-PRESIDENT. Shall the further consideration of this bill be indefinitely postponed? Upon this motion the yeas and nays are demanded.

Mr. MCCREERY. I call for the regular order.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I hope the Senator will allow this vote to be taken.

Mr. MCCREERY. I have no objection to a vote.

Mr. BLAINE. The honorable Senator from Mississippi will give me his attention for a moment: I do not quite understand his position upon the bill. I ask him whether he is for the bill as reported from the Military Committee or for it with the amendment I have suggested?

Mr. BRUCE. I believe I said that I am for the bill with or without the amendment of the Senator from Maine. I believe the amendment would be a wise one, and I shall gladly vote for it; but I would vote for the bill even though I could not secure the amendment.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I am ready to vote for the amendment of the Senator from Maine, but I do not think the amendment amounts to anything, because it is simply declaratory of the law and gives colored men no new rights.

Mr. BLAINE. If there be general consent to pass the bill with that amendment I will not detain the Senate. If it be generally understood that the bill shall be passed with that amendment, I need not waste another minute upon it.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Let the amendment be read.

Mr. BLAINE. Let it be read.

THE VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be reported.

THE CHIEF CLERK. The bill as reported from the committee reads as follows:

That section—

Mr. BLAINE. Just read the bill as it went to the committee, and then as it came back.

THE CHIEF CLERK. The bill as referred to the committee is in the following words:

That hereafter the word color shall not be used to designate any soldier of the United States Army; that the colored citizen shall be entitled to all privileges and rights of any citizen to enlist in any arm of the United States Army, and no distinction shall hereafter be made in the assignment of the soldier on account of color or previous descent; that all arms of the service, engineers, artillery, cavalry, infantry, Signal Corps, irrespective of color, shall be open to him.

SEC. 2. That the President is authorized to fill the Ninth and Tenth Cavalry, Twenty-fourth and Twenty-fifth Infantry, with enlisted men without reference or distinction of color; that he shall use his discretion in keeping these regiments above the minimum strength required by law, assigning men from the general recruiting and general mounted service as they are required by the regiments, without regard to color.

And nothing in the above act shall be so construed that the Ninth and Tenth Cavalry, Twenty-fourth and Twenty-fifth Infantry, are not part of the United States Army.

The bill as reported from the committee reads as follows:

That sections 1104 and 1108 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

That nothing in the above act shall be so construed that the Ninth and Tenth Cavalry, Twenty-fourth and Twenty-fifth Infantry, are not part of the United States Army. And hereafter colored men shall have full right to enlist in all the arms of the service.

Mr. SARGENT. What is the amendment of the Senator from Maine?

Mr. BLAINE. The last clause beginning "and hereafter," &c.

Mr. THURMAN. I called the attention of my friend from Rhode Island the other day to the words "the above act" which should be changed to "this act."

Mr. BURNSIDE. I accepted that change.

Mr. THURMAN. The effect of the bill, if passed, and its whole effect, will be to abolish the colored regiments that are therein mentioned. There is nothing else in the bill. The amendment offered by the Senator from Maine is nothing more than the present law. It confers no right whatever upon any colored man that he does not now possess, and might just as well be left out of the bill as put into it. The whole of the bill is in the repeal of the two sections of the Revised Statutes which make four colored regiments distinct from the other regiments in the Army; I do not say the white regiments of the Army, because, as the law now stands, if those colored regiments were full and there were colored recruits, the Secretary of War could assign them wherever he pleased. There is nothing to prevent him putting them in any regiment or any company; and the amendment of the Senator from Maine, therefore, does not confer upon the colored man one single jot or tittle of right or privilege that he does not possess under the existing law.

Mr. President, such being the case, the bill being simply to do away with the four regiments which are now by the positive command of the law to be composed of colored men only, it is simply a question whether it is good policy to do that. That is all there is of it. I do not think that regimenting them in that way is necessarily any insult to the colored citizen, any more than I think that where, as in my State, the white and colored children are separated in the schools, that is an insult to the colored race. Indeed, I believe I am right in saying that the most intelligent of the colored race in Ohio prefer that very separation and advocate it.

But, apart from that, it is a fair question whether or not the maintenance of four regiments distinctively colored is wise and politic; and it may also be worthy of consideration, if to do so is offensive to the sensibilities or judgment of a large portion of the citizens of the United States, whether there is any advantage in it that counterbalances the objections to maintaining those regiments. The practical effect of this bill, however, may be very different from what is supposed. It is possible that its practical effect would be to put an end to the recruiting of colored men. That is very likely.

Mr. BLAINE. Does not the Senator from Ohio know that that will be the inevitable effect?

Mr. THURMAN. I do not know it, for I am not wise enough to see so far into the future. I am not gifted with such long-sightedness as that. My hindsight is better than my foresight, [laughter,] and that is the way with most men. I think it very likely, however, that that will be the effect; but since the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. BRUCE] advocates the bill and the Senator from Rhode Island, so distinguished as an officer of the Army, and whose opinion is entitled to so much respect on all Army matters, also advocates it, and the Military Committee reports it, I feel inclined to let it pass and see how it will work. But I am open to conviction that this impression is erroneous, and I leave myself free to act upon my ultimate conviction.

While I am up I will say that I heard very little of the speech of the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. BRUCE,] owing to his speaking in so low a tone, but there were one or two of his sentences which, if I heard them correctly, command my respect and admiration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Maine to withdraw his motion for indefinite postponement?

Mr. DORSEY. I ask for the regular order. We have an appropriation bill which ought to be disposed of.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I hope the Senator from Arkansas will allow this vote to be taken.

Mr. BLAINE. There is no hurry about this; there is no exigency about it. It is not half so exigent as the appropriation bill which I have on my desk, reported from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BURNSIDE. We seem to be about at the end of the discussion, and I see no reason why every Senator is not in a condition to vote.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator is older in the Senate than I am, and he knows that the end of a discussion in the Senate is a most indefinite thing.

Mr. BURNSIDE. The Senator from Rhode Island does not know as much as the Senator from Maine or as the Senator from Ohio. The Senator from Maine asked the Senator from Ohio if he did not know this bill would deprive colored men of the right to enlist in the Army. The Senator from Ohio knows a great deal, as does the Senator from Maine; but neither one of them, nor I, nor any other Senator on this floor knows anything of that kind. We all have our judgments, and I have as much right to my opinion as the Senator from Maine or the Senator from Ohio. I have been an officer of the Army and have seen some service, and I give it as my opinion that within a very few years, I think within less than five years, we shall have a large sprinkling of colored troops in all the regiments of the Army if this bill is passed.

We, in Rhode Island, allow colored pupils to go to the schools. They do not do it in Ohio. I do not mean to say that I know that in the State of Ohio within ten years they will do it, but I do say that I believe they will. I do not say I know anything on the subject, but I believe the Senate is ready to vote on the bill, and I think it has been hanging here long enough. I ask the Senator from Arkansas to allow the vote to be taken upon it.

Mr. DORSEY. It is not worth while to discuss the question when a vote can be taken on this bill. I think myself the bill will lead to a great deal more discussion than the Senator anticipates. We have an appropriation bill ready which it is very important should be passed, and I must insist on the regular order.

BANKRUPT-LAW REPEAL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The regular order is the unfinished business, being Senate bill No. 35, to repeal the bankrupt law.

Mr. McCREERY. I consent that the regular order shall be informally laid aside.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I should like to have the consent of the Senator from Maine to be allowed to say a few words about this bill that the Senator from Kentucky has in charge, as I am compelled to be away the residue of the day. I shall not take over five minutes.

Mr. BLAINE. Let it be the understanding that after the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Illinois I shall be entitled to the floor with the appropriation bill.

Mr. EATON. I gave notice yesterday that I desired to take up today a resolution which ought to have been considered nearly a month ago, involving the personal liberty of a citizen of my State. I simply desire to say a few words about it and have the resolution then go to the committee.

Mr. BLAINE. I will yield first to the Senator from Illinois and then to my friend from Connecticut. I want to be as obliging as I can.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Mr. President, the repeal of the present bankrupt law is a very important measure and should receive full consideration and full discussion in the Senate. It appears that the bill to repeal the law is reported from the Judiciary Committee. That is true, but the committee was not unanimous upon the subject. It was reported, if I recollect right, by a bare majority of the committee.

Mr. CONKLING. And virtually without any recommendation.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Yes, sir. Now, my judgment is that this law should not be repealed, but that it should be amended. I have no doubt that there are many valid complaints and objections, particularly to the administration of the present bankrupt law; and I believe that many of the amendments that were recently made to it have led to a public opinion adverse to its continued existence. It seems to me, Mr. President, that in a great commercial country like this a bankrupt law is an absolute necessity. With thirty-eight States of diverse insolvent proceedings a bankrupt law is an absolute necessity.

One of the great complaints that have been urged to the legislation of this country is its instability; and in no greater respect has this been marked than in regard to the various bankrupt laws that have been enacted and subsequently repealed. It seems to me that it would be exceedingly unwise to repeal this law. I do not want to discuss it at the present time. I thought it likely that a vote would be taken upon it this afternoon, and I wished it to be distinctly understood that I did not agree with the report of the Judiciary Committee upon this subject; and I am authorized by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] who is not now present to state that he coincides with these views. The minority of the committee have not presented amendments to the law for the very reason that we have been informed that a bill for the repeal of the law was likely to pass this Chamber. If so, there certainly was no object in going through the necessary labor to amend it; but if the law is not repealed, in my judgment it should be referred back to the Judiciary Committee to suggest such amendments to the law as in their opinion would make it acceptable as a general thing to the American people.

I do not believe the measure proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. MATTHEWS] is a proper one on this subject. I think that a regular law by which you can put people into bankruptcy and by which any man can put himself into bankruptcy if he is unable to pay his debts should prevail in this country, and I think the provision of the Senator from Ohio, while it might be better than nothing at all, is immature, and that no provision like that ought to be adopted unless it goes to a committee and is matured. The simple question is, ought this law to be repealed? Against that, as I have said before, I wish simply to enter my protest. I do not believe it ought to be repealed, either on account of the debtors or the creditors of the country.

I beg leave to state now, as I may not be here when the vote is taken upon the bill, that I am paired upon this subject with the Senator from Michigan who reported this bill from the Committee on the Judiciary, [Mr. CHRISTIANCY.] If he were here he would vote for the repeal of the law and I should vote against it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will now be laid aside, according to the understanding of the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 3679) to amend a joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to issue arms, approved July 3, 1876; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also returned to the Senate, in compliance with its request, the bill (S. No. 490) supplementary to an act entitled "An act in relation to the Hot Springs reservation, in the State of Arkansas," approved March 3, 1877.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had this day approved and signed the joint resolution (S. R. No. 22) providing for a place of deposit for the records and proceedings of the commission appointed under the act entitled "An act to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877," approved January 29, 1877.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT appointed Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, and Mr. EUSTIS additional members of the Select Committee on the Levees of the Mississippi River, as authorized by the resolution adopted yesterday.

BENJAMIN NOYES.

Mr. EATON. I ask for the consideration of the resolution offered by me.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by Mr. EATON on the 22d of March:

Whereas it is alleged that Benjamin Noyes, a citizen of the United States and of the State of Connecticut, was, on the 11th day of March, 1878, in the city of Washington, arrested and imprisoned without due process of law, in violation of the rights of the citizen, and while so suffering from this illegal arrest and imprisonment his kidnapers took from his person valuable papers and property and refused and denied him the privilege of consulting with friends or counsel: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to inquire into the subject-matter of this resolution and to report thereon, and that the committee be empowered to send for persons and papers and to employ a stenographer, should it be necessary.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate long. I simply desire to have the Senate know what the case is. As to the character of the resolution, it shows for itself; but there are certain facts which the Senate ought to know in order to be aware of the reasons that governed me in offering the resolution. A month has elapsed since this outrage, as I call it, upon a citizen of the United States was perpetrated. What are the facts? One Benjamin Noyes, a citizen of the State of Connecticut and of the United States, on the morning of the 11th of March was taken from his room in a hotel in this city, the door of his room, as I have been informed, having been forcibly broken, without warrant of law; without any authority he was taken at the hour of one o'clock in the morning and placed in confinement in a cell in one of the station-houses in the city, and there kept until he was taken at one o'clock in the afternoon to the train and from the city upon the railroad cars.

Now for the cause. Mr. Noyes is an insurance man, and has occupied a high position as an insurance man heretofore in the State of Connecticut as a public officer, a man who has maintained up to—for I shall be very frank to admit that for the last year or two he has been accused of what is termed sharp practice as an insurance man, practice that I am not here to defend—but up to that time he had the full confidence of the people of the State and occupied a high position in the county where he lived, the city of New Haven. A year or two since he went to New Jersey for, as his enemies said, the purpose of gobbling up one of the New Jersey mutual insurance companies; I will say of buying it, getting it into his hands, merging it with another company of which he was the president. New Jersey complained of the manner in which this business was transacted. It may not have been right; I am inclined to think myself that it was not right. However, he went to New Jersey for the purpose of arranging matters satisfactorily. And now to begin about what I know. He went there under advice and went there under certain promises that were made to him. Those promises were broken after he had got to New Jersey.

Mr. RANDOLPH. By whom?

Mr. EATON. By a prosecuting officer; not by the present executive of New Jersey, not by any judge of any New Jersey court, not by the recent executive of New Jersey.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. EATON. Certainly.

Mr. McPHERSON. Was he not arrested by virtue of a requisition from the Governor of New Jersey?

Mr. EATON. Not yet. I shall come to that. I have nothing here that I desire to keep under cover at all. If I had I would not have said what I have already said in regard to this matter. This promise was broken and he was arrested, taken before certain authorities in New Jersey, as I am informed, not only by him but by two very respectable counsel, to wit, Mr. Robeson and Mr. Keasbey, one a former Secretary of the Navy, the other now the attorney of the United States for that district, and has been for sixteen or eighteen years, against the laws of New Jersey put under oath and examined. This, as they say and as I believe, was against the law, for he was accused of a crime, and therefore he could not have been by the laws of New Jersey put under oath, though he was. He swore to a certain state of facts with regard to this insurance company and went home. He was indicted after this hearing, indicted for perjury committed, as it was alleged, upon this very illegal examination, held in bonds of $5,000, and gave bond. The day of trial was fixed. He went to Connecticut, came home again, and was informed, as I believe (for I went myself to New Jersey by request of his counsel, not as his counsel, but because I had a personal acquaintance with the attorney-general of New Jersey and with the then governor of New Jersey; I went there myself to see if an arrangement could be made) he was informed, and I have no doubt of the correctness of the information, that if he went back there he would be indicted upon three other allegations. He did not go back; his bond of $5,000 was forfeited. What next?

Mr. RANDOLPH. He did not appear for trial.

Mr. EATON. He did not appear for trial; if he had his bond would not have been forfeited. He had been arrested, I should have said, on a requisition from the governor of New Jersey, Governor Bedle, on Governor Hubbard, of Connecticut, was delivered up, went there, gave his bond, and he did not go back but forfeited his bail. Another requisition was made on the governor of Connecticut again for this man, and, as I am informed, Governor Hubbard said he was not to be played with fast and loose in that way; that once a citizen of his State had been delivered to the New Jersey authorities and it was their business to hold him and try him. The authorities—I do not mean the governor of New Jersey, but the legal representative of the governor of New Jersey—called upon the governor of New York—Mr. Noyes was oftener in New York and longer in New York than he was in Connecticut, for he had an office there—but the governor of New York said there was nothing in that matter that he could grant a requisition upon.

Mr. Noyes came to Washington for the purpose of a hearing before a committee of a subcommittee, of which my friend the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] is chairman, upon legitimate business connected with an insurance company, in regard to which a proposition is now before us; and while here a requisition from Governor McClellan, of New Jersey, as I am informed and believe, was sent here by a New Jersey officer—this is something that I do not know—for the purpose of his arrest. There were no papers shown. I have been told that the requisition was not in the city of Washington at the time of the arrest. I have been told that it was. It is a matter of no consequence, in my judgment, whether the requisition was here or not. When his room was broken into, when he was assaulted by two detectives, when he asked to see any papers which they might have, they opened their coats and showed their stars. "There is the authority upon which you are arrested," they had no papers; the warrant was not issued until between eleven and twelve o'clock of that day, nearly twelve hours after.

Mr. THURMAN. What warrant?

Mr. EATON. The warrant of the chief-justice of the District, the authority to arrest the citizen was not issued until nearly eleven hours after this pretended arrest. That was the only warrant by which he could be held, because I undertake to say that if a detective, without a warrant, without legal authority, comes into my room or yours or any other citizen's room at night and lays hands upon him, as a very sprightly paper in Washington said the other day, if that man had just read the Constitution of the United States there probably would be a dead detective. In other words, there is no such power, no such right, no such law.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Do I understand the Senator from Connecticut to maintain that one who is a fugitive from justice can be taken from the jurisdiction of the State possessing him and brought before a committee of the Senate of the United States? Do I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. EATON. Of course you do interrupt me, but not disagreeably.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Then I desire to say that with my knowledge of this case it should not elicit serious debate at this time in this body. I will not debate the propriety of its reference to the Judiciary Committee that they may ascertain the facts, if the Senator from Connecticut urges this course. The Senator from Connecticut, it seems, is endeavoring to state what he asserts to be the facts, and the Senators from New Jersey are expected, perhaps, inasmuch as the crime alleged was originally committed under the jurisdiction of my State, to make some explanation of a portion of these facts, rather remarkably introduced to the Senate's attention. When the Senator is through I shall have a word or two to say. I interrupt now to remark that there will be no objection on my part as one of the Senators from New Jersey to the reference asked for, that the committee may ascertain regularly and in order precisely that which the Senator from Connecticut can at best only state as his personal convictions.

Mr. EATON. I do not quite know where the speech of my friend from New Jersey came in and where the question which he asked me ended.

Mr. RANDOLPH. My interruption had this specific object in view, to make the reference without debate, leaving that to occur, if at all, when the Judiciary Committee has informed the Senate whether or not it is a case for our consideration. I think it has no business here; that the courts of the District and of my State are open and redress of wrong can be had easily and promptly through them. To economize time I think there should be no objection to referring the matter to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. EATON. That is just my opinion upon the subject, and I would not have said one word here this morning except that the resolution was antagonized on the day on which it was offered, and if I am assured now that there is to be no antagonistic action taken upon this matter I am through now.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I repeat, sir, so far as I am concerned, I make no objection to a reference of the resolution to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. EATON. That is what I asked.

Mr. RANDOLPH. As for my colleague, of course I cannot speak.

Mr. McPHERSON. I have only one thing to say. The Senator from Connecticut has detailed statements here with reference to this case that I am not content to have go on the record without an answer.

Mr. EATON. Then suppose you wait until I get through. I do not want the answer to come now, for I have not got through. There may be something else that the Senator will desire to answer. I have stated what I believe to be true; I have stated what one hundred of the prominent citizens of New Haven believe to be true, its leading lawyers, its mayor, its postmaster, its members of the Connecticut house of representatives, its Senator, the governor of Connecticut, all the leading merchants of the city of New Haven, who have sent to me and my colleague a request that this matter should be pushed. Their request I have now in my hand.

I have stated nothing but what I believe to be absolutely true, and now I will begin exactly where I left off when I was interrupted by my friend from New Jersey, [Mr. RANDOLPH.] I believe in the high character, I have the greatest confidence in the honor of the executive of the State of New Jersey. He is my personal and political friend. He has occupied a high position always; for twenty years he has occupied a large space in the public eye; and nothing that I say here can militate against his integrity and his honor. I do not say that the Senate of the United States has the legal power to pass any particular act upon this matter; but, if when this case is thoroughly investigated by the Judiciary Committee and the facts are found as I believe them to be and a report of the Judiciary Committee is made to the Senate with regard to this subject as I believe it will be, then the very confidence that I have in the integrity and honor of the executive of New Jersey leads me to believe that he will take the necessary and proper steps to relieve himself from any act that may have been improper.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. EATON. Certainly.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Suppose the governor of New Jersey should be convinced that improper action has been taken by officers that were sent here with the requisition, would it be proper for him, as executive of the State, to interfere with its courts—with a co-ordinate branch of the State government—the judiciary—as indicating its action? Would not such interference be deemed a most unusual and extraordinary proceeding?

Mr. EATON. If the Senator from New Jersey asks me that as a legal question, it is one thing.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I do.

Mr. EATON. No. If he asks me whether the executive of the State would have the personal power to interfere with this matter so as to persuade the judiciary of New Jersey, then I say yes.

Mr. RANDOLPH. No, Mr. President; no executive of New Jersey's selection would exert his "persuasive" powers over a co-ordinate branch of government—especially in a matter where all the facts were equally accessible to both its judicial and executive branches.

Mr. EATON. Then I am sorry for the judiciary of New Jersey; that is all.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Notwithstanding, sir, I am glad to say for the judiciary of New Jersey that no executive has ever held office, or ever will, I trust, in my State, whose personal or official desires would for an instant change the course or delay the decision of justice, as its judiciary believed to be right. Jersey justice is not influenced even by Jersey governors.

Mr. EATON. I should hope not; but that he would have influence to stay the course of injustice—not justice, but injustice. Therefore I still again say that I desire a report of the Judiciary Committee, for the reason that if the facts are as I believe them to be, upon a full report by a committee of the Senate of the United States the executive of New Jersey will see to it that a requisition which he issued shall not be abused in the way that it was; will see to it in some way. I know well that the departments of government in New Jersey, the executive and the judicial, are just as separate as the executive and judicial departments of the Government of the United States are. I know still further that if a wrong had been perpetrated under the act of the President of the United States, which he supposed at the time he granted the power or paper was a proper act, he would have great influence upon the judiciary of the country in order to see that no further wrong should be perpetrated, and with that view I ask that this resolution shall go to the Committee on the Judiciary for their action.

Mr. BECK. Will it trouble the Senator from Connecticut too much to state again where our jurisdiction over the subject attaches? I have some difficulty in seeing how we can take any control of it.

Mr. EATON. The jurisdiction of the Roman senate occurred whenever a Roman citizen was improperly taken by the throat.

Mr. RANDOLPH. This is a Connecticut citizen instead of a Roman citizen.

Mr. EATON. He is not a New Jersey citizen, certainly. He is a citizen of the United States kidnaped in the District of Columbia, which is under the jurisdiction of the United States alone and not of Connecticut, not of New Jersey. The common law which governs the people here is our authority, to say nothing of the statute law. It is our duty to protect every citizen of the United States against kidnaping and outrage if there has been kidnaping and outrage.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Are there no courts within the District to take cognizance?

Mr. EATON. There are courts within the District, but the individual is not here to press his claim; he is somewhere else, and I am here a Senator from his State to urge the Senate of the United States to interpose its high character and name against the perpetration of outrages of this description. If there be any such outrage as I have indicated, the Judiciary Committee will find a way to let the whole people of the United States know what in their opinion citizenship is worth in this country. How far and to what extent the Senate of the United States may have power, is something that I am not here now to talk about. That is the business of the Judiciary Committee. If that committee says that we have no power whatever to interfere in this matter, and that any citizen of any State in this Union, no matter how innocent he may be, may be taken by the throat, kidnaped, and carried out from under the very dome of the Capitol, so be it. There was a striking instance here the other day of a man—I will not call any name; it is not necessary that I should call names; the very mention of the circumstance will indicate the case to every Senator—where the law was followed, where a requisition from a State of this Union proposed to lay hold of a certain gentleman in the District of Columbia; but the law was followed out. There was no kidnaping. The citizen of South Carolina was not taken by the ears and dragged out of the District; but the habeas corpus came in, the law came in, and he still is a citizen and a free man. Let it be so in all cases. The District of Columbia should not be a home for criminals; it should not be simply a refuge for thieves; by no means; but gentlemen who are here on public business, gentlemen from the States who come here for the prosecution of their private business before committees of Congress, must not be taken as in this case and carried out of this District. Let the law intervene.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Does the Senator know that this person, Mr. Noyes, who has been taken to the State of New Jersey, could come back here within a few hours by simply giving moderate bail? The Senator has already admitted that Noyes has been indicted, has forfeited his bail, and is a fugitive from justice. He is back in New Jersey, whether rightfully or wrongfully, though I am very clear about it, I do not mean to discuss now. They ask our courts, in view of his manifest propensities, $15,000 bail of him now. He does not give it. He remains with us to confute his alleged traducers. That is the case.

Mr. EATON. What has that to do with the kidnaping of a citizen of the United States?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I have not admitted that Noyes was kidnaped yet.

Mr. EATON. I say he was.

Mr. RANDOLPH. And I say he was not—as I am informed; but why should we detain the Senate by contention, by statements of facts that may or may not be facts, as one or the other of us shall prove to be correct? This body cannot and should not try the indictments of New Jersey courts against Mr. Noyes.

Mr. EATON. Then let the Judiciary Committee find out which of us states the fact.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I repeat that is just what I wanted, and that the Senator should permit it to be done without engrossing the time of the Senate with a matter as yet without its jurisdiction. Why should the Senator recite all the facts, as he calls them, in advance of their ascertainment, incidentally implicating officers of my State? Why all these recitals, if the case is so clear and the judgment so certain?

Mr. EATON. I have not said one word against any officer of the State of New Jersey.

Mr. RANDOLPH. You certainly spoke of a prosecuting officer of New Jersey quite disparagingly.

But, Mr. President, I insist we shall not debate the merits of this controversy in advance of the report of a committee whose judgment we are supposed to desire, if the resolution of reference pass, as I hope it may.

Mr. EATON. What did I say of him that has to do with this case? I said he had violated his word originally before there was any arrest of this man. He had nothing to do with this case so far as I know, nor have I said that he had. If this man has been kidnaped, as I aver, if he has been taken without process of law, as I aver, then the Senate of the United States has something to do in this matter; and therefore it is that I introduced this resolution in order that the Senate might speak upon this subject; and then New Jersey of course will exercise her own authority in her own way. I have said nothing against the executive of New Jersey; I have said nothing against the judiciary of New Jersey, not one word. I am speaking simply about the absolute right that every man has to his liberty, and lest I should go too far, let me read:

The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

A requisition from the governor of New Jersey or any other State in this Union cannot come here and take any member of this Senate by the ear, cannot come here and take any citizen of the United States. There must first be a warrant; that warrant must be issued under and by oath or affirmation, and proper authority must take the citizen.

A requisition is all well enough. The duty of the officer was plain. He should have gone when he arrived here with his requisition and called for his warrant, and when he had gotten his warrant from the proper officer of the District of Columbia, then an executive officer of the District of Columbia would have taken that warrant and taken the person according to law. He would then have gone before the proper authority and his counsel would have been there to defend him. That is the way it is done in my State. That is the way it is done in the District of Columbia, so far as I know. It has so been done here within the last six months. It ought to have been so done in this case.

Mr. RANDOLPH. It is contended by the officers that all that was done in this case, I submit to the Senator.

Mr. EATON. Oh, no, no.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I think my colleague has papers showing that in his possession.

Mr. EATON. I have talked with the officers, and I know whereof I speak. The warrant was not issued until eleven o'clock and this man was kidnaped at one o'clock in the morning of that day. I know whereof I speak. There was no warrant. There was no power by which these detectives could seize a citizen of the United States. I was told many things that I do not choose to say here, things that the officers themselves told me they said to him; but I let all that pass.

Mr. President, I trust that this resolution will go to the Committee on the Judiciary and that the committee will inquire into it. If the facts are as I believe them to be, I venture to say that the Congress of the United States will see to it that a citizen is safe here under the law and that only under the law hereafter can a citizen of the United States be seized and held.

Mr. McPHERSON. Mr. President—

Mr. BLAINE. I yielded to the Senator from Connecticut who yesterday gave notice that he would address the Senate on this resolution to-day, and who seemed to have a prior lien on the Senate. I do not desire to cut off the honorable Senator from New Jersey unless he is going to make a lengthy speech, in which case I shall be obliged to call up the appropriation bill of which I gave notice also.

Mr. McPHERSON. I shall only detain the Senate a few moments. I did not intend to say anything on this question, and think I should not. The person who is made the subject of this resolution is now on trial by the courts of New Jersey, and I feel that it is peculiarly improper that any discussion should take place in this Chamber upon this question, because it might be construed into an attempt to influence quite unjustly and improperly the courts in the administration of justice.

When this resolution was introduced on Friday, the 23d of March, by the honorable Senator from Connecticut, and supported as it was at that time by strong and emphatic declarations as to its truth, I was very much inclined to think that there was something of an extraordinary character surrounding this case. Having great confidence in the statements that the honorable Senator from Connecticut usually makes upon the floor, and also great respect for his legal ability, I was inclined to think that he was in the possession of facts which fully justified all the resolution asserts. But inasmuch as this person was arrested by a requisition issued by the governor of New Jersey, by an officer commissioned by that State, directed and controlled by a prosecuting attorney of that State, so far as he could direct and control the movements of the officers, I thought at that time it was due to the officials of New Jersey to ask for a postponement of the resolution in order that I might acquaint myself with the facts alleged in the resolution, upon which a charge of kidnapping was made.

Now, sir, I have every confidence in the integrity and the intelligence of those officers. I assumed then to say, and I do now most confidently affirm, having become possessed of the facts, that there is nothing in the proceedings in the arrest of this man Noyes that was in any manner extraordinary, illegal, or unusual.

I think that the resolution should never have been introduced into the Senate at all, but having been submitted it is one the consideration of which, in my opinion, the Senate ought not to enter upon. Neither the Senate nor its Judiciary Committee can try the questions of law and fact involved in this resolution. It is clearly a question for the judiciary and must be tried by a court of law. We can offer no relief whatever to this petitioner. As I said before, it seems to me that the simple discussion of this question upon the floor of the Senate could be, and would be, construed into an attempt upon our part to influence unjustly and improperly the course in the administration of justice. I will read a remark made by the Senator from Connecticut. In the discussion of the case on Friday, the 23d of March, the honorable Senator from Connecticut [Mr. Eaton] avers this:

I desire action to be taken so that the executive of New Jersey may know exactly under what circumstances his requisition was used, and when it is taken authoritatively by the Senate of the United States it will have its effect.

It seems to me that any such attempt on the part of the Senate is simply to degrade its high powers and privileges. The attempt to make the Senate subservient to any such purpose whatever is simply to make it a process-server or vehicle for notices. Any party feeling himself aggrieved may come to the Senate and ask to have his grievance spread before the Senate that forty millions of people may know of it, and to make a martyr of him.

I do not wish to enter into the discussion at all of any of the facts relating to this case. I presume it is scarcely necessary that I should do so. I can only say that it has been a subject of newspaper criticism, not only in the State where Mr. Noyes claims to be a resident and where he still appears to have some friends, nor is it confined to the State of New Jersey whose laws he is alleged to have violated, but the criticism has been diffused all over the country. There is scarcely a Senator in this Chamber who has not heard or read something with respect to the audacity of this man Noyes. He was indicted by the grand jury of Essex County, New Jersey, for conspiracy, perjury, and fraud in his connection with the reinsurance of the New Jersey Mutual into the National Capital Life-Insurance Company. Having heard of the action of the grand jury, he left the State of New Jersey very hurriedly and went to the State of Connecticut. He was followed to the State of Connecticut by the officers of New Jersey, armed with a requisition made by the governor of New Jersey on the governor of Connecticut. The governor of Connecticut honored the requisition and Noyes was reconveyed to the State of New Jersey and placed within the jurisdiction of the court having his case in charge. Owing to the long interval that must elapse before his case could be brought to trial, his own protestations of innocence, and the appeals of his friends, the clemency of the court was extended to him and he was admitted to bail in the sum of $5,000. The honorable Senator from Connecticut now states that it was the business of the authorities of New Jersey to have held their prisoner, having obtained possession of him. Suffice it to say, when the day for trial came Mr. Noyes failed to appear; he forfeited his bail.

The fugitive was followed again to Connecticut by officers armed a second time with the requisition of the governor of New Jersey asking again for the rendition of Noyes. The governor of Connecticut refused to honor the requisition, and the officers were of course obliged to give up the quest. Mr. Noyes at this time became very audacious. He laughed at the officers who came there a second time to arrest him. Fortified as he was behind the favor and protection of the governor of Connecticut, he laughed at the officers who came there from New Jersey to secure him, and from this secure retreat he made the most frantic efforts that ever man did to counteract the sentiment of an outraged and indignant people in New Jersey in respect to his guilt. It is alleged that by means of a press made willing, certain slanderous and malignant statements were made with reference to some of the highest officials in New Jersey, and especially those who had been charged with the supervising authority over all insurance companies doing business within the State, and to whose efforts and investigations mainly the credit is due for having unearthed and brought to light the facts that led to his indictment.

In short, Mr. President, this man Noyes had been guilty of felony on an indictment for which the requisition was based. He was also a fugitive from justice. It was ascertained by the prosecuting officer of New Jersey that Noyes was temporarily in Washington. Governor McClellan, very properly, on the presentation of these facts, issued his requisition. An officer of New Jersey, an intelligent and capable officer who had performed like service before with respect to Mr. Noyes, came to Washington armed with a copy of the indictment and the requisition itself, and in company with two officers in the city of Washington he went to the Globe Hotel at one o'clock in the morning of I think the 11th day of March and arrested Mr. Noyes, placed him in a carriage, carried him to police headquarters, where he was confined until 1.30 o'clock in the afternoon of that day, when he was placed upon a train and taken to New Jersey. Remember, he was placed in a carriage, properly cared for on his way to police headquarters. Immediately on the opening of the court in the morning a mandate was obtained for his arrest, many hours before he was taken from the jurisdiction of the court or from the District of Columbia. He was at police headquarters from nine o'clock of that day until 1.30 o'clock in the afternoon before any attempt was made to remove him.

I have the statement of the officers here with respect to the arrest of Mr. Noyes, which I desire to read as a part of my remarks. (I beg the pardon of the Senator from Maine. I shall detain him but a few moments longer.) This is a report made by detectives of the city of Washington who accompanied Officer Long of the city of Newark, New Jersey, who bore the requisition and a copy of the indictment. These officers of whom I speak, in making a report to their chief, say:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 25, 1878.

SIR:

In re Benjamin Noyes.

On the 9.15 p. m. train of March 11, 1878, Officer Robert Long, from Essex County, New Jersey, arrived in this city with a requisition from Governor McClellan, of New Jersey, for the person of Benjamin Noyes, a fugitive from justice. He exhibited his papers to this department, and requested assistance from the local police in making the arrest. About one a. m., 12th instant, the arrest was effected by us, accompanied by said Officer Long and the requisition. When we approached him Noyes recognized Long, shook hands with him, and was immediately advised of the facts of the requisition. He accompanied us without objection; there was no show of force whatsoever. He was detained at headquarters during the balance of that night. No money or papers were taken from him, nor was possession sought or demanded. His watch, chain, knife, and other articles were taken in custody and delivered back to him upon his departure. Such is the custom in all parts of the country, both for the protection of the police and of the prisoner. His receipt for said articles was taken, and is on file. Before the opening of the supreme court, on the 12th instant, Chief-Justice Carter signed order for the delivery of Noyes to the New Jersey authorities, and thereafter (from 9.30 a. m. of the 12th) the prisoner was in custody of Officer Long, under said order of court, pursuant to requisition. At 1.30 p. m., the officer left this District with his prisoner, en route to New Jersey. During his temporary detention here, Noyes was kindly treated, and not the slightest exhibition of force was necessary, or was exercised. On the morning of the 12th he made his first inquiry about counsel, asking to see Ex-Secretary Robeson. He was told that Mr. Robeson had left town the previous morning, and was still absent. This was the fact, and known to us to be such. When on his way to the depot, Noyes handed to Detective McElfresh a sealed package of papers, and asked him to deliver them to a Mr. Kimball, with a verbal message, which commission was immediately executed. He also wrote a dispatch to his attorney at New York to meet him at Newark, where he was being taken on "papers," and asked McElfresh to also send it, which was done.

The foregoing is a correct statement of the arrest in its sequence of time and events.

Very respectfully,

JAS. A. McDEVITT, Detective.
GEORGE W. McELFRESH, Detective.

Major THOMAS P. MORGAN,
Superintendent Metropolitan Police.

I have been furnished by these officers with a copy of a telegram in the handwriting of Mr. Noyes, who handed it to the detective, the very party who is charged in the resolution of the honorable Senator from Connecticut with having kidnaped Noyes. He hands him this telegram for the purpose of sending to his counsel in Newark to meet him at Newark prior to being taken there on papers. He also placed in his hands other valuable papers, as stated in the report of the detectives, to be handed to a Mr. Kimball. He also gave him the custody of the key of his room; and other important matters were placed in his hands. It is not usual, I believe, when an officer has kidnaped a person for that person to turn right around and place in the custody of the officer valuable and important papers and in fact employ the officer as an agent for the transaction of business.

I am also informed by the chief of police that he was present at police headquarters from six o'clock in the morning until Mr. Noyes was removed to New Jersey at one o'clock of the afternoon of that day; that he was within sight and hearing of Noyes during the whole time, and that at no time did Noyes signify to him that he had been illegally arrested or kidnaped; that at no time did he complain to him as to the conduct of the officers; at no time did he say that he was illegally confined.

The report here also states, and contrary to the preamble of the resolution, that no valuable papers were taken from him. In fact no papers were taken from him at all, but some papers were handed by Noyes to the officer, to be placed in the hands of Mr. Kimball. No property was taken except such property as it is the custom to take from a prisoner in order that the prisoner might not injure himself, other persons, or the office, to wit: a knife, watch, &c. As to the privilege of consulting friends and counsel, I am informed by one of the detectives who made this arrest that at the request of Noyes he went twice during that day to the office of Ex-Secretary Robeson for the purpose of getting Mr. Robeson to come to see Noyes, but was unable to find him.

With respect to the legality of the arrest I am led to infer, from the discussion which was had upon this question when this resolution was submitted by the honorable Senator from Connecticut, from remarks made by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] that it was the practice in every State of the Union all over the country for an officer, knowing the fact and fearing the escape of a prisoner, to make the arrest even without the mandate or warrant of the court, and to hold him until such time as a mandate could be obtained. It is true that in this case the officers had no mandate of the court of this District to make the arrest, but one was obtained at a very early hour in the morning; but they were in possession of facts, the fact that this man had been indicted. They were in possession of the indictment and in possession of the requisition of the governor, and they simply did what is done every day in the week in the interest of justice. The courts permit it to be done in the interest of justice, and, without it were done, it would be impossible to secure criminals who are escaping almost every day by the enforcement of the same rule which the Senator from Connecticut wishes.

I do not wish to detain the Senator from Maine much longer. I have only to say that if the Senate decide in this case to exercise judicial power (and if in this case why not as appropriately in every case of like character all over the country?) it seems to me as though the Senate would have nothing else to do in the future but to look after cases of this character.

I hope and trust, Mr. President, that the Senate will not refer the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary, but will dismiss the matter.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, there does not appear to be the slightest difference between the Senator from New Jersey and myself as to all the facts in this case except those in his report from the detectives which he has read. I agree entirely, and he agrees with me, in the fact that this man was a fugitive from justice. I never denied that at all. But if the Senator were as well acquainted with detectives as some lawyers are, he would see that the report that they make disagrees with the statement verbally made to him. Just see how easy it is for these detectives to mislead even a Senator of the United States! The Senator read a report, which report says that these detectives told Mr. Noyes when he asked to see Ex-Secretary Robeson that he was not in town.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the Senator allow me to make an explanation?

Mr. EATON. Wait until I get through. The Senator does not know what I am about to say. The detectives told the Senator that Ex-Secretary Robeson was not in town; that they knew he was not in town. Then what is the next story of those detectives? The next story of the detectives is that one of them went three times in order to find him. Now, that very detective told me in this lobby the day after I introduced the resolution that they never went near him, and that they were instructed not to go near his counsel, although they had promised that he should have counsel. He told me so here, your very detective. It would take the oaths of a dozen detectives to swear down one decent man.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. EATON. Certainly.

Mr. McPHERSON. Were these officers under any obligation to assist the prisoner to obtain a writ of habeas corpus?

Mr. EATON. They are not under any obligation to tell falsehoods, to say one thing to my good friend the Senator from New Jersey, and another thing to me. I know these people pretty well. I have had to do as counsel for thirty years with this class of people. The Judiciary Committee will find that these men went into the room of Mr. Noyes. The New Jersey officer was not there at all. They told Mr. Noyes if he would quietly go to headquarters they would immediately take a carriage and go and get not Mr. Robeson, but Mr. Kimball. He was the man that Mr. Noyes desired to have them go for. It was Kimball. Kimball was his lawyer here in this District. Mr. Noyes asked them if they would go. They went out and said they could not find him; that it had got to be two o'clock or three o'clock in the morning, and there was no use in going then, but they would go as soon as it was sun-up. After it was sun-up they did not go, and when the New Jersey officer showed himself, about ten o'clock in the morning, he said to Mr. Noyes: "You will not see your counsel nor your friends; you will go to New Jersey with me."

I tell you, Mr. President, it was a kidnapping from the beginning to the end. Take the two stories, the written story and the verbal one of my friend from New Jersey, and it is kidnapping. There was falsehood there. They did not do as they agreed to do, and they did not intend to do it. I trust the Senate will look to this matter. I do not want to take up the time of the Senate any longer.

Mr. McPHERSON. If the Senator had yielded to me at the time I asked him to submit to an interruption it would have been altogether unnecessary for him to have made his last speech. I perhaps should have detailed more fully an explanation of the matter when I read the report of the detectives. Although the report does not state that they went to the office of Secretary Robeson, and perhaps it was unnecessary that they should state that in making a report to a superior officer, the facts as given to me by the detectives were to the effect that one of the detectives went not only once but twice to the office of Ex-Secretary Robeson, at the request of Mr. Noyes.

Mr. EATON. That is a matter which, of course, I do not believe. I believe my friend was told so. I do not believe the fact to be that they went there at all. It was not a part of their duty, as the Senator just said.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. COCKRELL in the chair.) The question is upon the adoption of the resolution submitted by the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. GARLAND. Let the resolution be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas it is alleged that Benjamin Noyes, a citizen of the United States and of the State of Connecticut, was, on the 11th day of March, 1878, in the city of Washington, arrested and imprisoned without due process of law, in violation of the rights of the citizen, and while so suffering from this illegal arrest and imprisonment his kidnapers took from his person valuable papers and property and refused and denied him the privilege of consulting with friends or counsel: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to inquire into the subject-matter of this resolution and report thereon, and that the committee be empowered to send for persons and papers and to employ a stenographer, should it be necessary.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I detain the Senate a moment longer to say that I shall vote for the adoption of this resolution, having stated at the beginning of this debate that I should. I do so more in courtesy to the Senator from Connecticut than for any other reason. Added to that reason, I desire the fullest investigation in this case may be had concerning the conduct of any executive, judicial, or other official of the State I have the honor in part to represent on this floor. Their action will all be found honorable to themselves and protecting to the people, not only of New Jersey but of many other States.

Mr. BECK. I wish to ask the Senator from Connecticut a question, because I am in doubt as to the jurisdiction of the Senate in this matter. If the Senator from Connecticut believes either that the present laws are insufficient to prevent kidnaping, or that there ought to be an amendment to the habeas corpus act, then I admit that it is competent for the Senate to consider this question. If, however, the Senator desires no change in the law, but simply an inquiry as to a legal question, I see no reason why the present jurisdiction of the courts, either upon an application for a writ of habeas corpus or by a writ or indictment for kidnaping, would not cover the whole case. If the Senator avows that he desires a change of the law, I shall vote for the resolution. If he desires simply an investigation into this particular case without desiring a change of the law, I shall not vote for it, for want of jurisdiction.

Mr. EATON. Of course my honorable friend from Kentucky will vote just as he pleases, as every other Senator will. All I can say about it is that I have not proposed any amendment to the law. I cannot do so now. I differ in opinion from the honorable Senator from Kentucky. I think there is law enough now. If I am mistaken about that, the Judiciary Committee will inform me upon an examination of the whole subject. I desire the facts to be known. Let us see whether a man can be taken here in this District in the way that, as I believe, this man was taken. Let us see whether it is against law or not. Let the Judiciary Committee determine that question. That is my view of the case. I do not propose to offer any amendment to the criminal laws of the District of Columbia.

Mr. BECK. I understand the Senator from Connecticut to say that he desires this investigation for the purpose of obtaining the information from the Judiciary Committee whether a change of the law is necessary, and in that event to have the laws amended. If so, I shall vote for the resolution.

Mr. EATON. Oh, I cannot say that. My honorable friend knows that I cannot say that. Let the resolution go to the committee and let the committee determine it. They are the body to say and not I. There is one thing very clear, that this man cannot have the benefit of the habeas corpus. That is impossible. My friend knows that.

Mr. INGALLS. In New Jersey? Why not?

Mr. EATON. Ah, in New Jersey.

Mr. INGALLS. Why can he not apply to the courts in New Jersey for a writ of habeas corpus if his liberty has been unjustly infringed?

Mr. EATON. Where?

Mr. INGALLS. In New Jersey. Why can he not apply to the courts in New Jersey?

Mr. EATON. His liberty has been unjustly infringed upon in the District of Columbia, and that would not answer.

Mr. INGALLS. If he has been improperly arrested or if he has been deprived of his liberty and is now unjustly imprisoned from any cause or by reason of the acts of the officers of any district, he certainly can apply to the courts of New Jersey and allege those grounds and obtain relief.

Mr. EATON. I do not so understand it.

Mr. BECK. I merely desire to say a word further. As it is possible that some amendment may be required to the laws of this District upon the subject I shall vote for the Senator's resolution.

Mr. EATON. I am very glad of that, although it was not in my power to say that that is the intention, for I have not examined the laws of the District in order to find out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution of the Senator from Connecticut.

The resolution was agreed to.

CORRECTION.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I desire to occupy the attention of the Senate for just one moment in order to correct a mistake. I prepared, as the Chair will remember, [Mr. COCKRELL in the chair,] a report to present to the Military Committee at its last meeting upon Senate bill No. 375, which report was rejected. I made an adverse report to the Senate upon the case, as I was instructed to do by the committee; but I find by some mistake the report which I proposed to the committee as a majority report and which was rejected has been printed and placed among the documents as the report of the committee.

Mr. BLAINE. What is the case?

Mr. BURNSIDE. The report is on a bill for the protection of the widows, orphans, and heirs at law of officers of the Army of the United States. It is an insurance bill. I prepared the report as the majority report of the committee and presented it to the committee, but it was rejected. It has been printed and placed on our table as the majority report of the committee. That is a mistake, and I ask that the mistake be corrected. This report was rejected by the committee, and it ought not to have been printed as the majority report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Attention will be given to the matter as soon as it can be examined.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BLAINE. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3740) to provide for deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. BLAINE. I ask that the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations be acted on as they are reached in their order as the reading of the bill proceeds.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read in full. The amendments will be acted upon as they are reached in their order, unless there is objection to that course. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. BLAINE. I will explain very briefly to the Senate just what the bill contains. It is the fifth or sixth deficiency bill which the House of Representatives has sent us since the Forty-fifth Congress assembled in October last. I was absent myself a portion of the time, and therefore I am not sure whether it is the fifth or sixth, but at all events it is a very unusual number. It is the fifth, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DORSEY] says.

The amount contained in the bill as sent to the Senate from the House was $2,360,437.57. The additions made by the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate are $479,819.52, so that the bill as it now stands appropriates $2,840,257.39. The additions made by the Senate committee are comprehended under these heads:

For Senate, expenses proper, which were precipitated by the October session, $14,623.70; printing for the Interior Department, to supply deficiency, $10,000; a deficiency for the Government Insane Hospital, $14,583; rent for the Freedmen's Hospital, $2,000; a deficiency for Powell's survey in the Rocky Mountains, $5,000; a deficiency for Hayden's survey, maps, charts, &c., $20,000; for mints and assay offices, $17,600; for the Monument lot pond, near the Washington Monument, $2,200. For the Capitol grounds we have added $11,000, making $20,000 for the Capitol grounds; for subsistence of the Army, $300,000. The latter is in anticipation of the appropriation for the next fiscal year, and is designed, as has been done now for several years, to enable the Commissary-General to purchase supplies for posts on the Upper Missouri in season to take advantage of the navigation. If the appropriation be waited for until the next fiscal year it will be too late and will cause a very considerably enhanced expenditure in the Quartermaster-General's Department to reach those distant posts. That has been regarded and has proved to be a very wise economy, so that this appropriation of $300,000, which is the great bulk of what the Senate Committee on Appropriations has added, is merely in the way of anticipation and of an economical anticipation.

Another item is for survey of the South Pass of the Mississippi River, $7,500. That is to enable the Engineer department to take cognizance by strict measurement and supervision of what is being done at the South Pass under the Eads contract.

For printing in the War Department, $18,000; for the Des Moines Rapids Canal, $7,500; for provisions for the Marine Corps, $14,277; for the New Brunswick and Canada Railway, $11,935, being a deficiency; for the fog-signal at Whale's Back light-station, in the entrance to the Portsmouth (New Hampshire) Harbor, $15,000. This is a very old and very valuable light, but it is somewhat injured by storms, and must be repaired. The committee put that in upon very urgent representations both from the chief of the Light-house Bureau and from the Secretary of the Treasury. Then there is an appropriation suggested of $8,000 to enable the proper astronomical observations under the care of the Astronomical Observatory in the Navy Department of the solar eclipse, a total eclipse to take place in July, to be total in Northern Texas and Colorado.

These items, as I stated before, aggregate $479,000. After taking out the $300,000, which is in anticipation of the Army appropriation bill for next year, the additions only amount really to $179,000 on the part of the Senate.

I make this very brief statement now, and shall be prepared to answer any questions that Senators may desire to ask upon the bill in so far as I am instructed by the committee. I hope the bill will be read now and the amendments acted upon as read, and those considered as agreed to that are not challenged.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read by the Secretary, and the amendments as they are reached will be acted upon.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill. The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to insert after line 5:

Senate:

To enable the Secretary of the Senate to pay as follows:

For salaries of persons employed in the service of the Senate, "during the session" only, $1,500.

For twenty-seven clerks to committees, $8,100.

For nineteen pages, $2,375.

For furniture and repairs, to enable the Secretary of the Senate to comply with the requirements of the concurrent resolution of February 8, 1878, $2,000.

To pay Thomas P. Clark for services as page of the Senate from the 1st day of December, 1877, to the 30th day of June, 1878, at $2.50 per day, $530; all of the above items being deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending 1878.

To pay S. H. Colbath the salary of a messenger of the Senate for the month of April, 1877, at the rate of $1,440 per annum, $118.70.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading of the bill.

The next amendment was in line 63, in the appropriation for the officers of the House of Representatives, to strike out "John E. Travis" and insert "John A. Travis."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 75, 76, and 77, in the following words:

Patent Office:

For printing for the Patent Office, to be done at the Government Printing Office, $30,000.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

Department of the Interior:

For printing and binding for the Department of the Interior, to be done at the Government Printing Office, being a deficiency for the fiscal year 1878, $40,000.

Mr. BLAINE. I think that should be amended. I hold in my hand a letter from the Commissioner of Patents which throws a little light upon the subject. The committee changed the bill by striking out lines 75, 76, and 77 and appropriating $40,000 in gross for the printing and binding of the Interior Department, and then added certain specifications afterward for the Patent Office. I have here a letter from the Commissioner of Patents, representing, I suppose, the wishes of the Interior Department. I move to amend by adding at the end of line 82 the following proviso:

Provided, That $30,000 thereof be for the use of the Patent Office.

Mr. BECK. What is the purport of the amendment to the amendment?

Mr. BLAINE. That $30,000 of the $40,000 for the Interior Department be for the use of the Patent Office. Otherwise, the Commissioner of Patents thinks, there may be some embarrassment about continuing the monthly publication of the plans and specifications of patents that come in.

Mr. BECK. Has the Senator from Maine the letter of the Commissioner of Patents before him?

Mr. BLAINE. Yes; and I will read that part of it which relates to this matter:

By the change made by the Senate committee, giving $40,000 to the Interior Department for it and all its bureaus, the pro rata apportionment for this office, which will probably be less than one-half the amount, will be insufficient for its wants.

The estimate for $20,000 for this office alone, as passed by the House, was made after a very careful examination into the matter, and is as small a sum as will defray the necessary expenses for printing and binding for the Patent Office, to the 30th of June next.

If this amount can be secured to this office by a proviso, that $30,000 shall be for its use, it will perhaps save us from some embarrassments.

That comes to me officially from the Commissioner of Patents.

Mr. BECK. I supposed as we dealt with the Interior Department and as that is a bureau of that Department, it was more proper that the appropriation should be put under the control of the Interior Department. That was the view of the committee at the time the amendment was made as reported. I do not see very well why there should be any embarrassment about it.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Maine if he thinks there is any fear that the Interior Department would not properly distribute the amount?

Mr. BLAINE. I have no doubt that the Commissioner of Patents writes in harmony with the Interior Department, although the Interior Department under date of March 29 (to which the Senator from Kentucky probably refers; the letter came from the Acting Secretary, Mr. Bell) recommended the precise form of amendment that the committee incorporated in the bill.

Mr. SARGENT. We had better trust the Interior Department.

Mr. BLAINE. Then, if it be the judgment of the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from California, both members of the committee, I will not insist upon my amendment, and will let it go in the form in which it came from the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment being withdrawn the question is on the amendment of the committee.

Mr. BLAINE. It is only fair to state in connection with this matter that the estimate last year for the expenditure in which this is to supply a deficiency was $230,080, and that the appropriation was only $125,000, leaving the estimate over a hundred thousand dollars short. This $40,000 of course will be a somewhat moderate supply for that deficiency, but if they think they can get along with it, it is all the better to keep them down as close as possible.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 83, after the word "expenses," to insert the words "of the Patent Office;" so as to read:

For contingent and miscellaneous expenses of the Patent Office, as follows:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 109, to insert:

Government Hospital for the Insane:

For the support, clothing, and medical and moral treatment of the insane of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, and revenue-cutter service, and of all persons who have become insane since their entrance into the military or naval service of the United States and who are indigent, and of the indigent insane of the District of Columbia, in the Government Hospital for the Insane, being a deficiency in the amount required for the support of the hospital for the fiscal year 1878, $9,583.

For general repairs and improvements, being a deficiency for the fiscal year 1878, $5,000.

Mr. BECK. I hope the Senator from Maine will place upon the record, if he does not read, the letter of the surgeon of that hospital. I think the Senate ought to have it in order to see how urgent the request is made and that the information upon which we acted should be known.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator from Kentucky makes a very proper suggestion, because the superintendent of the Government Hospital for the Insane submitted to the committee a letter, which I hold in my hand, and which is a very exhaustive proof of the absolute requirements of this hospital. For the benefit of the other branch of Congress when this subject shall come up there, I ask that this letter may be inserted as part of my remarks. It is not necessary to detain the Senate upon it further than to say that it makes an absolute case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The letter will be inserted in the RECORD.

The letter is as follows:

GOVERNMENT HOSPITAL FOR THE INSANE,
Near Washington, D. C., March 25, 1878.

SIR: I have the honor to submit herewith a brief statement of the needs of this hospital for a deficiency appropriation of $14,583 for the expenditures of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, and to ask the favorable consideration of the same by your committee. I am unable to say why this item was not attached to the miscellaneous deficiency bill (H. R. 3740) in the House committee. The matter had been brought to their notice, and I presume it was deferred for a later bill, but I submit that if the appropriation is needed at all it should be made at once to prevent serious embarrassment to the management of the hospital, and to enable much-needed improvements to be made during the present fiscal year.

I shall be happy to appear before the committee at any time to offer any explanation that may be needed, or to answer so far as I am able any question in regard to the subject.

I need not add that it would give me pleasure to see the committee at the hospital, or any individual member of it, at any time, and to show them what we have and what we want, and thus afford them an opportunity to see for themselves what are our actual needs and what the work is that we are striving to do.

Should your committee honor us with a visit carriages will be sent for them at any time that may be designated.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. W. GODDING, Superintendent.

Hon. WILLIAM WINDOM,
Chairman of Senate Committee on Appropriations.

Deficiency appropriation asked for the Government Hospital for the Insane.

The deficiency appropriation asked for the hospital for the year ending June 30, 1878, is $14,583, divided as follows:

For support and current expenses $9,583
For general repairs and improvement 5,000

Briefly, the facts are these: the deficiency merely covers the difference between the appropriation and the original estimate. The estimate was a close one, and, in view of the largely increased number of patients, the actual deficiency in support would have been larger than it is but for the general fall in prices of most of the staple articles of consumption.

The appropriation for support in 1876 was $150,000, and the number of free patients at the close of that year, on which the estimate for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, was based, was 710, and the estimate $154,583. It was then thought that the house was as full as it could be, but reference to the last report will show that the number of free patients under treatment at the commencement of the present fiscal year was 735. On the 1st of March, 1878, it had risen to 760, or 50 more than that on which the estimate was based.

From the appropriation of $145,000 made by the last Congress for the support of the hospital for the year ending June 30, 1878, there was expended during the quarter ending September 30, $40,724.41; for the second quarter, ending December 31, 1877, $28,753.54, or a total of $69,477.95 in the first six months, leaving $75,522.05, or, if the deficiency is appropriated, $76,105.05, to provide for the last six months of the year.

In the crowded condition of our wards we have felt it our duty under the law governing admissions to decline to receive indigent or pay patients, and, as far as it could be done without detriment or distress, to request the removal of those now under treatment whose friends were able to provide for them elsewhere. The number of this class has thus been considerably reduced. This, while it relieves the crowding to the extent of the number discharged, also diminishes the receipts for support.

Under special orders Nos. 140 and 216 from the War Department, all insane soldiers under treatment in this hospital were discharged from service, and under General Order No. 88 of 1877, all soldiers hereafter sent to the hospital will be discharged before admission. Hitherto the clothing for this class of patients has been furnished from the Quartermaster's Department without expense to the hospital. This has now to be provided for out of the funds for the support of the institution, an annual expense of not less than $2,500.

I am happy to say that the receipts from the District of Columbia have somewhat exceeded the estimates, so that continuing at the present rate, they will at the end of the year amount to $8,028.60 against $5,842, the sum estimated, being a gain of $2,186.60 to the hospital.

The prices of all staple articles of consumption are also very low, so that, notwithstanding the constant increase of patients, the amount to be expended for supplies need not exceed that of the first half of the year.

But taking all the favoring circumstances into account the sum asked is certainly needed, and with care and economy should be sufficient to give a comfortable provision and care for the helpless class intrusted to our charge.

The deficiency of $5,000 for the general repairs and improvements, though perhaps hardly sufficient to accomplish all that the best economy would suggest, is probably as much as Congress should appropriate for expenditure within the present fiscal year.

A general detail of all the little repairs needed about a hospital from month to month is not necessary. It is true economy in such an institution to allow nothing to get "run down." The item of painting alone becomes a very considerable one in a year's time. The roof of the east lodge needs extensive repairs; two wards require new floors; there is considerable orchard and boundary fence that it is necessary to rebuild on both the farms; there are ravines where retaining walls should be built to prevent destructive "wash-outs;" the wharf must be overhauled before we purchase coal for another season. More inclosures are needed for cattle, increased accommodation for swine, roadways built and mended; in short, a little must be made to go a great way.

No doubt many improvements should be left to better times; but, in view of the possible terrible calamity of fire, can we afford to delay to another year placing a stand-pipe, with suitable hose and attachments, in every ward where insane persons are confined?

It seems to me that it is enough to have simply stated facts, and that the reasonable claims of this form of suffering humanity require no advocate. We have only asked what we believe we need.

Respectfully submitted,

W. W. GODDING, Superintendent.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 123, to insert:

Freedmen's Hospital and Asylum:

For rent of the buildings and grounds occupied as the Freedmen's Hospital and Asylum in the District of Columbia, being a deficiency for the fiscal year 1878, $2,000.

Mr. BECK. There is a written lease showing the occasion for that which is very short.

Mr. BLAINE. I will have the letters on that matter inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. BECK. I only desire to say that in all these matters where there are written papers it will save a great deal of trouble to put them into the RECORD.

Mr. BLAINE. It will save trouble at the other end of the Capitol.

Mr. SARGENT. It will save trouble in the conference committee also, because then the papers are readily referred to.

Mr. ALLISON. It saves trouble every where.

The letters are as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, D. C., March 23, 1878.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith a copy of a letter from Rev. William W. Patton, D. D., president of Howard University, relative to arrears of rent claimed to be due to the trustees of that institution for the buildings used as the Freedmen's Hospital, and to state that since the 30th of June, 1874, the date at which the hospital came under the supervision of the Interior Department, the buildings have been held under a lease approved by Hon. C. Delano, Secretary of the Interior, obligating the Government to the payment of an annual rental of $4,000.

For the year ending June 30, 1878, Congress appropriated but $2,000 for the payment of the same.

Very respectfully,

C. SCHURZ, Secretary.

Hon. WILLIAM WINDOM,
Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations,
United States Senate.

WASHINGTON, D. C., November 16, 1877.

DEAR SIR: Allow me to call your particular attention to the arrears of rent due from your Department to Howard University, in connection with the buildings and grounds used for the Freedmen's Hospital. The rent, in money, (in addition to a few stipulations and reservations,) is the very moderate sum of $4,000 per annum, which is not 4 per cent. of the cost of the buildings alone, to say nothing of the extensive grounds. This sum the university needs to receive in full and with regularity, as even with its aid the income falls short of the expenditures for its important objects, at the present reduced scale of management compelled by the stringency of the times. But Dr. Palmer, the physician in charge of the hospital, declares his inability to pay the rent in full, or even more than one-half of it, owing to the fact that the last appropriation bill of Congress placed at his disposal for said purpose only $2,000. He is therefore occupying the premises, at present, only by sufferance, until Congress shall supply the deficiency. On behalf of the trustees of the university, I call your official attention to this arrangement, trusting that you will in some suitable way bring it to the notice of the proper committee of Congress now in session.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, yours truly,

WM. W. PATTON,
President of Howard University.

Hon. CARL SCHURZ, Secretary of the Interior.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 123, to insert:

For the preparation of the reports of the geographical and geological survey of the Rocky Mountain region, being a deficiency for the fiscal year 1878, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. Before going to the next amendment I should not only like to have the papers in reference to these last two items appear in the RECORD, but to request of the Senator having charge of the bill, if he will excuse my doing so, that in all instances he insert in the RECORD letters relating to the various items.

Mr. BLAINE. I will do so, exactly as the Senator from California suggests. These amendments are to make up obvious deficiencies, of which the papers will be abundant proof. I hope there will be no objection to this.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection to the papers relating to the different items being printed in the RECORD.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 132, to insert:

For the preparation and publication of the maps, charts, geological sections, and other engravings necessary to illustrate the reports of the United States geological and geographical survey of the Territories, $17,000; and for office rent, $2,400; in all, $19,400.

Mr. BLAINE. I submit for publication in the RECORD a letter of Professor Hayden, which explains the amendment fully.

The letter is as follows:

OFFICE OF THE UNITED STATES GEOLOGICAL AND GEOGRAPHICAL SURVEY OF THE TERRITORIES,
Washington, D. C., March 20, 1878.

SIR: I beg permission to request the insertion of the inclosed amendment in the deficiency bill H. R. No. 3740.

In explanation of the amount embraced in this amendment, I beg to present the following reasons:

For the past two years the survey under my charge has received no money for the engraving of the maps and illustrations for the reports.

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, not only was the usual amount granted for this purpose omitted, but the regular estimate for field-work was reduced $15,000, making a reduction of $35,000 for that year.

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, the survey received only the usual amount for field exploration and other incidental expenses.

In regard to the item for rent of office, I beg to refer you to a portion of a clause in an act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, &c., passed by the last Congress, which prohibits us from the use of an office unless specifically provided for by Congress, reading as follows: "And hereafter no contract shall be made for the rent of any building, or part of any building, to be used for the purposes of the Government in the District of Columbia until an appropriation therefor shall have been made in terms by Congress, and that this clause be regarded as notice to all contractors or lessors of any such building or any part of building."

I do not ask this amount as a deficiency, but the condition of this work is such that, although the Government has not been placed under any obligations, yet all the more important volumes and maps which are now in process of publication, being continuous, must be suspended without it.

Hoping that the honorable Committee of Appropriations may look favorably on this request, I have the honor to remain your obedient servant,

F. V. HAYDEN,
United States Geologist.

Hon. WILLIAM WINDOM,

Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations,
United States Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 143, to insert:

Mints and assay offices:

Mint at San Francisco, California: for material and repairs, fuel, lights, chemicals, and other miscellaneous expenses, being a deficiency for the fiscal year 1878, $15,000.

Mint at Denver, Colorado: for wages of workmen, being a deficiency for the fiscal year 1878, $2,000.

Assay office at Boise City, Idaho Territory: for wages of workmen, fuel, crucibles, chemicals, repairs, and other miscellaneous expenses, being a deficiency for the fiscal year 1878, $6,000.

Mr. BLAINE. I shall insert in the RECORD in regard to these additional appropriations for the mints a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, which covers the recommendation of the committee very fully.

The letters are as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., March 27, 1878.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith, for the information of your committee, copy of a letter addressed to the honorable chairman of the House Committee on Appropriations, together with copy of a letter from the Director of the Mint, explaining the necessity for additional appropriations for the mint at San Francisco, California, mint at Denver, Colorado, and the assay office at Boise City, Idaho.

Very respectfully,

JOHN SHERMAN, Secretary.

Hon. WILLIAM WINDOM,

Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
United States Senate.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., March 27, 1878.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith, for the consideration of your committee, copy of a letter from the Director of the Mint of the 26th instant, showing the necessity for providing for additional appropriations for the remainder of the current fiscal year, as follows:

Contingent expenses mint at San Francisco..... $15,000
Wages of workmen, mint at Denver..... 2,000
Wages and incidental expenses, assay office, Boise City..... 600

These appropriations are required to properly carry on the work at the mints and the assay office mentioned, and I have therefore to recommend the same to the favorable action of Congress.

Very respectfully,

JOHN SHERMAN, Secretary.

Hon. J. D. C. ATKINS,

Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE DIRECTOR OF THE MINT,
Washington, D. C., March 26, 1878.

SIR: I have the honor to state that the appropriation for contingent expenses of the mint of the United States at San Francisco, for the current fiscal year, is nearly exhausted, and that in order to continue the coinage of gold, which that mint will be called upon to execute during the balance of this fiscal year, and to make such repairs as will be absolutely necessary at the annual settlement in June next, it will be necessary to procure an appropriation of $15,000 for contingent expenses for that mint.

For your information I would state that during the first eight months of the current fiscal year the coinage of the San Francisco mint was:

	Pieces.	Value.
Gold.....	1,424,100	$27,479,500
Trade-dollars.....	7,239,000	7,239,000
Fractional silver.....	8,352,000	3,743,000
Total.....	17,015,100	$38,461,500

The amount of gold coinage the mint at San Francisco will be called upon to make during the remainder of the fiscal year I estimate at $12,000,000. I would add, that upon the amount of trade-dollars manufactured the coinage charge collected amounted to $160,585. The amount accruing prior to January 1 has been paid into the Treasury, and the remainder will be paid in at the close of the current quarter.

I have also to report that in order to continue operations at the mint of the United States at Denver, for the balance of the current fiscal year, it will be necessary to procure an appropriation of $2,000 for wages of workmen.

The assay office at Boise City, Idaho, ceased operations on the 1st of February, the appropriation for wages and incidental expenses for the year being exhausted. I have to recommend that an appropriation of $600 be procured for wages and incidental expenses at that office for the balance of this fiscal year, in order that the same may be reopened for business.

Very respectfully,

H. R. LINDERMAN, Director.

Hon. JOHN SHERMAN,

Secretary of the Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 156, to insert:

Light-house establishment:

For repairs necessary for the safety and continuance of the fog-signal at Whale's Back light-station, entrance to Portsmouth Harbor, New Hampshire, $15,000.

Mr. BLAINE. I submit letters on this amendment.

The letters are as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., March 30, 1878.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith, for the information of your committee, copy of a letter addressed to the honorable chairman of the House Committee on Appropriations, together with copy of a letter from the naval secretary of the Light-House Board, in regard to the necessity for an appropriation of $15,000 for repairs at Whale's Back light-station, New Hampshire.

Very respectfully,

JOHN SHERMAN, Secretary.

Hon. WILLIAM WINDOM,

Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
United States Senate.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., March 30, 1878.

SIR: I have the honor to forward herewith, for the consideration of your committee, copy of a letter from J. G. Walker, naval secretary of the Light-House Board, in regard to the necessity for an appropriation of $15,000 for repairs at Whale's Back light-station, New York.

It will be seen from the inclosed statement that the pier on which the light-house tower stands has been much injured by the severe storms of the past winter, and has become unsafe, and as the fog-signal in the tower is an important aid to navigation, it is absolutely necessary that immediate and extensive repairs should be made to the pier on which it stands.

Very respectfully,

JOHN SHERMAN, Secretary.

Hon. J. D. C. ATKINS,

Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE LIGHT-HOUSE BOARD,
Washington, March 22, 1878

SIR: I have the honor to state that the fog-signal at Whale's Back, entrance to Portsmouth Harbor, New Hampshire, is placed in the old tower at the Whale's Back light-station.

This tower stands on a circular stone pier which has been so much injured by the sea during the severe storms of the past winter that it has become unsafe to such an extent that the keepers dare not venture into it during heavy weather.

This fog-signal is an important aid to navigation, and in order to maintain it in its present position it is absolutely necessary that immediate and extensive repairs should be made to the pier.

It is therefore respectfully requested that Congress be asked to appropriate the sum of $12,000 for making such repairs and renovations as are necessary for the safety and continuance of the fog-signal at the Whale's Back light-station, entrance to Portsmouth Harbor, New Hampshire.

Very respectfully,

J. G. WALKER,
Naval Secretary.

The honorable SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed till the following paragraph, from lines 174 to 177, was reached:

Internal revenue.—For salaries, expenses, and fees of storekeepers, agents, surveyors, gaugers, and miscellaneous expenses, $40,000.

Mr. BECK. In regard to that item, there was a partial discussion of it in committee, the Senator from Maine will remember. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue insisted that he required $150,000. The House had some doubt as to whether an item in another bill was not for the same thing. No very definite opinion having been arrived at, I would suggest as the House proposes to send over other deficiency bills and as the Commissioner has suggested that there is no immediate hurry for this particular item, this clause perhaps had better be stricken out of this bill.

Mr. ALLISON. No, I think not.

Mr. BECK. In order that it may be considered more fully by the House when another deficiency comes up there.

Mr. SARGENT. Will that be time? It is certainly a very necessary expenditure.

Mr. BLAINE. Either that should be done, or what I think is better would be to increase the amount of the appropriation. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, when he finally met our committee, as the Senator from Kentucky will remember, wished this sum increased to $150,000, which he thinks he absolutely requires. If we should do that it would be left to the consideration of the other branch, and finally to a conference. That would get the subject at all events on the way between the two Houses, and if there be any error, as the House thinks there may have been some little duplication of recommendations, and if the same sum has been included first in one bill and then in another, it can be corrected. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, as the Senator from Kentucky will remember, was very closely interrogated upon that point in order that we might avoid making a duplicate appropriation for the same thing. He then explained to us that in order to thoroughly guard the interests of the revenue in the matter of the distilleries he needed for the pay of gaugers and other officers overlooking and supervising them at least $150,000. I agree with the Senator from Kentucky that there is a little confusion between the two Houses and between the two bills, but I think the better way to remedy it for the efficiency of the service would be the way I suggest.

Mr. BECK. There is no real difficulty. The items were entirely distinct, the item in the other bill for $40,000 being for the collectors and their assistants, and this item being for gaugers, storekeepers, surveyors, &c. There is a confusion of mind simply among members of the House in regard to it. I think perhaps it would be better to strike the clause from this bill and leave it until another deficiency bill comes up in the House, when the difficulty will be removed. Over this item the Commissioner of Internal Revenue has no control. He is required by law wherever a distillery is established to furnish a gauger and a storekeeper, and their salary is fixed by law. Therefore he is compelled to furnish those officers, for upon his failure to do so the distillery cannot be started and the Government gets no revenue. There is no doubt as to the importance of this item and no doubt of its being absolutely distinct from the other, the Commissioner having control over the other, and not over this. I thought perhaps some confusion might be avoided by striking it out, as we are assured that other deficiency bills are coming in.

Mr. DORSEY. I desire to make a suggestion to the Senator from Kentucky. I suggest that the word "agents," in line 176, be stricken out. That would give the conference committee control of the matter, and when the question comes up in conference, as the Senator very well understands, the conference committee will be able to arrange it as it may be thought best to do. I make that motion.

Mr. BECK. All I care about is that the matter may be kept open in some way.

Mr. ALLISON. Allow me to make a suggestion to my friends. I think the best way to secure jurisdiction on the question and have it thoroughly before the House would be to either increase or diminish this appropriation. I think the Commissioner of Internal Revenue very distinctly stated that he required more than this sum for this year. As has been truly stated by the Senator from Kentucky, these appropriations are wholly without his control. He has notice that a new distillery is to come into operation. A storekeeper must be provided under the law, a gauger must be provided, and a survey of the distillery must be made. These are expenditures that must go on with appropriations or without appropriations. Therefore I think the best way is to increase this appropriation, and I am sure no harm will be done thereby.

Mr. DORSEY. There is no question whatever that this appropriation has got to be made either upon this bill or upon the next deficiency bill. Upon that question I believe there is no difference between the Houses.

Mr. ALLISON. May I make a suggestion to the Senator? I suggest to him that instead of the amendment which he proposes he move to insert "one hundred" instead of "forty" before "thousand," so as to make the appropriation $100,000.

Mr. BECK. That would do. That would bring the matter up between the two Houses.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that amendment. I move in line 177 to strike out "forty" and insert "one hundred," so as to read:

For salaries, expenses, and fees of storekeepers, agents, surveyors, gaugers, and miscellaneous expenses, $100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 177, to insert:

For expenses incurred in obtaining abstracts and information of real estate acquired under internal-revenue laws, $600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 223, to insert:

To complete the work of adapting the ponds in the Monument lot in the city of Washington to the culture of carp for distribution throughout the United States, to be done by the engineer in charge of public buildings and grounds, according to the plans of the United States fish commission, $2,300, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be available immediately.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on line 241, to increase the appropriation "for fertilizers, materials, and labor on the Capitol grounds during the present fiscal year" from $9,000 to $20,000.

Mr. BLAINE. That is in pursuance of a unanimous vote of the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 280, to insert:

Subsistence:
That the sum of $300,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, and may be applied by the Commissary-General of Subsistence, prior to the 1st day of July, 1878, to the purchase of subsistence supplies intended for the posts supplied through the Upper Missouri, and for other distant posts; which amount shall be deducted from the appropriations for subsistence of the Army for the next fiscal year. And this appropriation is hereby made available from the passage of this act.

Mr. BLAINE. That is the amendment to which I referred as constituting a little more than two-thirds of all the additions which the committee have recommended to the bill. The Commissary-General says:

I, however, respectfully request that an appropriation of $300,000 on account of subsistence of the Army for the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1878, be made at as early a date as practicable, for the purchase of supplies required for remote posts, which can be more economically supplied in the early spring than after the 1st of July.

The amendment is solely in the interest of economy, and there is to be a deduction to that amount in the regular Army bill. I hope there will be no objection to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 290, to insert:

To ascertain the depth of water and width of channel secured and maintained from time to time by James B. Eads, at the South Pass of the Mississippi River, and to enable the Secretary of War to report, during the construction of the work, the payments made from time to time, and the probable times of other payments, and to report during the construction of the work all important facts relating to the progress of the same, materials used, and the character and permanency with which the said jetties and auxiliary works are being constructed, $7,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 301, to insert:

For printing and binding for the War Department, to be done at the Government Printing Office, being a deficiency for the fiscal year 1878, $18,000.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask the Senator in charge of the bill if he has not a letter from the Secretary of War on this point?

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator from Rhode Island asks me if there was not a letter from the Secretary of War before the committee. There was. I have it here. The Secretary of War asked that $25,000 be appropriated. The committee went very carefully over all the estimates which were submitted by the Secretary from the various bureaus of the Department and came to the conclusion that $18,000 would cover the probable necessities of the service from now until the end of the fiscal year. That was I think the general conclusion of the committee and I have no doubt that amount will be found to be sufficient. I think this will be found to be an adequate appropriation.

Mr. SARGENT. I suggest that the letter go into the RECORD.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is what I meant to suggest.

Mr. BLAINE. Yes, I will see that it goes in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The letter will go in.

The communications are as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, March 23, 1878.

SIR: In connection with my letter of the 18th instant to the President of the Senate, in regard to the printing and binding for this Department and asking an additional appropriation of $25,000 for the current fiscal year and an appropriation of $100,000 for the next fiscal year, I have the honor to inclose an abstract of reports received from the chiefs of bureaus in this Department, giving a partial estimate of work necessary to be done at the Government Printing Office during the remainder of the present fiscal year.

This partial estimate amounts to over $18,000. Several of the bureaus make no estimate. Two thousand dollars will be needed by this office for printing and binding; so that the amount asked for in my letter of the 18th instant, above referred to, ($25,000.) will not be more than enough to pay for work actually required during the remainder of the present fiscal year.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

GEO. W. MCCRARY,
Secretary of War.

Hon. H. B. ANTHONY,
Chairman Committee on Printing, United States Senate.

(From War Department.)

WASHINGTON, March 28, 1878.

To Hon. WILLIAM WINDOM, United States Senate:

The appropriation for public printing for this Department is exhausted. I have asked an additional appropriation of $25,000 to carry the Department through the remainder of the present fiscal year. The public service will be much obstructed if this appropriation is not soon made.

GEO. W. MCCRARY,
Secretary of War.

Public Printer states that but $12,604.51 of the $72,000 allowed for War Department printing remains on hand February 13, 1878; that he has on his books unfinished work enough to exhaust this amount.

Judge-Advocate-General reports that it will not be necessary to make any more requisitions during this fiscal year.

Adjutant-General reports that blanks will be required during the fiscal year costing

Printing general and general court-martial orders, average from February 1 to June 30, for last six years, 33 court-martial orders and 57 general orders, costing $32 for each edition: 90 editions, at $32.....	2,880 00
Cost of indorsement-book	18 30

The following work is under way at Government Printing Office and considered not only necessary but essential: 10,000 Army Registers, (9,700 registers unbound,) $2,025.85; 300 registers bound, $532.90	2,558 75
---	----------

Also 2,000 statements clothing accounts for Second Auditor; 500 circular letters; 250 certificates for officers in lieu of discharge. (Amount unknown.)

Commissary-General reports that the cost of the last eight months for printing and binding for that office was $2,838.46; that the amount for the next four months would be proportional to the amount required for the preceding eight months, i. e., $1,400, being $2,511.54 less than the amount, $4,911.54, estimated, for all of which should be allowed, to enable this bureau to provide the books and blanks necessary for a proper performance of the duties of the Subsistence Department.

Paymaster-General reports that in addition to three requisitions not yet filled, that office will require for the current fiscal year, 20,000 of form 3, officers' pay accounts, and 5,000 of form 5, soldiers' final accounts. These blanks are indispensable.

Surgeon-General reports the following unfilled requisitions now in printer's hands:

100 lists of abbreviations of titles, &c.....	$300 00
56 circulars, No. 10, binding of.....	84 00
3,000 lists of wounded	29 45
3,000 monthly reports of examination of recruits	45 00
500 volumes of medical works, binding of.....	1,200 00

The above work is all necessary for the use of the office. There are besides 4,000 volumes that should be bound for the library.

Quartermaster-General submits an estimate for printing and binding for that office for present fiscal year.

Chief Engineer submits deficiency estimate and that $1,000 on books of printer for estimate of unfinished work may be diverted from requisitions in hands of the printer for work that may be delayed and made available for work required at once.

Chief Signal Officer submits no specific estimate, but states that he never makes requisition for anything unless really needed, and the service will suffer from any delay of work now in progress.

Inspector-General reports that he does not require any printing or binding for this fiscal year.

Chief of Ordnance requests that $1,000 be set aside from unfinished work for such as may be absolutely necessary at present.

18,950 28

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, examination showed that this amount was necessary for blanks to carry on the service. I am not entirely satisfied myself that the appropriation has not been made deficient partly by printing expensive books or something of that kind heretofore. I am not sure that that was not the case. I do not object to this appropriation being made, but it seems to me it is hardly just to Congress, after appropriating an amount for the printing of a Department, that a large portion of it should be used for the printing of expensive books and then finally for them to come in and plead for more money to print blanks which are necessary for the Department. I do not know but that it might be well to admonish the Departments that they should attend to the working business of the Department first and to printing books afterward.

Mr. BLAINE. There is nothing in this amendment about books. Mr. SARGENT. No, sir; nothing at all. This is simply for printing blanks, and therefore I do not object to it.

Mr. BLAINE. These blanks are very numerous and are of the form known among printers as rule-and-figure work, and the expense is greater probably on that account.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 305, to insert:

To pay the current expenses of operating the Des Moines Rapids Canal on the Upper Mississippi River until July 1, 1878, $7,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, the same to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War.

Mr. SARGENT. This is the first appropriation of the kind for this work, I think. The Senate will understand that it is an appropriation to pay the persons who work the locks, &c., of this canal, which is for the benefit of commerce. I assented to it in committee and I do not intend to vote against it, because, as I said the other day in discussing another bill where I thought a different rule was applied, I am in favor of extending facilities to commerce as being for the interest of the whole country, and not merely the interest of a section. But I ask the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] to explain whether my impressions in reference to this are correct; that is, whether the appropriation is for the working expenses of this canal, which by the original legislation was declared to be free and open to commerce.

Mr. ALLISON. As I understand it, that is the object of this appropriation, and it is an essential object. There are three of these locks. This is a very expensive and valuable work. All the commerce of the Upper Mississippi passes now through this canal; it is found to be of very great service to commerce. The original act appropriating money for this improvement provides that it shall forever remain free from tolls or other charges. Therefore, inasmuch as this work must be maintained and these locks must be opened, and opened by skillful hands, it is necessary that a small appropriation should be made from year to year for the purpose.

Mr. WHYTE. May I ask the Senator how has it been operated heretofore?

Mr. ALLISON. It has been operated chiefly on credit. The canal was opened I believe in August last year, but the work was not completed, and the engineer in charge and many of the men still working upon the canal were diverted to the purposes of operating it. But of course that was only temporarily. That lasted during the fall of last year. The canal I believe was opened about the 20th of August or probably the 1st of September. It was operated in that way from September until the close of the canal in December. Now the canal is again open and of course this work must go on. It is thought that this sum will be required to operate the canal until the 1st of July. I will say to my friend from Maryland that the Committee on Commerce in the other House have provided for it for next year, if I may be permitted to refer to that question. At least I will say that if he will examine the bill on our tables reported from the Committee on Commerce of the House he will find that there are $40,000 appropriated in that bill for this purpose during the next fiscal year. Of course this commerce that passes through the canal cannot be taxed for this purpose. It is too small a sum ever to collect revenue for, and therefore the cheapest and best way for the Government is to operate the canal in the mode proposed by this amendment.

Mr. BLAINE. This amendment was pressed upon the committee from commercial interests on the Lower Mississippi, or at least from much below Iowa. It came from an interest which might be termed the Saint Louis interest, a large interest, interested in the free navigation of the Mississippi River.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 337, in the appropriation for the Navy Department, to insert:

Marine Corps:
For provisions for the Marine Corps, being a deficiency for the fiscal year 1877, $14,277.09.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, this amendment ought to be adopted, but the Senate ought to understand when it is adopted what the facts are. We sent for Major Slack, the quartermaster of the Marine Corps, and he assured the committee that he had but $75,000 given him for the current fiscal year, of which he had spent $60,000, and that he had entered into written contracts with other persons for $14,200, all of which were regular and the supplies were furnished. He ought to have had $15,000 in addition to the $60,000 he had already expended, but he found that by order of his superior, whether the former Secretary of the Navy or not I do not know, $15,000 had been diverted in some other way, so that it could not be made available. While the deficiency does in fact exist, there were some irregularities somewhere which the committee were neither able nor inclined to investigate fully. Those matters are being looked into elsewhere. There is in fact a deficiency where there would have been no deficiency but for the misappropriation of this $15,000. I thought it proper to let the Senate know the fact.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 341, to insert:

To pay the expenses of observations of the solar eclipse of July, 1878, $2,000; and this amount shall be available until the completion of the work.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line 346, to insert:

Post-Office Department:

To pay the New Brunswick and Canada Railroad Company for transporting the mails between boundary line, Saint Stephen's, and McAdam Junction, from November 1, 1871 to June 30, 1872, $1,935.73; from July 1, 1872, to June 30, 1873, $4,000; from July 1, 1873, to June 30, 1874, $4,000; from July 1, 1874, to December 31, 1874, $2,000; in all, $11,935.73.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to put in a letter from the Post-Office Department in regard to this item. It is for a railroad that lies entirely outside of the United States, and has some comity of nations involved in it as well as an actual and bona fide debt. I will have the Record print the letter from the Post-Office Department.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The letter will be printed in the Record.

The letter is as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., April 1, 1878.

SIR: In reply to your verbal inquiry of this morning, I beg leave to state that after a thorough investigation of all the facts touching the transportation of mails by the New Brunswick and Canada Railroad Company, between the Boundary Line (near Houlton, Maine) and McAdam Junction, and between Saint Stephen and McAdam Junction, the following synopsis of the facts was made: "The Department authorized the transportation of mails between McAdam Junction and Houlton from March 1, 1872, by letter of February 16, 1872. The transportation of mails was authorized between Calais and McAdam Junction from November 1, 1871, by letter of November 4, 1871. The letters of the Department referred to express that the service is to be paid for under the treaty of 1851, which provided that certain mails should be paid for one-half by this country and the other by the Canadian government. The provisions of the treaty in question have been decided not to have been applicable to this service. The Canadian government assumed the service under the present treaty on the 1st January, 1875, and writes under date of August 24, 1877, that no payment had been made for service prior to January 1, 1875. The then Postmaster-General, Hon. John A. J. Creswell, in a letter dated April 10, 1877, states that the service herein referred to was ordered by him. The company is therefore entitled to compensation for the service so rendered." And on the 13th September, 1877, the following order was issued: "Refer to the auditor to pay the New Brunswick and Canada Railroad Company for service between Boundary Line (near Houlton) and McAdam Junction from March 1, 1872, to December 31, 1874, at the rate of $2,200 per annum, being $50 per mile for forty-four miles. And also for service between Saint Stephen and McAdam Junction from November 1, 1871, to December 31, 1874, at the rate of $1,800 per annum, being $50 per mile for thirty-six miles."

The $11,935.73 necessary to be appropriated for the New Brunswick and Canada Railroad Company, as reported in the statement accompanying the letter of the honorable Secretary of the Treasury, addressed to the Speaker of the House of Representatives under date of February 6, 1878, is required to meet this obligation.

Very respectfully, &c.,

Hon. JAMES G. BLAINE,
Senate United States.

THOS. J. BRADY,
Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This completes the amendments reported from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BLAINE. Under the head of "Senate," if the Secretary will turn to line 25, I ought to have moved an amendment to cover items for some small bills that are absolutely necessary to be paid, for which there is no appropriation. I move to insert after line 25:

Furniture and repairs, for the fiscal year, 1877, $224.31.
Miscellaneous items for the fiscal year, 1877, $45.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. I offer the following amendment, which I gave notice of and had referred to the Committee on Appropriations, to come in after line 345:

To enable the Secretary of the Navy to print a set of watch and station bills at the Government Printing Office, $350.

Mr. BLAINE. I quite agree with the chairman of the Committee on Printing that that ought to be inserted.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will send up a letter from the Secretary of the Navy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The letter will be printed in the RECORD unless it be desired to be read now.

The letter is as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, April 5, 1878.

Sir: Under instructions of the Department a set of watch and station bills adapted to all classes of vessels of the Navy have been prepared, and should be printed. The work has been long needed and will be of great benefit to the Navy, and should be published as soon as practicable, as the officer who has been engaged in its preparation, and should revise its publication, is liable to be ordered away at any moment. The appropriation for this Department for printing and binding, which was not sufficient, is so near exhausted that it will not bear the expense of printing the bills, which is estimated at $350, and I have therefore the honor to suggest and recommend an appropriation of this sum for the purpose. Three hundred copies of the bills are considered necessary.

Very respectfully,

R. W. THOMPSON,
Secretary of the Navy.

Hon. H. B. ANTHONY,
Chairman Committee on Printing, United States Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. I move the following amendment, to come in at the end of the bill.

To repay to the Smithsonian Institution expenses incurred in the transportation of public documents under the joint resolution approved July 25, 1868, $1,751.

Mr. BECK. I should like to have some explanation of that.

Mr. HOWE. I send to the desk a letter from the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution which will explain it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The letter will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION,
Washington, D. C., March 13, 1878.

Sir: I have the honor, in behalf of the Smithsonian Institution, to inform you that bills have been sent to the Librarian of the Congress Library amounting to $1,751 for expenses incurred by the institution in transmitting the public documents of the United States known as international exchanges and receiving returns for the same, &c. As these documents have been distributed through the agency of the Smithsonian Institution, in accordance with the act of Congress approved July 25, 1868, (joint resolution,) and as the amount expended therefor has been taken from the interest on the Smithsonian fund for the operation of the institution, we beg leave to request that it be refunded at as early a day as is practicable, and to this end that you will cause the amount to be inserted in the deficiency appropriation bill.

I have the honor to be, very truly yours,

JOSEPH HENRY,
Secretary Smithsonian Institution.

CHAIRMAN of the Joint Committee on the Library.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like still to inquire what documents these are. Are they the ordinary public documents or are they documents printed by the Smithsonian Institution?

Mr. HOWE. Our documents, which under resolution 68 we print fifty copies of for the purpose of exchanging for like documents issued by other governments. These exchanges are made through the Smithsonian Institution because by availing on selves of their services the work is done without additional cost of sea transportation.

Mr. SARGENT. Is the amendment reported from the Committee on the Library?

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DORSEY. I offer the following amendment, to come in after line 120:

District of Columbia:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized and directed to advance to the commissioners of the District of Columbia $75,000 for the support of the public schools of the District, to be available immediately; and said commissioners shall refund the amount so advanced out of any revenues of the District for the current fiscal year not required for its actual expenses.

Mr. BECK. Will not a point of order apply to that? That is not a deficiency.

Mr. DORSEY. The matter was before the Committee on Appropriations and at my suggestion it was referred informally to the Committee on the District of Columbia. I have consulted every member of the Committee on the District and I believe it is their unanimous opinion that this appropriation ought to be made. If it is not made the schools will have to close within the next week or ten days. I am sorry to say that this District is always behind about one-quarter in its appropriations. They have to anticipate everything. The fund for maintaining the schools is now exhausted. Last year we advanced $75,000 about this time, and that, of course, had to come out of the taxes raised afterward. They are now again $75,000 short.

Mr. BECK. The objection I have to this item is that it is not a deficiency in any proper sense of the term. It may be a gratuity; it may be a moral obligation; it may be something that we ought to do; but a deficiency bill which the House thought to be of sufficient importance to send here immediately, even in advance of the ordinary deficiency bill, I do not think ought to be incumbered with it.

Mr. BLAINE. There is no doubt it is to supply a very great deficiency.

Mr. DORSEY. I think if the Senator from Kentucky will hear the letters I have he will withdraw his objection. I have a letter from the school board which I send to the Clerk to be read.

Mr. MORRILL. May I ask the Senator from Arkansas whether the $75,000 loaned last year has not been repaid?

Mr. DORSEY. Certainly it has been.

Mr. MORRILL. And it is only proposed now to borrow this and have it repaid in the same manner?

Mr. DORSEY. That is it. It is simply an advance.

Mr. BLAINE. Will the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia tell the Senate whether, if the Government should put the District on its feet by making up this quarter—the Senator says they are about a quarter behind all the time—they could keep up even; how long would it be before they would be behind again?

Mr. DORSEY. I could answer that question probably if I had the disbursement of the money of the District, but unfortunately I have not control of its finances. The truth is that under the law of June, 1874, all the money of the District is kept in the Treasury of the United States; whenever any tax is collected or anything else is received, it is paid into the Treasury; when ever the District uses money it draws it out of the Treasury, and sometimes the account is largely overdrawn, and sometimes the District has a balance there. The fact is it is simply a bank account between the District and the General Government.

Mr. BLAINE. I have no doubt the Senator from Kentucky is entirely correct in saying that this has none of the features of a proper deficiency. It is a gratuity, or an accommodation, or a kindness at the hands of Congress, and on that ground I am very ready to vote for it.

Mr. SARGENT. It is a loan.

Mr. BLAINE. You may call it a loan; but the Senator from Kentucky is quite right in saying that it does not have a proper recognition as a deficiency except as the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. Dawes) suggests to me it is a deficiency in the funds of the District of Columbia, not in the appropriations of Congress.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will say to the Senator from Maine that I do not understand it as a gratuity even. But I want to know whether there is a necessity for it. So far as we have information here, we have no information as to the necessity for it except what a Senator states.

Mr. BLAINE. On that point there is no ground for doubt whatever that the schools are in urgent need; they are in articulo mortis just now, and they can hardly run a fortnight.

Mr. SAULSBURY. So far as I am concerned, if that condition of affairs has been brought about by the improvident action of those having control of the schools, I should not feel that there was any obligation on me to help take money out of the public Treasury to pay for their dereliction of duty. If they have expended extravagantly the money provided for that purpose, it is no reason that they should come here and ask that a deficiency be made good. I want information on that point.

Mr. DORSEY. I think I can give the information desired. Instead of the school board being extravagant in the expenditure of money this year, they have actually expended less money than they did last year, while the increase of pupils has been over two thousand—I think upward of 10 or 11 per cent. There has been an actual decrease in the expenditures. I send to the desk a letter from the president of the school board; if the Clerk will be kind enough to read it it will give some information on this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The letter will be read.

Mr. KERNAN. One moment: I desire to inquire how much they have expended for schools during the past year?

Mr. DORSEY. That question I cannot answer.

Mr. KERNAN. About how much?

Mr. DORSEY. By turning to the letter, I can answer.

Mr. SARGENT and others. Let the letter be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 23, 1878.

GENTLEMEN: I desire to call your attention to the fact communicated in the report of the school trustees in November last, that the public schools must be closed in April, two months before the regular time, unless further means shall be provided for their support.

It will be remembered that no more money out of District revenues has been set apart for the support of the public schools this year than there was last year, and last year Congress appropriated $75,000. A like amount will answer the purpose this year, notwithstanding the increased attendance (about two thousand) of the pupils; that is, the expenditures for the support of the public schools have not increased over the expenditures last year, while the number of pupils in attendance has increased about two thousand. This result has been brought about by the large reduction in salaries of teachers and in other expenses of the schools, made last August.

My object in this communication is to suggest that Congress should be asked to consider, at the present time, our request for $75,000 to continue the schools the remainder of the current year, as otherwise they must soon be closed, which would be a great misfortune.

Very respectfully,

W. W. CURTIS,

President Board of Trustees of Public Schools District of Columbia.

Hon. COMMISSIONERS OF DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Correct copy.

H. C. TILLMAN,

Clerk Commissioners District of Columbia.

MARCH 30, 1878.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Now I will inquire of the Senator who offered the amendment what specific amount of money was appropriated for the support of schools? I understand him to say that all the District taxes and appropriations are paid into the United States Treasury as a common fund. I want to inquire whether for the various purposes of this District everybody charged with any duty toward the District draws from that fund, or whether there is a specific amount appropriated to the school fund and other matters in reference to the District.

Mr. DORSEY. My understanding is that the District commissioners apportion the amount to be used by the school board for the purposes of schools. That amount, as it appears from their report, for the last year was $335,000.

Mr. KERNAN. Does that include the $75,000 additional?

Mr. DORSEY. That includes the $75,000 which we appropriated last year, and which has been paid back. It does not include the $75,000 now asked. The District commissioners in their annual report say, referring to the school board:

We commend also their recommendation for an appropriation by Congress of $75,000 to enable them to continue the schools until the regular close of the school year. The amount which the commissioners can set apart for the use of the schools during the present year from the District treasury will, unaided by congressional appropriation, compel the closing of the schools not later than the 1st of May, about two months earlier than their regular closing period. Congress at its last session made an appropriation of $75,000 for a like purpose.

The commissioners of the District have sent me the following communication:

OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,

Washington, March 30, 1878.

SIR: I am instructed to send you the inclosed copy of a communication to the District Committee of the House, relating to an appropriation of $75,000 to enable the public schools to continue open the current public school year, to which the commissioners will thank you to call the attention of your committee.

Very respectfully,

WILLIAM TINDALL, Secretary.

Hon. S. W. DORSEY,

Chairman Senate Committee on the District of Columbia.

OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,

Washington, March 26, 1878.

DEAR SIR: We have the honor to call the attention of yourself and committee to the accompanying copy of a communication from the president of the board of trustees of public schools of the District, and renew the recommendation we made in our last annual report, for the appropriation of $75,000 asked for in the said communication. It will be a great misfortune if the schools shall have to be closed before the end of the regular school year.

Very respectfully,

W. DENNISON,

S. L. PHELPS,

THOS. B. BRYAN,

Commissioners District of Columbia.

Hon. A. S. WILLIAMS,

Chairman Committee on the District of Columbia,

House of Representatives.

Mr. BECK. It appears to me that the facts developed make it very apparent that this is not in any proper sense a deficiency and that the commissioners of the District have so arranged the amount to be appropriated for the school fund as to make this $75,000 again a donation or loan, and that it ought to come up as a separate measure and be submitted, after a thorough investigation of all the facts, to the Senate as a proposition for them to consider; but it is not proper, in a bill which has been sent forward in advance of the regular deficiency bill by the House of Representatives, to propose to put this gratuity to the District school fund. It is a place where it ought not to be.

Mr. SARGENT. This proposition was before the Committee on Appropriations and was discussed at considerable length; but there being another committee, that on the District of Columbia, whose opinion we desired upon it, the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, who is a member of the Committee on Appropriations, was requested to consult his committee about it; and he has done so, and we have the results.

I agree with the Senator from Kentucky that this is not a deficiency in the expenditures of the Government of the United States; but it stands upon a principle that I think is quite correct. The fact in reference to the schools of this District is that they are largely filled with the children of employes of the Government. The Government makes no appropriation whatever, unless it may be this loan which is repaid and which has been made occasionally and has been regularly repaid by the District out of the first revenues collected afterward. The Government makes no appropriation for the support of these schools; and yet those who might be considered transient residents fill up the schools and that accounts for the large amount of the increased attendance this year. It is a fact, I am told, that members of Congress send their children to these schools, send them freely, send them for months during the year. They are public schools; they are excellent schools under good discipline and are very efficient, and unquestionably there are, I may say, hundreds of members of Congress and persons connected with Congress, residing here only during the sessions, who send their children to these schools.

We are rather harsh, I think, to the District generally. The Thurman bill, introduced some years ago and passed by both Houses, followed out the suggestions of the report made by that able Senator, that Congress ought to appropriate a sum—I think the sum named was $1,200,000—as its share of the ordinary expenses of the District, in consideration that it owns between 40 and 50 per cent. of all the property in the District. Congress, being convinced, did make that appropriation then, but the following year, the circumstances having passed by, the eloquence of the Senator being forgotten, and the motives of the committee which reported the bill being overlooked, the amount was cut down one-half, and finally disappeared from the regular appropriation bills. The result is now that, as to the fire department, we hardly pay a percentage of the amount of insurance we should have to pay for the security it gives to our property. We pay a little toward the Metropolitan police, I think one-half, which guards everything about the city. With the exception of a scattering dollar or two of that kind, we make no appropriation to help along the District. It seems to me that when they simply come in and ask us to make them the loan of this amount to begin the next fiscal year with, we shall not be doing any great hardship to the Treasury by granting the request, while by doing it we may likely avert what is a calamity in any community, the entire suspension of public schools during several months of the year; and that is especially the case in a city like this. For that reason I am willing, for one, to overlook the technical objection that this is not strictly a deficiency of the Government. There is no reason why we ought to limit our power of putting it on this bill if we are convinced for other reasons that it ought to go there.

Mr. WINDOM. I agree with the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from California that this is not technically a deficiency, but there are several appropriations in the bill which are not deficiencies. For instance, the $300,000 for supplies for the Army for the next year can be in no sense a deficiency, and yet nobody has objected to placing it on this bill upon that ground. I hope that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas may be adopted. I do not regard it as a gratuity. I believe, as the Senator from California has stated, that the large amount of property owned by this Government in this District does require that it should contribute to its expenses. I think the fairest estimate that can be made is that the Government ought to contribute 40 per cent.; it does not contribute anything like that sum.

Mr. SARGENT. Not five.

Mr. WINDOM. Not five. I do not see how we can justify ourselves in saying that we will own 40 per cent. of the property of the District, require everybody rich and poor to send his children to the common schools, and yet not contribute anything toward them. I am informed by the Senator from Arkansas that the $70,000 appropriated last year was only a loan which was repaid by the District.

Mr. DORSEY. This is the same.

Mr. WINDOM. This is asked for merely as a loan. Now, Mr. President, in view of the fact that we own 40 per cent. of the property of the District, or 54 per cent., as I am corrected by the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia—in view of the fact that we own 54 per cent. of the property of this District and pay no taxes on it whatever, can we not afford to loan this District $75,000 to prevent the closing of the schools two months before the end of this fiscal year? I hope there may be no vote against this proposition.

Mr. BECK. I have no idea of antagonizing the proper consideration of this measure when it properly comes up; I only antagonize it on this bill. While we do own a large amount of property in the District, perhaps 54 per cent., it is principally avenues and public parks, property that is for the benefit of the District, and not for the benefit of the United States, kept up at Government expense, to ornament and add to the comfort of the people who reside here. When these things are all taken into account, when it is considered that the property we own and that it is said that we pay no taxes on is property that we are expending large amounts of money upon for the benefit of these very people, the injustice does not seem so glaring as is represented. But I do not desire to go into that, nor do I desire to put myself in a hostile attitude to doing something for the public schools; but I do insist when they come to ask a loan or a credit or anything else, it shall stand as an independent proposition and be considered as such, and not go in as a part of the necessary obligations of the Government, charged to the Government by the men who are managing this Government as a deficiency caused by improper or deficient appropriations made in years gone by. If it goes into this bill, it will so stand charged against us. I want it to stand as an independent proposition, and any resistance that I make to it should not be construed to appear as being antagonistic to the education of the children of the District. That suggestion I rise here to repel. Whenever it comes in a proper form and is put upon a proper basis, then I shall perhaps be found going as far as any other gentleman in doing what we ought to do in that direction.

Mr. DORSEY. I should like to have the Senator from Kentucky indicate what a proper form and what a proper basis is.

Mr. BECK. The proper form is to bring it as a bill from the proper committee asking us to make this loan. Is it a deficiency against this Government in any proper sense?

Mr. DORSEY. What is that question?

Mr. BECK. I ask the Senator from Arkansas if this $75,000 is a deficiency against this Government in any proper sense? Is it anything we have failed to appropriate heretofore?

Mr. DORSEY. It is a great deal nearer a deficiency than nearly one-half the items in this bill, and this is the only item that that point has been made against. We just passed an item of $300,000 that is not a deficiency at all, but belongs properly to the bill of this year. There was no point made by the Senator from Kentucky or by anybody else against that.

Mr. BECK. I made no point upon the advance of $300,000 to the Commissary-General of the Army, why? Because it was made apparent to us that if he was enabled now to purchase the supplies for next year and transport them up the Missouri River to the far-distant posts of the Northwest we could save a very large amount of money. Provisions can be carried in the months of May and June up the Missouri River for less than half what they can be carried up in August and September for. We therefore allowed out of next year's appropriation, and to be charged against it, the Commissary-General of the Army to begin to make his purchases now and transport those supplies now while he can transport them cheaply, instead of waiting till August, when he will have to pay more than double what he has to pay now. Hence I made no objection to that. On the contrary, I advised it as a proper thing to do in the interest of economy and for the purpose of supplying the Army when it could be done cheaply and well. That is a very different proposition from this. That ought to be always the law in regard to all these distant points. We ought never to require a postponement of purchases and the postponement of transportation to the season of the year when it costs most, when we can by anticipation send supplies at a period when it costs us least.

Mr. WINDOM. And I will add one paragraph to the Senator's speech, if he will allow me, by saying that we ought never to postpone contributing our fair proportion to the education of the children of this District, because next year we cannot supply the two months we shall lose this year. They will never have these two months again.

Mr. BECK. The District commissioners out of their funds can supply it. If they had seen fit they could have made a larger appropriation for the support of the schools than they did out of the taxes collected; but they failed to make as large an appropriation of the taxes collected for the support of the schools as they otherwise might have done, hoping to put this pressure upon us in this form. I do not propose to have them put this pressure on us in this shape when they could have removed it by making a larger appropriation and can remove it now if they see fit.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I think this item comes as near a deficiency as most of the items in the bill, and I want to call the attention of my friend from Kentucky to the fact that all legislation with reference to this District is now in our hands. We levy all the taxes and make all the appropriations. It is true that there is a certain discretionary power in the three commissioners in the distribution of the revenues; but the tax assessment of last year was $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on the property in the District, and the appropriations were, I do not remember what. But here is the government of a considerable city to be carried on, and certainly an important element in this government is the element of schools. The commissioners tell us that there is a deficiency in the amount necessary to carry on these schools amounting to \$75,000. If that be true, it seems to me there is an obligation resting upon us to make this appropriation in some form and at some time; and that time, as shown by the letter of the commissioners, is now, because if we postpone the time these schools must be closed and then the money will be useless. Although the amendment may not be strictly within the rules of the Senate in reference to deficiency bills, I think I can safely say to my friend from Kentucky that this is the best time for us to make the appropriation if we intend making it at all. If we do not, the schools will be closed. If we mean that, let the children and their parents understand it.

Mr. BECK. What prevents the District Committee bringing a bill before the Senate and spreading before us the facts and securing the action of the Senate?

Mr. ALLISON. We have agreed to adjourn to Monday, I understand.

Mr. BECK. Why can they not do it on Monday, giving two days to the Senate to consider and learn the facts?

Mr. ALLISON. And in the mean time the schools may be closed.

Mr. BECK. Not before Monday.

Mr. DORSEY. I supposed the Senator from Kentucky understood that the whole financial control of affairs in this District, the raising of revenue, the assessment of taxes, everything that goes to make up the management of the District government, is solely and only in the hands of Congress. The District commissioners estimate to Congress for what money they want and what they want it for, just as does any Department of the Government of the United States. While it is true that up to this time there has been no detailed estimate made by them and none required by Congress, it is just as true that they make regular estimates of the sums needed. I believe that since the act of 1874 appropriations of this kind have been made at every session of Congress. Last year, if I recollect aright, there was no objection at all to the advance of $75,000 being made, and on the collection of the taxes in July following it was returned to the United States. Now, this advance is required again in the same way, and it is just as necessary as it was two years ago and last year.

I call the attention of the Senator from Kentucky to the fact that the recommendation of the commissioners is dated November 1 in their report, and their letter is dated February 15 and the one to the House February 26, urging the importance of this appropriation. I hope there will be no further objection to it.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not stop to inquire whether this be a technical deficiency or not. It is sufficient for me that, without this advance on the part of the Government, all the public schools must be suspended; and considering the large amount of property which the Government owns in this city and the small contribution which it makes toward the expense of carrying on the local government and that the law requires the public schools to be established and facilities for education furnished the children, I have no hesitation in voting for the amendment.

Mr. BECK. I ask for the yeas and nays on this amendment. I desire to say that, whatever property the Government has, very much of it is held for the benefit of the citizens here, and the Government has no children to go to school.

Mr. MERRIMON. I move that the last words be stricken out: "not required for its actual expenses."

Mr. DORSEY. The daily current expenses of the District government have to be paid.

Mr. MERRIMON. The language of the amendment would make this appropriation an actual gift. I am content that this loan should be made now. At another time I shall want to call the subject of public schools in this District to the attention not only of the District of Columbia but of the Senate. It is very important that something should be done about them. Although the schools are very efficient, very excellent, very desirable for children to go to, they are in such a confused condition that something must be done or the nation will be overrun on the subject of education in the District of Columbia, everybody will want to educate his children here. I am willing that this loan shall be made, but not in such a way as to make it an actual gift, and those words at the end of the amendment amount practically to donating $75,000.

Mr. ALLISON. I trust the Senator from Arkansas will accept that amendment.

Mr. DORSEY. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from North Carolina is accepted by the Senator from Arkansas. The question is on the amendment as thus modified.

Mr. BECK. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BLAINE. The question is now on the amendment as amended by the suggestion of the Senator from North Carolina.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. BLAINE. I hope the Senator from Kentucky will not object to it in that form.

Mr. MERRIMON. It is now simply a loan.

Mr. BLAINE. Yes, I agree with the Senator from North Carolina in his amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky calls for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BAYARD. I understand that the amendment was not submitted to the committee and was not reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. DORSEY. The Senator from Delaware will allow me—

Mr. BAYARD. It was submitted but not reported; and while I think it should be decided upon its merits, there is nothing before the Senate to inform them of what those merits are. For that reason, as a question of regularity alone, I think this amendment should not be agreed to.

Mr. BLAINE. If the Senator from Delaware will permit me a moment, I think I can satisfy him on that point. The amendment was before the Committee on Appropriations and was considered and was debated pro and con. It was then agreed that it should go to the Committee on the District of Columbia for further and fuller investigation; and it is the chairman of that committee, who is also a member of the Committee on Appropriations, who has moved it to-day; so that the Committee on Appropriations have not treated the subject laxly and it comes here certainly through a very regular channel.

Mr. BECK. I desire to say to the Senators in charge of the bill that while it was submitted to the Committee on Appropriations, the question whether we would consider it or not was not taken; but none of the facts making the propriety or impropriety of the appropriation were considered. It was regarded as a matter that did not belong to the Committee on Appropriations, and as such was sent from our committee to the Committee on the District of Columbia, the idea being that the Committee on the District of Columbia ought to bring in an independent proposition and submit it to us with all the facts bearing upon it, and let the Senate consider it fully, and not tack it on a deficiency bill as a thing which the Government was by law compelled to provide for.

Mr. KERNAN. As I shall vote against this amendment as it stands I want to say in a word why I shall. There is no law which makes it proper strictly for the Committee on Appropriations to appropriate this money. It appears that last year we made an appropriation for these schools. Now why are we to go on from year to year making a donation for them so that we cannot get along without doing it?

Mr. SARGENT. It was not a donation, but a loan which has been repaid.

Mr. KERNAN. I am against a loan.

Mr. HILL. I ask the Senator can you make a loan in an appropriation bill?

Mr. KERNAN. I am against doing it.

Mr. SARGENT. You can do it in such a bill just as well as in any other bill.

Mr. KERNAN. I am against making a loan, because these schools are permanent institutions. There should be a bill brought in and the money should be provided for before the beginning of the year, and then we should know what the proper authorities have to spend. That would be a proper way of administering it. If they can come in here, without any report, without any facts, without anything showing why they want a loan this year, as they did last year, where is our check? Let a report be brought in, let a law somewhat permanent be made. Nothing is so dangerous to the Treasury as getting up and putting on appropriation bills something not called for by law, getting it through and having a start, going the next year and doing the same thing. I hope we shall vote it down. Let the proper committee bring in a proper bill giving us the requisite information, and if there is to be more money raised for the schools, let it be done in a proper way.

Mr. WINDOM. I want to state a single fact in reply to the Senator from Kentucky. I think he misunderstood the action of the committee; certainly he or I did. He states that the Committee on Appropriations referred this matter to the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, with the understanding that he should report a separate bill specifically for this purpose. That was not my understanding nor was it the understanding of the Senator in charge of the bill or of Senators near me; but the understanding was that it was referred to him because the Committee on the District of Columbia was supposed to be more conversant with the facts than we were, and that he should submit it to his committee, get their views about it, and report it as an amendment to this bill. I so understood it at least, and I think other members of the committee did.

Mr. BECK. It may have been the fact that he was to be allowed to report this amendment to this bill instead of a separate measure. I am not sure on that point; but at any rate the Committee on Appropriations declined to adopt it or report it themselves. Now, let me ask if there is a unanimous report of the Committee on the District of Columbia, or has this amendment been submitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia and have they directed the Senator from Arkansas as their chairman to report it now as an amendment to this bill?

Mr. DORSEY. Informally it has been submitted to them.

Mr. BECK. Informally!

Mr. DORSEY. Yes. I desire to correct what the Senator from Kentucky stated a few moments ago in respect to this amendment. It came before the Committee on Appropriations and I saw it there for the first time. My recollection is that a majority of that committee, and a very decided majority, were in favor of putting it on the appropriation bill by that committee; but at my request upon the statement which I made that the Committee on the District of Columbia had not heard of the necessity of the appropriation at all. I thought it was best it should go to that committee first, and at all events I should consult my colleagues on the District Committee and see if they agreed with me. It was agreed that I should do it. My recollection is that the Committee on Appropriations were very staunch about it. I do not remember that even the Senator from Kentucky objected to its passage.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I shall be compelled to vote against this amendment of the Senator from Arkansas because I have not any proper information to justify it. We have a District government here under the charge of commissioners. A certain amount of money is annually appropriated by Congress to carry on the government and provide for public schools.

Mr. DORSEY. I should like the Senator to point out what money is appropriated by Congress to carry on the government of the District.

Mr. SAULSBURY. There are large appropriations annually made for the various purposes of this District. I do not know anything about the management of the funds which are appropriated by Congress as well as the amounts raised by taxation upon the District. I do not know how this money is distributed, how it is appropriated, or how it is expended by the commissioners; but we are blindly every year making appropriations without the proper information upon that subject. My idea is that we ought to have a report from the Committee on the District of Columbia in reference to these matters before we make appropriations—a report showing what amount of money is required to carry on the District government and how it has been annually expended, so that we can have proper information before we are called upon to vote money in this way. The educational interests of this District ought to be cared for, and there ought to be the proper amount of money expended in that direction; but we do not know to-day whether these commissioners are having that money properly expended or not, we have no report from a committee on the subject.

Mr. DORSEY. The Senator will allow me to say that the report of the commissioners of the District shows in detail the disposition of every dollar of money they have, the same as the report of any other department of this Government. Here is their report lying before me. It has been on our desks all winter.

Mr. SAULSBURY. That is the report of the commissioners; but I say we ought to have a report from a committee of this body. None of the committees of this body have given us that information. We ought to have the commissioners' report verified by some report of a committee of this body. That is what I am speaking of; I say that we are acting here without information from any committee of this body. We have information from the commissioners, I know, the men who have spent the money; but we have no report that I know of from the Committee on the District of Columbia or any other committee that has investigated the subject and that can tell us the money has been properly expended. That is what I want. I want some committee of this body to inform us, after an investigation of the subject, whether the money put into the possession of these commissioners has been properly spent or not. The Senator refers to the report of the gentlemen who have expended the money; but so far as I know we have no authorized committee of this body that has given us the information which we ought to have on this subject.

Mr. DORSEY. If the Senate of the United States will direct the Committee on the District of Columbia to investigate the manner and mode of spending money by the District commissioners, and will give us power to send for persons and papers and hire accountants, we may report next year on that specific thing, for I suppose it will take a year; but so far as I know the Committee on the District of Columbia has no such power.

Mr. SAULSBURY. But the Senator from Arkansas, who is the chairman of that committee, comes in here without that information himself and takes the statement of the gentlemen who have expended the money, and upon their statement asks for an appropriation of $75,000. He ought to know and ought to inform this body that the committee has ascertained the facts, and that the appropriation is absolutely necessary and proper.

Mr. DORSEY. I have stated over and over again that the money asked for by these men in my belief is absolutely necessary to maintain these schools. I stated that to be the opinion of the Committee on the District of Columbia, every member of it. Now I should like to know, if we are not to take the statement of the commissioners who have charge of this matter, how are we going to ascertain anything about the subject? We take the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of the Interior, or any other public officer as to the necessities of his Department. We cannot go into the Treasury Department and see just what they need. We must take in these cases what the officers having charge of the subject estimate is needed to be done. They say they need these $75,000 to maintain the schools to the end of the fiscal year. I think they do. The best investigation we can give to it shows that they do. We have so stated.

Mr. HARRIS. I simply desire to say that, from such investigation as the Committee on the District of Columbia has made, that committee is perfectly satisfied, I expect every member of it, I am sure I am, of the necessity of these $75,000 to continue the public schools. I do not think there can be any question about that.

Mr. INGALLS. This amendment ought to pass; and there are two or three objections that have been urged against it which I want briefly to notice. One Senator objects to it because, as he says, it is a loan on the part of the United States Government toward the District. I deny it. The Government of the United States is under just exactly as much obligation to help keep up the schools of this District as it is to run the Treasury or the War Department. We have under the Constitution exclusive jurisdiction over this District. Congress has the legislative power. We make the appropriations. Every single dollar that these men expend is expended under the direct authority of Congress. And to come in here and talk about a loan to the District commissioners is an absolute misnomer; it is a misuse of terms. We have instituted a form of government under which taxes are laid and collected.

Mr. KERNAN. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. INGALLS. Certainly.

Mr. KERNAN. I did suppose at first it was a gift. When I said so I was corrected and told it was a loan last year and that this is a proposed loan.

Mr. INGALLS. It is no more a loan than it is a gift when we appropriate money for the Army.

Mr. KERNAN. The Senator from California set me right, and I said I did not propose to make loans.

Mr. INGALLS. We are under obligation, having assumed to exercise authority over this District, to see that the functions of civilization are carried out here, and education is one of them. It is no more a loan to the people of this District than it is a loan to the people of the United States to appropriate for the Army or the Navy, and the argument that is based against this amendment on the ground that it is a loan is entirely without foundation.

Again, another Senator objects that this is not properly a deficiency. Why was not that objection made to more than three-fourths of all the appropriations made in this bill? I have marked for the purpose of reference several items that I see incorporated, and it will be found upon investigation that of all the money appropriated in this bill more than three-fourths is in no sense whatever a deficiency; the items are original appropriations, or else they are advances made for the purpose of enabling the various Departments of this Government to exist until the close of the fiscal year.

Still another Senator objects because this amendment has not been reported by some appropriate committee. Why did not that Senator object that the appropriation made of $300,000 for the War Department was not reported from the Military Committee? Why was it not objected that the appropriations for the Navy Department were not reported from the Naval Committee? It seems to be very essential whenever any appropriation is asked for the District that every conceivable obstacle should be thrown in the way of it. Gentlemen are able to vote for hundreds of thousands of dollars without making any objection at all, but the moment an appropriation is asked for the District of Columbia for carrying on the public schools every technicality is to be resorted to to defeat it. I am surprised that these objections should be made in the face of the character of the appropriations that are contained in this bill. No one who is familiar, as every member of the District Committee is, with the wants of the educational department of this District will deny that there is a great, pressing exigency confronting us, and it certainly makes no difference to Congress whether this appropriation of $75,000 is made now or at a subsequent time if it is necessary, and there is exactly the same ground for believing it to be necessary that there is for believing in the necessity of every other appropriation that has been made in this bill.

Mr. BLAINE. I wish to make a practical suggestion to my friend from Kentucky. He suggests that we have a separate bill brought in here, and discuss it, and send it to the House. I believe that parliamentary propriety forbids that we shall speak of what has taken place in the House, but we are allowed to speculate on what may take place. You send a separate bill there and it goes to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on a point of order, and that sends it to the foot of the Calendar. Do not let us delude ourselves with the idea that we can give this relief, if we intend to give it, in any other way than that proposed, because it would amount to nothing; the fiscal year will be ended and the schools closed, and any disaster that is to happen will be over and accomplished before we can possibly reach relief in the channel suggested by my friend from Kentucky. Do not let us delude ourselves with that idea.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, I should be the last man to appropriate, or loan, or advance, or anticipate a dollar without a necessity. It does appear to the Committee on the District of Columbia informally that unless this amendment shall prevail or an appropriation of $75,000 shall be made, the public schools in this District will be closed on the 1st of May next for the current year. But this amendment is not an appropriation; it is not in a proper sense a loan; it simply anticipates $75,000 of the appropriation that will be made to administer the government in the District of Columbia for the next year. That is all. It is the mere anticipation of $75,000 of the money.

It is not out of place for me to say as one member of the Committee on the District of Columbia that, so far as I can see, there is no reason to question the integrity of the present commissioners or of those who have in charge the conduct of the public schools. I am very sure that if I saw anything squinting at it I should be among the first to condemn it. I have no reason to believe that any of the money appropriated for the administration of the government has been stolen or diverted to an illegitimate purpose. The money appropriated is not sufficient to administer the government until the end of the year, and one of the purposes for which $75,000 is needed is the one that has been indicated in connection with this amendment. The amendment, I repeat, is not an appropriation. It simply anticipates $75,000 of the money that will be appropriated for the administration of the District government the next year, and therefore I shall vote for it.

Mr. BECK. As it seems I made the principal objection to this amendment, I desire to say again that in making the opposition that I do I am not going into the merits of the question at all, nor do I desire to be set down as a person objecting to aiding the District of Columbia in the education of its children; but I do insist, as the Senator from North Carolina very well said, that this is in no sense a debt owing by the Government, in no sense a deficiency which in this bill we ought to provide for. It is either a gift or a loan, and the Committee on the District of Columbia have failed to make any report to this body showing how the money heretofore appropriated for school purposes has been expended. The deficiency may exist; but it would exist equally as well if every dollar of the appropriation has been pocketed, as many million dollars have been pocketed heretofore in the management of this District as it exists now.

Mr. DORSEY. Allow me to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. BECK. Of course.

Mr. DORSEY. The Senator says that the Committee on the District of Columbia have failed to make a report to this body of how the money has been expended that has been appropriated heretofore. I should like to ask the Senator if the Committee on Military Affairs, the Committee on Finance, or the other committees of this body make a report to the Senate of how money appropriated for the different Departments of the Government has been expended?

Mr. BECK. I will answer that question. Whenever an appropriation bill comes up from the War Department, the Navy Department, the Treasury Department, the Interior Department, or any other Department of this Government, the Committees on Appropriations of the House and Senate send for the chiefs of the various bureaus, send for the men who expend the money, and require them to show what is the necessity for a deficiency, how the money was expended, and to state all the facts. If this had been a matter that came properly before the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate, the commissioners of the District would have been sent for, the amount of money they had paid to the teachers, the amount they had expended for this, that, and the other would have been inquired into and the Senate would have had intelligent information as to the necessity for this $75,000. And will the Senator from Arkansas ask me how we know that a deficiency is proper in any of the Departments of the Government? I answer him by saying what he ought to know very well, that we invariably send for the Secretary of the Treasury or his assistants, for the Secretary of War or his assistants, for the Secretary of the Navy or of the Interior, or the Postmaster-General, and each member of every Department of the Government who knows anything, to tell us why this necessity exists, so that we can advise the Senate of the facts. When the District commissioners come properly before the Committees on Appropriations of the House and Senate, the members of these two committees will come very far short of their duty if they do not require the commissioners to tell why this deficiency exists so that they can intelligently advise the Senate and House why it should be provided for. It is because they have failed to do so, because the Committee on the District of Columbia have not the facts as to how the money was expended, that I object to the amendment.

It is said they have no power to send for persons and papers. When these commissioners come and say to that committee, "We desire you to give us $75,000," it is the duty of the committee to say, "Why is this necessary? Give us the facts. How have you expended the money which has been already given you? How have you expended the money you have collected from the tax-payers?" and then come before the Senate and tell how the money that has been appropriated for the schools has already been expended; and until they do that they do not come before the Senate in a proper shape to demand either gifts or loans.

Mr. ROLLINS. The difference between the case the Senator states and this is that in this specific case the school board came before the Committee on the District of Columbia without having been summoned and stated very distinctly what their wants were, and satisfied the committee, every member of it, so far as I know, that the $75,000 here asked for was absolutely necessary to conduct the public schools in this city; and, if I am correctly informed, they have not money sufficient even to continue the schools until the 1st of May.

Mr. BECK. Let me ask the Senator from New Hampshire, did these commissioners lay before the Committee on the District of Columbia all the facts relative to the expenditures they had made? Were they asked upon that subject? Was this question ever investigated by the committee so as to enable an intelligent report to be made by the Committee on the District of Columbia as to the facts bearing on it?

Mr. ROLLINS. The Committee on the District of Columbia devoted several hours at different meetings of the committee to a thorough investigation of this matter, as thorough as they could make in time, and were satisfied that this $75,000 was needed. All were of the that opinion.

Mr. DORSEY. Mr. President, it is scarcely worth while for the Senator from Kentucky to inquire whether the Committee on the District of Columbia have investigated this matter as they should. If they had not investigated it as they thought they ought, they would not have reported it to the Senate and asked the passage of the amendment. But I can inform the Senator from Kentucky that I have had occasion with him, on a committee of which we are members, to investigate a great many matters of this kind, and I venture to say that this one item of $75,000 has been investigated more thoroughly than items of three or four millions that have passed the committee which he and I are on, that neither one of us know much about it except from what one or two men tell us.

Mr. BECK. The committee on which the Senator from Arkansas and myself serve, so far as I am concerned—I cannot speak for him and how much he knows—does not act upon any such matter until it is informed by the men who ought to be able to tell all about it, what the necessity is, and I doubt whether any Senator can rise in his place and ask some member of that Committee on Appropriations as to why these appropriations are made, without receiving a full and intelligent answer.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like the Senator from Kentucky, who is a member of the Committee on Appropriations, to tell me the particular necessity of the amendment on page 10 of this bill between lines 224 and 230.

Mr. BECK. I can answer that question.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Kentucky has insisted that the Committee on the District of Columbia were not able to furnish sufficiently definite and authentic information in regard to this matter. Now I want to know from the Senator from Kentucky, as a member of the Committee on Appropriations, what was the particular necessity for the amendment on page 10, between the lines that I have named, and whether or not that is a deficiency or an original appropriation.

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator be kind enough to read what it is?

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator can read, I suppose.

Mr. BECK. But I do not want to read all of page 10.

Mr. INGALLS. Between lines 224 and 230.

Mr. BLAINE. I will say, before the Senator from Kentucky goes into that, that the Senator from Kansas has struck the Senator from Kentucky on the particular part of the bill which he is entirely posted on. [Laughter.]

Mr. BECK. Will the Clerk be kind enough to read a letter that I send to the desk?

Mr. INGALLS. I do not want to hear any letters read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky has the floor.

Mr. BECK. I have the floor and I will proceed in my own way.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Kentucky is not answering what I asked him. He now asks to have a letter read.

Mr. BLAINE. I have the documents on the question referred to, but I do not want to let them loose to detain the Senate; but I desire to say to the Senator from Kansas and to the whole Senate that the Senator from Kentucky enlightened the committee on it to the minutest minnow that will ever go into that pond. [Laughter.]

Mr. INGALLS. I think that statement is very fishy, but I shall not carp at it. [Laughter.]

Mr. BECK. I do not care to be catechised; I want the Clerk to be kind enough to read the recommendation of Colonel Casey, of the Engineer Corps, on this subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will read the communication called for.

The Chief Clerk commenced to read a letter from Colonel T. L. Casey.

Mr. CHAFFEE. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. BECK. I do not yield the floor.

Mr. CHAFFEE. I rise to a point of order; that is not the question before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky has the floor, and the Senator from Colorado rises to a point of order which is overruled. The Senator can appeal if he chooses.

Mr. BECK. The Clerk need not read the communication; but I will answer the Senator from Kansas. I think I can give an intelligent answer as to that part of the bill. The amendment to which he calls attention is:

To complete the work of adapting the ponds in the Monument lot, in the city of Washington, to the culture of carp for distribution throughout the United States, to be done by the engineer in charge of public buildings and grounds, according to the plans of the United States fish commission, $2,200, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be available immediately.

The United States appointed a fish commission years ago; they have been stocking the waters of the country everywhere with fish, as every Senator knows. As a part of their duty they sent a ship over to Germany, a United States ship, and they laid in a supply of carp of the most approved species to be placed everywhere in every pond in the United States, hot and cold, for raising food-fishes. They have placed them at Druid Hill Park, Baltimore, and they are there in great numbers. Last fall an appropriation of $5,000 was made to adapt some useless ponds in what is known as the Babcock lot, under the charge of Professor Baird and Colonel Casey, so as to cultivate and raise that fish so that they could distribute it all over the United States. The items making up this $2,200 were carefully considered by this colonel of engineers and are necessary to finish the work so as to make a complete establishment for that purpose, and therefore it was inserted. The more that is investigated the better satisfied every Senator will be that it is a proper thing to do. It can be done now for a very small amount of money, because the pond is drained dry and the bottom all put in shape for the purpose of doing what is necessary, and all that is required is for the Senator from Kansas to go and see it and he will be more enthusiastic for it than perhaps any member of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. INGALLS. It appears by the statement of the Senator from Kentucky that this is not a deficiency, that it is an original appropriation, and that he is entirely willing to spend thousands of dollars to cultivate fish, but not to expend money to educate the young of this District.

Mr. BECK. That is extremely smart. No doubt it was so intended to be; and I thank very much the member of the Committee on Appropriations, whoever he was, for informing the Senator from Kansas that this was the only thing in the bill that was perhaps suggested by myself after I and other members of the committee had made a careful investigation of the whole subject, personally examined each item of it, seen the officer of engineers, and seen Professor Baird, and consulted with them.

Mr. INGALLS. And seen the fish.

Mr. BECK. Not every fish, but examined every fact.

The question being taken by yeas and nays on the amendment of Mr. DORSEY, resulted—yeas 29, nays 22; as follows:

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR DETECTING TRESPASSES, ETC.

Mr. WINDOM submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3102) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to employ temporary clerks, and making an appropriation for the same; also making appropriations for detecting trespass on public lands, and for bringing into market public lands in certain States, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments numbered 1 and 4.

And that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 2 and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: in lieu of "twenty thousand" insert "six thousand five hundred;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 3, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: in lieu of the sum proposed insert "one thousand dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered five, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: in lieu of "fifteen thousand," in lines 4 and 5 of said amendment, insert "seven thousand five hundred," and in lieu of "five thousand," in line 7, insert "seven thousand five hundred;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the committee are unable to agree upon amendments numbered 7 and 8.

WM. WINDOM,
S. W. DORSEY,
JAS. B. BECK,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
M. J. DURHAM,
JAMES H. BLOUNT,
J. H. BAKER,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask the attention of the Senate for one moment that I may state precisely the attitude of the two Houses as represented by their committees on this subject. I will mention the items that are agreed to and the two about which we disagreed.

The House appropriated $6,500 for the employment of temporary clerks in the Treasury Department during the balance of the fiscal year, and limited the compensation to $2 per day. The Senate amended by appropriating $20,000 for that purpose and striking out the limitation as to $2 per day. The recommendation of the conference is that the House recede from its limitation as to the price per day, and that the Senate agree to the amount appropriated by the House, $6,500.

The third amendment was for the "care and subsistence of horses for office and mail wagons, including feeding and shoeing, and for wagons, harness, and repairs of the same, being a deficiency for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, $2,000," for the Treasury Department. The conference committee recommends that the sum be made $1,000.

The fourth amendment of the Senate appropriates $2,500, being a deficiency for gas, drop-lights, &c. From that disagreeing vote the House recede, so that we agree upon that also.

Another question which was very much discussed, as the Senate will remember, was with reference to the amount for the investigation of trespasses on public lands. The original proposition of the House was "for diagrams, furniture, repairs," and several other items mentioned, including "the actual expenses of clerks detailed to investigate fraudulent land entries," $20,000. The Senate will remember that after a very long discussion it was compromised here by $15,000 being appropriated for all the other purposes and $5,000 for the investigation of trespasses. The committee of conference recommended a change of these sums as follows: $7,500 for all other purposes and $7,500 for investigation of trespasses, making a total of $15,000, instead of $20,000, as the bill passed the House.

The two propositions upon which we disagree are the following:

Amendment No. 7:

For salaries and expenses of collectors of internal revenue, being a deficiency for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, $40,000.

The eighth amendment:

For railway mail agents and postal clerks, $30,000.

With reference to "railway mail agents and postal clerks," the committee representing the Senate proposed in the spirit of compromise to meet the House half way and agree to $10,000 instead of $20,000, but the proposition was rejected. The Senate committee did not feel at liberty to yield any further on this proposition, for the reason that the Committee on Appropriations was voted down by the Senate (34 to 19) when the proposition was on its passage. We did not feel at liberty to go into the conference and give up the entire amount. The Committee on Appropriations, I believe, unanimously voted against this proposition when it was offered in the Senate, not because they were opposed to the appropriation, but because it had not been submitted to the committee, as required by the rules. But after the Senate, by a vote of 34 to 19, appropriated $20,000 for the purpose upon the statements made by various Senators on the floor of the absolute necessity for this increase of mail service, the committee representing the Senate have carefully investigated the subject, and are thoroughly convinced that the sum named, or at least a portion of it, should be appropriated.

I have before me a letter from the Postmaster-General, which is very brief, stating that the necessity set forth in a former communication for this appropriation still exists, "and it is actually necessary that some provision be made for the service on new railroad and steamboat routes that are being constantly established. There are a number of routes at present upon which service should be placed." And here follows a detailed statement of the sums appropriated heretofore for this service and of the necessity for the proposed appropriation. Upon that statement, and other facts brought to their notice, your committee believe the appropriation is an absolute necessity and that the service will seriously suffer if some provision be not made. I will ask leave without reading this statement in full to have it printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, it will be so ordered.

The document is as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., March 23, 1878.

SIR: In answer to your inquiry, I would say that a letter accompanied by statement of the general superintendent of railway mail service was transmitted to the chairman of House Committee on Appropriations.

The necessity set forth in this still exists, and it is actually necessary that some provision be made for the service on new railroad and steamboat routes that are being constantly established. There are a number of routes at present upon which service should be placed.

Very respectfully,

D. M. KEY,
Postmaster-General.

Hon. P. B. PLUMB,
United States Senate.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., February 28, 1878.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a statement made by the general superintendent of railway mail service regarding the standing and necessities of the postal service on railroad and steamboat routes.

In order that the necessary force for the distribution of the mails may be placed on these routes some additional appropriation is necessary. I would therefore recommend that there be transferred from the appropriation for star service (which is ample) the sum of $30,000 for the payment of employees for the distribution of the mails on railroad and steamboat routes.

Very respectfully,

D. M. KEY,
Postmaster-General.

Hon. JOHN D. C. ATKINS,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations.

SIR: The Postmaster-General recommended in his annual report for 1876 that the appropriation for the year ending June 30, 1878, for employees in this service should be as follows:

Railway post-office clerks.....	$1,255,440 00
Route agents.....	1,071,000 00
Mail-route messengers.....	161,175 00
Local agents.....	114,450 00

This was based on the salaries prevailing prior to July, 1876.

The appropriation made by Congress was as follows:

Railway post-office clerks.....	1,225,000 00
Less than the estimate.....	130,000 00
Route agents.....	1,000,000 00
Less than the estimate.....	71,000 00
Mail-route messengers.....	150,000 00
Less than the estimate.....	11,175 00
Local agents.....	110,000 00
Less than the estimate.....	4,450 00

During the year ending June 30, 1877, there was expended for this class of service the following amounts:

Railway post-office clerks.....	$1,223,509 41
Appropriation for same period.....	1,223,000 00
Surplus to be turned into the Treasury July 1, 1877.....	1,430 59
Route agents.....	959,600 88
Appropriation for same period.....	972,500 00
Surplus to be turned into Treasury July 1, 1877.....	12,839 14
Mail-route messengers.....	147,508 61
Appropriation for same period.....	5,901 39
Surplus to be turned into Treasury July 1, 1877.....	105,714 70
Local agents.....	109,000 00
Appropriation for same period.....	4,282 30
Surplus to be turned into Treasury July 1, 1877.....

The appropriation for the year ending June, 1878, over those for the year ending June, 1877, are as follows:

	Appropriation for 1877.	Appropriation for 1878.	Increase.	Decrease.
Railway post-office clerks.....	$1,225,000	$1,225,000
Route agents.....	972,500	1,000,000	$27,500
Mail-route messengers.....	153,500	150,000		$3,500
Local agents.....	109,000	110,000	1,000

The expenses for the year ending June, 1877, were affected by the discontinuance of the railway postal service on the different trunk-lines between New York, Buffalo, and Chicago, and New York, Pittsburgh, Saint Louis, and Cincinnati. When the postal cars were withdrawn it was possible to reduce, and the force was reduced very largely. This state of affairs existed until December of the same year, when the Department succeeded in obtaining from the line from New York, via Pittsburgh, to Saint Louis and Cincinnati, the restoration of the postal facilities in part, which was gradually improved until July 1, 1877. The service over those lines was far superior to anything the Department had ever obtained from that company.

Of course the increased facilities demanded an increase of the force.

Since December, 1877, additional service was also placed on the trunk-lines connecting the different sections of the country, all calling for increase of force to handle the mails.

Prior to June 30, 1877, it was necessary to reduce the force, which was done by not filling vacancies as they occurred, so that on June 30 and October 1, 1877, the service stood as follows:

Statement of amount necessary to pay the force in the service as it stood June 30 and October 1, 1877.

	June 30, 1877.	October 1, 1877
Railway post-office clerks.....	$1,228,600	$1,223,000
Route agents.....	982,541	1,000,150
Mail-route messengers.....	162,006	150,452
Local agents.....	105,530	110,000

The increase in the amount necessary to pay those in the service October 1 is due to the fact that after the commencement of the present fiscal year the vacancies which had been left unfilled prior to June 30, or a portion of them, were filled, as it was absolutely necessary for the proper performance of the service that they should be. But in no case has a vacancy been filled where under any circumstances, the service of the agent could be dispensed with.

Each superintendent of a division has been called upon for a statement as to the possible reduction. It is impossible to increase the service now without increasing the force.

The balance turned into the Treasury on the 1st of July was as follows:

Railway post-office clerks.....	$1,430 59
Route agents.....	12,839 14
Mail-route messengers.....	5,901 39
Local agents.....	4,282 30

Total.....24,453 42

Very few promotions have been made for the past six months, owing to deficient appropriations. Those who are acting in superior positions are becoming discouraged at having to do a class of work for which they do not receive pay, and, not fully understanding the reasons, give vent to their opinions in a way which at times leads to demoralization in the service.

There are about forty names for promotion which should be acted upon, and will be as soon as the appropriation will admit of the same.

This involves an average expenditure of $150 each, or $6,000.

Appropriations should be made, therefore, as follows:

20 railway post-office clerks, at $1,000.....	$20,000
10 route agents, at $50.....	5,000
40 mail-route messengers, at $700.....	28,000
5 local agents, at $1,000.....	5,000
40 promotions, at $150.....	6,000
Total.....	68,000

As one-half of the year is passed, the appropriation need be but one-half of the above amount, or $34,250.

If the appropriation should be made in bulk, to be applied at the discretion of the Postmaster-General, a considerably less sum would answer the purpose.

It is impossible to state in advance the exact demands of the service; as these divisions are merely technical, no advantage is gained by keeping them. If the appropriation was made in bulk, $30,000 would probably be sufficient. Of this, $16,000 has already been appropriated.

That, however, was just about sufficient to make up the amount paid out during the previous quarters, in excess of the pro rata share for those quarters, and avoided the necessity of reducing the force, so that the payments would come within the appropriation.

Very respectfully,

General Superintendent.

To Hon. D. M. KEY,
Postmaster-General.

Mr. WINDOM. Let me add one other word to show that there is no extravagance in this matter, and that it is not true, as has been stated, that this service has been unduly increased. I read from a recent report on the "railway mail service":

The service annually performed by railway post-office clerks has increased 11.10 per cent. The annual expenditure has decreased .01 per cent.

The service annually performed by route agents and mail-route messengers has increased 13.85 per cent. The expenditure for route agents and mail-route messengers has increased 2.01 per cent., and 3.02 per cent., respectively.

The increase in annual mileage service performed does not indicate fully the increased work performed by the employees of the railway mail service.

As it is well known the railway post-office service is of comparatively recent origin. The work formerly performed in post-offices at distributing centers has been gradually assumed by the railway post-office lines as the system has been perfected until now no distribution is made at any post-office except for the lines immediately centering at that post-office. The balance of the mail is massed on some line of railway post-office which directly connects the section for which the mail is destined and distributed while in transit.

It will be observed from these portions of the report that the service has increased very much more rapidly than the appropriations to supply it with mail agents, postal clerks, &c. Several thousand miles have been added to the railway service, but no considerable addition made to the appropriations for supplying them with route agents and railway clerks. I think it is the testimony of Senators from all the new States that the service is now seriously suffering for want of some additional appropriation for this service. The Postmaster-General informs us that he cannot supply it. I am told by several Senators that the mails are not properly taken care of in their States because of this want of appropriation, and therefore the conferees on the part of the Senate, believing it to be an absolute necessity, have declined to strike out the amendment proposed by the Senate.*

The other disagreeing vote is upon the following amendment:

For salaries and expenses of collectors of internal revenue, being a deficiency for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, $40,000.

The amount appropriated last year for that purpose was some $40,000 less than the computations and estimates showed would be necessary for the payment of this service. It is now ascertained that it is absolutely necessary. The first conference committee agreed to strike out this item because another bill was then pending before the Committee on Appropriations, (the bill which has been passed by the Senate to-day,) in which this provision could be inserted if it was ascertained that we had improperly stricken it out. The question came up in this way: the bill passed by the Senate to-day contained an appropriation of $40,000 for gaugers and others, in the following words:

For salaries, expenses, and fees of storekeepers, agents, surveyors, gaugers, and miscellaneous expenses, $40,000.

The Senate has to-day increased this appropriation to $100,000, and I will say that before the end of the year when some one of the numerous deficiency bills comes before us—for deficiency bills at this session are very much like the poor, we have them always with us—we shall doubtless be compelled to add $50,000 more for this purpose. The conferees on the part of the House insisted that this appropriation for salaries and expenses of collectors of internal revenue was the same appropriation that was contained in the other bill for salaries, expenses, fees, &c., of storekeepers and gaugers. The Committee on Appropriations understood perfectly well, and so did the conferees on the part of the Senate, that they were just as distinct propositions as any contained in the bill. They have always been kept distinct. The deficiency is in each of these items. In order to be prepared with the statements to satisfy the Senate on that point they called before them the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. He has stated, as we knew he would, that they were entirely different propositions, and that a deficiency existed in both cases. I also addressed a telegram to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue yesterday, asking information with reference to the necessity for the passage of this appropriation of $40,000. I will ask the Clerk to read his reply.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[From Treasury Department.]

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., April 10, 1878.

To Hon. WILLIAM WINDOM,
United States Senate:

In reply to your dispatch asking information as to the necessity of an appropriation of $40,000 for collectors, &c., I have to say that the present appropriation is virtually exhausted, no more of it being available for the employment of deputy collectors for the enforcement of the laws against those engaged in the illicit manufacture of spirits and tobacco. The necessity for increasing the regular force for the purpose named is urgent and pressing, and in my opinion the revenues will be protected more than twenty-fold for the outlay.

Very respectfully,

GREEN B. RAUM, Commissioner.

Mr. WINDOM. If the appropriation is not made, I presume there will be no deficiency hereafter to provide for, as the officers will be dismissed, and the revenues will lose, as the Commissioner informs us, twenty-fold more than the appropriation required to protect them.

I think I shall not weary the Senate with any further statement on this point. I move that the Senate agree to the report of the conference committee and further insist upon its disagreeing votes as to the seventh and eighth amendments of the Senate.

Mr. BECK. I was a member of each of these conference committees, and I would like to say a word in addition to what has been said by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. When we first met with the House conferees, we agreed on all the points of difference except to striking out the $20,000 for the postal service, and we offered to reduce that from $20,000 to $10,000. The Senate will remember that that was an amendment inserted in the Senate on the motion of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] against the wishes of the Committee on Appropriations by a vote of 34 to 19 on a call of the yeas and nays. I believe each member of the Committee on Appropriations objected to its being added to the bill in that form until we had an opportunity to examine it. But having been so inserted by such a vote, the conferees on the part of the Senate did not feel at liberty to give way or do more than to offer the compromise of one-half and call it $10,000. That the House conferees refused to agree to, and on that the first conference broke up. At that time, as stated by the chairman of the committee, the House conferees believing there was a mistake in the recommendations of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue as to the $40,000 for collectors and the $150,000 asked by him for the payment of storekeepers, gaugers, and others, and having inserted $40,000 for gaugers, storekeepers, and others, in another bill, which was the bill acted on in the Senate to-day, we conceded that there might be a mistake, knowing that if there was any we could correct in the other bill. Therefore we gave way upon that item at that time, knowing that we might correct it if it turned out that we were right as we had no doubt we were. By the time the second conference was ordered, the bill containing the appropriation of $40,000 for gaugers and others for which $150,000 was asked by the Commissioner had passed beyond our jurisdiction as a committee and we had no further power to insert the item of $40,000 for collectors in the other bill, so when the second conference met, we assured the conferees on the part of the House that they were mistaken in supposing that those two items were the same or for purposes at all alike. We read them a communication from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue; we read them a telegram from him. We had him before us, a full explanation of it all, and he assured us and satisfied us that the items were separate and distinct in their character, because, as to the $40,000 for collectors and their assistants, which he said was an absolute necessity and must be given now, that was under his control and part of the administration of his office, whereas the amount demanded, $150,000 for gaugers, storekeepers, and others, were things over which he had no control. They had always been estimated for separately, had always been appropriated for separately, in short were totally independent things, the gaugers, storekeepers, and others being provided for by law and he being required to place one in each distillery when it was opened, and he could not of course tell in advance how many distilleries would be opened. Whenever a man applied for one, he had to make an appointment of a gauger and a storekeeper, and the law regulated the rate of compensation and the number that must be allowed. He asked for the increase of appropriation to make it certain that he would be ready under the law to furnish storekeepers, gaugers, and others, as required. He asked for the amount of $150,000 more than had been appropriated. Congress in its wisdom saw fit to give $200,000 less than he estimated for.

Mr. SARGENT. How does it affect the revenue to have these storekeepers?

Mr. BECK. It affects the revenue thus, that if he sees fit to say, "I have no money to pay storekeepers and gaugers," the distillery cannot be opened, the spirits cannot be distilled, the business cannot be conducted, and the Government gets no revenue. That is the whole of that. If, however, he says to those gentlemen, "I have no money to pay you, but if you will trust the Government and go to work the law fixes your pay," then it is a valid claim against the Government which can be brought up in the Court of Claims, I suppose, or anywhere else—the Commissioner has the power under the law to appoint them even if we make no provision for their pay. But that is a very improper thing to do; and all that is left for us to do is to give such a sum as when the distilleries are opened will enable the Commissioner to employ the services of the officers whom the law requires shall be employed, so that spirits may be produced and the revenue may continue to come in.

As to both these items the Commissioner of Internal Revenue furnishes a statement in his report for this year at page 40. He says: The allowances for the current fiscal year on account of salaries of collectors, &c., have been made with a view of not creating a deficiency. The appropriation, however, is inadequate for a proper enforcement of the internal-revenue laws. I therefore recommend a deficiency appropriation of $40,000 on this account. The appropriation for salaries and expenses of agents and surveyors, for fees and expenses of gangers, for salaries of storekeepers, and for miscellaneous expenses, I am satisfied is entirely inadequate to the necessities of the service. The amount to be paid to gangers and storekeepers is dependent upon the operations of the distilleries of the country; and the experience of past years warrants me in saying that the deficiency on this account for the current fiscal year will be $150,000.

He repeats that statement to us again to-day, showing in his report that they were different, $40,000 for one purpose and $150,000 for the other, insisting that he had made no estimate to create a deficiency and will not do so. He will let the service suffer first, and he will dismiss the necessary officers rather than create it; but when he does do that the Government will lose millions. The Commissioner has shown no disposition at any time to be extravagant or to do anything except to obey the law and to see that the law relative to this branch of the revenue and in employing storekeepers, &c., is so administered as to protect the revenues of the Government and at the same time protect all the men who are engaged in the business.

The people in my State are largely engaged in distilling spirits, because we raise large quantities of corn and other things that we cannot carry to market in any other form. It is as much for the protection of the honest distillers against the men who are conducting what is called moonshine business that they may be detected and punished and prevented from that illicit distillation as for the Government; indeed it is more on their account. They cannot pay ninety cents a gallon tax on distilled spirits and compete with men who make the spirits and pay nothing. Therefore the present Commissioner, while protecting the revenue, is also protecting the honest manufacturers all over the country. If Congress sees fit to deprive him of the power to do that by withholding the means necessary, indispensably necessary, to do it, the manufacturers, the Government, everybody who is honestly engaged in the business or desires the Government to receive revenue must suffer.

Therefore the Senate conferees could not, with the full information that we had upon that subject, recede from that amendment thus inserted in the face of such a demand from an honest and efficient officer who is at the head of that bureau and who as the members of both Houses must agree is endeavoring to do the best he can to protect the revenue and to protect the honest manufacturer. We thought it was better to disagree and report the fact to the Senate than to agree to strike it out under such circumstances and ask that the Senate sustain us in our disagreement and give the House an opportunity to reconsider their action, hoping that after having the full information they would agree and allow Mr. Raum to have the force necessary for that purpose of properly discharging his great trust, for it is an extremely important and delicate one, and confidence must be reposed somewhere. I think the present Commissioner is entitled to it.

As to the mail agents, the Senate voted for that, as I said, by a ye and nay vote of 34 to 10, and we did not feel at liberty to come before the Senate and say, "We have abandoned the only thing that you did impose upon us; we have given you away because the Senate disagreed with us." A decent respect for the Senate required us to report to Senators that we were not willing to give up more than half of what they had imposed on us, even to make an honest effort to compromise. We could not with propriety strike it all out, and therefore we have reported a disagreement.

I desire to say, in addition, that upon all the other items of the bill we accepted what the House had done in general terms. Wherever they asked us to reduce an appropriation we reduced it. We cut down the appropriation of $20,000 for extra clerks to the $6,000 or $8,000 that the House had given for that purpose. It is true we said, "We will not reduce the pay to $2 a day to men; if we are to have clerks at all we desire to have clerks of some intelligence, and they cannot be had for that; it will hardly pay their board." When the argument was made that these temporary clerks were only employed to answer questions put by members of Congress, or during the sessions of Congress to give information, the answer came very properly from our side that the information that Congress needs is information of the most important possible character, and it requires the very highest order of intelligence to examine and prepare it, so that whatever is given for that purpose ought to be for intelligent men.

I have in my hand now information that I desired relative to all the custom-houses of the United States, showing how much is collected in each one, what are the expenses of each, what are the rents of each. There are one hundred and thirty-six of them, and not two-dollar-a-day clerks that we could pick up on the streets to work for less than would pay their board could in a year learn enough to have given me the information I asked for and obtained. I have also before me a specimen of what we require which it requires experienced clerks and intelligent ones to furnish, it being an abstract of the tariff bill which was presented to the House the other day. It being very short I should like the consent of the Senate to have it printed in the RECORD, that the Senate may see that it requires the very highest order of intelligence to furnish information to Congress and to individual members; therefore we said we will not agree even as to this small amount to cut down the pay so as to have only inferior clerks. Let the Secretary employ efficient men when he employs any.

The following is the table referred to:

Summary statement by schedules of the amount of duty received from the articles enumerated in House bill No. 4106, reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, March 26, 1878, that entered into consumption in the United States during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1877, and the estimated amount of duty by the proposed bill, with the increase and decrease of each schedule.

Schedule.	Class or group.	Amount of duty—		Increase.	Decrease.
		Received in 1877.	Estimated (New rates.)
A	Cotton and cotton goods.	$6,554,819 89	$4,553,359 63	$2,001,460 26

Upon the whole, the bill outside of the last item giving clerks to carry on the Pension Bureau was $1,500 less than it was as it came from the House in the first place, leaving out the items we disagreed about; so that there has been no extravagance on the part of the Senate.

I merely desire to say that I hope the Chair will appoint three other gentlemen of the Senate to confer with the committee to be appointed by the House, for I think three who have been twice appointed have exhausted their usefulness in this regard.

It is a very bad beginning for conferences if upon a question so small as this and as plain as this we cannot agree. If this condition of things be maintained I see nothing but a session all summer, or an extra session, by reason of the failure of the appropriation bills. Perhaps the Senate may be able to stand it as well as the House. We have no contests for re-election this fall that I know of at this end of the Capitol, but it might be quite inconvenient for gentlemen at the other end to come back under existing circumstances. Nor do I admit that the House committee has any more right to inaugurate appropriations than the Senate committee. Revenue bills must originate there, but appropriation bills may and can originate here as well as in the House. Nor is there any presumption, which is sometimes indulged in elsewhere, that the members of the House committee are necessarily more economical or more careful of public rights than the Senate committee. I insist that each is equally careful, that each stands upon an equal footing, and each has equal rights. If there is to be a free and fair conference there must be giving and taking, or else there will be no bills passed.

So far as I shall be a member of any committee of conference I do not propose to treat upon any other terms except by admitting and insisting upon free and full conference, assuming each to be equally desirous to promote the good of the country, each equally desirous to be economical. But, as I stated, if we disagree upon these little questions, the great bills, the legislative, and executive, and judicial appropriation bill, or the river and harbor bill, and all the other measures which are yet to come up, will stand a poor chance in conference. We have made a bad beginning, I admit. Unless we do better we cannot expect to make this a short session. It may have been our fault; I do not say it is not; but I feel sure that it is important that the Senate should know the facts upon which we acted, so that it may determine whether it was our fault or not and sustain or reject our action as may seem best.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference and further insisting upon the amendments of the Senate numbered 7 and 8.

The report was agreed to.

By unanimous consent the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees at the further conference on the part of the Senate, and Messrs. WINDOM, DORSEY, and BECK were appointed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President—

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. COCKRELL.) Before the Chair will entertain any further motion, he will lay before the Senate a House bill for reference.

The bill (H. R. No. 3679) to amend a joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to issue arms, approved July 3, 1876, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

HOT SPRINGS RESERVATION.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the bill (S. No. 490) supplementary to an act entitled "An act in relation to the Hot Springs reservation, in the State of Arkansas," approved March 3, 1877, returned from the House of Representatives at the request of the Senate; and,

On motion of Mr. GARLAND, it was recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands.

METHODIST CHURCH SOUTH.

Mr. BAILEY. I ask that Senate bill No. 910 be fixed for consideration upon Thursday of next week.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Will the Senator give the title of the bill?

Mr. BAILEY. It is a bill for the relief of the book agents of the Methodist Episcopal Church South.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, I made a motion to adjourn.

Mr. BAILEY. This is a bill of a great deal of interest to several millions of people in the United States, especially in the Southern States and in the border States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Kansas, and Nebraska, and presents questions of very considerable interest. It should be considered by the Senate in full session, and for that reason I desire that a day be fixed for its consideration. I believe the members of the Committee on Claims, who disagree with the majority of the committee, have consented that Thursday of next week is a proper day for its consideration. I ask that the bill be made the special order for that day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee moves that the bill to which he has referred be made the special order for next Thursday. Is there objection to the request? There is no objection, and the bill will be the special order for next Thursday.

BANKRUPT-LAW REPEAL.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont made a motion a few moments ago, and the Chair took up other business. The Chair will now entertain the motion of the Senator from Vermont to adjourn.

Mr. ALLISON. That is just the motion I intended to make.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Before that motion is entertained the Chair will lay before the Senate the regular order, which will be the unfinished business for Monday. It is the bill (S. No. 35) to repeal the bankrupt law. The Senator from Vermont moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 11, 1878.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

GEORGE W. HARBAUGH.

Mr. MONROE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4278) for the relief of George W. Harbaugh, late private of Sixth Ohio Independent Battery; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT TOPEKA, KANSAS.

Mr. RYAN. I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill No. 180, to provide for a building for the use of the post-office, United States circuit and district courts, and other Government offices at Topeka, Kansas, be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. EDEN. I object.

APPROPRIATION FOR THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS OF THE DISTRICT.

Mr. CALKINS. I ask unanimous consent to introduce and have considered now a bill (H. R. No. 4279) making appropriations for carrying on the public schools in Washington, District of Columbia, until June 1, 1878.

The bill was read. It provides that $75,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for carrying on the public schools in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, until June 1, 1878, and that the same shall be available forthwith.

Mr. CALKINS. I ask unanimous consent to put this bill on its passage now. Unless we pass this appropriation, the public schools of this District will close in a week.

Mr. EDEN. Is this reported from any committee?

Mr. CALKINS. No, sir.

Mr. EDEN. I do not object to its being referred to a proper committee; but I object to its passage now.

Mr. HENDEE. Let it go, then, to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. EDEN. I suppose that more properly it should go to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. THOMPSON. Oh, no.

Mr. HENDEE. Matters of this kind always go to the District Committee.

Mr. EDEN. I object to the reference unless the bill goes to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CALKINS. Let it go, then, to that committee.

The bill (H. R. No. 4279) was introduced, read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

JOSEPH M'HENRY.

Mr. COX, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4280) granting a pension to Joseph McHenry, of the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

TEXAS PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. HARTRIDGE presented memorial of the citizens and resolutions of the city council of Columbus, Georgia, in favor of the Texas Pacific Railroad; which was referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

ARREST OF BENJAMIN NOYES.

Mr. PHELPS, by unanimous consent, presented the following preamble and resolution; which were read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas it is alleged by Benjamin Noyes, a citizen of New Haven, in the State of Connecticut, that while recently in the city of Washington, in obedience to a telegraphic notification to appear as a witness before a committee of the Senate of the United States, he was arrested in the night season by certain pretended detectives, without warrant or other process, while in bed in his room at a hotel, and removed from his lodgings against his protest, and refused opportunity to communicate with counsel or friends, and placed on board a railroad train and hurried beyond the jurisdiction of the District of Columbia to the State of New Jersey and there imprisoned: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee of this House be instructed to inquire whether there has in fact been an unwarrantable violation of a citizen's right to personal liberty; and, if so, whether there is existing law to punish such violation; and, if not, to recommend such legislation as in their judgment is required for the proper protection of personal liberty in the District of Columbia; and that the committee have authority to send for necessary persons and papers and liberty to report at any time, by bill or otherwise.

Mr. PHELPS moved to reconsider the vote by which the preamble and resolution were adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TEXAS PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. HARTRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, I ask by unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. No. 15) to alter and amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of the railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, and also to amend and alter an act of Congress approved July 2, 1864, in amendment of said first-named act, and to move its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. COX, of New York. Is there any objection on the part of the House to put this bill on its passage immediately? If there is no objection, I ask it be put on its passage.

Mr. HENDEE. I object.

Mr. COX, of New York. I should like to ask the Chair a question, whether at the end of the morning hour to-day it will be in order to move to go to the Speaker's table to reach this bill and then put it on its passage; whether by majority vote that can be done?

Mr. BURCHARD. Not if it is referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state in reply to the gentleman from New York that after the morning hour the motion to go to the business upon the Speaker's table is in order, and if a majority shall decide to go to the Speaker's table then in its regular course this bill will be reached and will be under the control of a majority of the House, and if the House shall see fit by adequate motion to insist on its present consideration it can be so considered, in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. COX, of New York. Then I object to the reference of the bill.

Mr. SAMPSON. As I understand it this bill has been taken from the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. It has not; it only came yesterday from the Senate.

Mr. SAMPSON. Was not the motion to refer it to the Judiciary Committee?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asked unanimous consent to take the bill from the Speaker's table and to refer it to the Judiciary Committee. The gentleman from New York raised what was in the nature of an objection.

Mr. COX, of New York. Yes, sir; I object to its reference and now give notice that a motion will be made at the end of the morning hour to go to the business upon the Speaker's table in order to reach the bill and by a majority vote to pass it.

ASSESSMENTS FOR SPECIAL IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. HENDEE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4281) in relation to certificates of assessment for special improvements in the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

LEASE OF UNITARIAN CHURCH PROPERTY.

Mr. HENDEE also, by unanimous consent, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, submitted various proceedings and the views of the minority on joint resolution (H. R. No. 135) prohibiting the leasing of the Unitarian church property, in Washington City, for police-court purposes; which were ordered to be printed.

B. C. PAYNE.

Mr. HUBBELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4282) granting a pension to B. C. Payne, of Captain Mallory's Company, of Orange County (Virginia) Militia, war of 1812; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

TARIFF BILL.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER, by unanimous consent, presented the protest of 50 of the leading merchants and manufacturers of the city of Philadelphia against the passage of the tariff bill now before Congress; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

TARIFF ON WOOL AND WOOLENS.

Mr. JONES, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, presented the petition of 991 agriculturists, protesting against a reduction of the tariff on wool and woolens; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

SIGNAL STATION AT MARION, ALABAMA.

Mr. SHELLEY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4283) to establish a weather-observation station of the Signal Service, United States Army, at Marion, in Perry County, State of Alabama; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

SWAMPS AND OVERFLOWED LANDS.

Mr. GAUSE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4284) to extend the provisions of an act approved March 2, 1855, entitled "An act for the relief of purchasers and locators of swamp and overflowed lands, and for other purposes;" which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL PARK.

Mr. GAUSE also, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back a letter of the Secretary of the Interior in relation to the National Park; which was recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

HOMESTEADS.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4285) to amend section 2290 of the Revised Statutes of the United States concerning homesteads; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TUCKER. In the absence of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD,] the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to proceed with the consideration of the special order, the tariff bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SMITH] has given notice to the Chair that he desires to proceed with the pension appropriation bill.

Mr. TUCKER. I am quite willing to yield for that.

CORRECTION OF RECORD.

Mr. CONGER. I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker, I find, on examining the RECORD this morning, in looking through the speech of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] on the tariff, as published in the RECORD of this morning, April 11, that a letter which was read by the gentleman purporting to come from a manufacturing firm in the State of Michigan, Worthington and another, on the subject of the manufacture here and sale abroad of agricultural implements, hay-forks, and things of that kind, and some remarks which I made in regard to that firm and these implements are entirely omitted from the RECORD. A matter that was of sufficient importance to have read at the Clerk's desk as a part of the gentleman's remarks, the entire letter, and upon which the gentleman commented and upon which I commented in the House, is entirely left out of the RECORD of the debates of this House, and the comments too are left out.

That letter, sir, from this firm in Jackson, stated that they were large manufacturers of that class of agricultural implements, and among other things stated that they had a large sale for those implements in foreign countries. It stated also that they could manufacture those implements of steel purchased from abroad—manufacture them in the State of Michigan—and send them to foreign countries to compete there with the manufactures of other countries; and that they did not desire any protection. That was substantially what the letter amounted to. It was used as an argument to this House in favor of the proposition of the Committee of Ways and Means on the tariff bill.

Now, sir, I stated to the House after the reading of that letter that this firm of manufacturers in the State of Michigan carried on their work in the penitentiary of that State; that they performed this work by convict labor in that State, at a price for that labor in the manufacture of these implements less than that at which free labor could be employed anywhere. I do not give my words, but that is the purport of them. I have tried in vain to obtain the record of my remarks as well as the copy of that letter from the manuscript of the reporters.

I also stated, what I considered a very important statement, that under the laws, which I did not read, and to the titles of which I did not refer, but which I now do—sections 3019, 3020, and 3025 of the Revised Statutes—there was a drawback upon the duties paid upon steel which should be manufactured in this country, either wholly of steel or partly of wood, when the articles were re-exported from the country lacking 10 per cent. of the drawback for the use of the Government.

Now, sir, these important statements of the gentlemen, made here in the presence of this House and going to the country as they always do and should do by those reporters who send broadcast the statements made here to influence the public mind, were all suppressed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] in his printed speech; not a single reference made to it or to my comments thereon.

I am sorry the gentleman is not here, but I say, sir, that that was a violation, a flagrant violation of the rules of the House. I do not know nor do I propose to fix the place in the speech of the gentleman where this wrong has occurred; I cannot tell whether by mistake, by accident, or by design that important omission from the RECORD was made. But I speak of it now at the earliest opportunity, and as soon as I can procure from the reporters the manuscript of the letter and of the gentleman's remarks upon it and of my comments upon it, I shall ask the privilege of the House that they be placed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The debate to which the gentleman refers was in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with which the Chair has nothing to do, nor has the Chair anything to do with the speeches of members as they are inserted in the RECORD, and of course he cannot possibly have any control over them, for it is a mental and physical impossibility.

Mr. CONGER. At a future time when I can procure the manuscript I shall ask that the letter read by the gentleman from New York with his remarks upon it and my comments upon it be read by the reporters of the House. I will not detain the House further about the matter now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has every disposition to have the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] placed right upon the record. The question now is upon the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SMITH] that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the further consideration of the pension appropriation bill.

The question was put, 108 members voting in the affirmative.

Mr. COX, of New York. I withdraw further objection to the motion. Gentlemen think, I believe, that we can have a morning hour after this bill is disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that the motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union is always in order, and the Chair is advised that when the pension appropriation bill is disposed of, as it probably will be to-day, then the Committee on Appropriations will ask to have the Post-Office Department appropriation bill taken up for consideration, and hence there will be no morning hour to-day.

Mr. COX, of New York. Does the motion to suspend the rules and go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union dispense with the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. The effect of it is to delay and probably to dispense with it.

Mr. COX, of New York. After the bill now pending shall have been disposed of, a morning hour can be had.

The SPEAKER. The motion to go into Committee of the Whole can be made, to consider the Post-Office Department appropriation bill.

Mr. COX, of New York. Well, I withdraw all objection.

The SPEAKER. No further count being demanded, the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SMITH] is agreed to.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. GARFIELD in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3974) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1879.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the pension appropriation bill, and by order of the House debate has been limited to thirty minutes. Five minutes of that time have been consumed and twenty-five minutes remain, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] now is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HANNA. I rise to make an inquiry. Yesterday there was evidently some misunderstanding on the part of the House as to the limitation of the time for debate.

Mr. SPARKS. This interruption does not come out of my time?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly not.

Mr. HANNA. Yesterday while the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] held the floor he kindly assigned to me a portion of his time, but by reason of a misunderstanding he was deprived of the opportunity to do so, and I trust that to-day there will be no attempt to gag this measure through, but that reasonable opportunity will be given to both sides for the expression of our views upon this question. I think that the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not interfere to limit the debate as the matter is construed by other members.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would remark that as soon as the general debate closes the bill is open to debate under the five-minute rule by clauses.

Mr. SPARKS. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Appropriations in considering the pension appropriation bill found the amount due to pensioners in the neighborhood of $29,000,000. In the effort to appropriate a sufficient sum of money to cover this large indebtedness which has been very justly and aptly designated here as a sacred debt, the means by which this appropriation was to be carried into effect necessarily confronted the committee, in fact it became the duty of that committee to mature and present a bill, not only for the payment of the $29,000,000 of money due to the pensioners, but to appropriate money to supply the means or agencies through which the pensioners are to be paid.

Now, sir, we attempted liberally, largely, fully, and completely by taking the farthest extent of the estimates to appropriate funds for the payment of the pensions of these maimed and wounded soldiers, their widows and orphans. But we found that there had grown up a system of paying these pensioners that amounted to simple robbery of the Treasury of the United States and was vexatious and costly to the pensioners; I mean the pension-agency system. We therefore undertook by this bill to save to the tax-payers of the country all that could be saved, while at the same time paying fully and expeditiously every dollar that was due to the pensioner. But when we attempt to do this some fault-finding gentlemen here take exceptions. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] makes the point that he does not like this bill for the reason that the Appropriation Committee has "attempted to legislate." Sir, we have attempted simply to meet a case that confronted us. We have attempted to meet it in the interest of economy, in the interest of common justice and common honesty; and I think it would be well for gentlemen when other members who are charged with particular duties attempt to discharge them faithfully and in the interest of economy and justice to aid them rather than be constantly finding fault. The gentleman from Wisconsin is a member of the Committee on Military Affairs. We have heard a great deal of the reforms in the military service that are to come from that committee. I have been under the impression that they would come; and when they come I would like to stand by that gentleman and the members of that committee and aid them rather than sneer at and oppose them whenever they present any proposition to the House in that direction.

On looking at this question we found that the last appropriation for pension agencies in the payment of these pensions was $457,000. That is the amount appropriated in the last appropriation bill for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, for making the payment of pensions to the pensioners. We found also that the Pension Office had estimated as the expenditure for this purpose for the coming fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, $330,000. (It was stated at $319,000, but it really amounts to about $330,000.) The fact that the estimate for this purpose was $127,000 less this year than the appropriation last year necessarily arrested the attention of the committee. Proceeding to examine this matter, we found that instead of there being any necessity for paying $457,000 for this service or even $330,000, it could be amply done for $130,000. Now, sir, if this be correct, is it not the duty of patriotism to adopt the system we propose? How do we arrive at this conclusion? The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SMITH], the chairman of the subcommittee on this subject, whose zeal and indefatigable labors in relation to this matter deserve the commendation of every member of the House, (and he being of opposite politics to me I take great pleasure in commending them,) has with great care probed this question to the bottom. First he goes to the Secretary of the Interior and inquires with reference to the matter. The letter of that officer is published in the RECORD of this morning in a speech of my friend from Pennsylvania, and if gentlemen have not read it let me specially direct their attention to that letter. The Secretary not only says that the plan here suggested is feasible, but he indicates that it is wonderful it has not been adopted heretofore. This, mark you, is the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior, who on this subject outranks the Commissioner of Pensions, the latter simply being a subofficial of his.

The gentleman next goes to the Treasurer of the United States, who has the custody of the funds out of which these pensions are to be paid; and he, making a large and liberal estimate, certifies to an estimate which, taken in connection with estimates from the Pension Office, shows that this work, which has heretofore cost the Government on the average $450,000 annually, can be done in the Treasury of the United States for $130,000. Hence we make provision that these pensions shall be paid directly from the Treasury; and we propose to abolish the pension agencies.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I would like to correct a statement of the gentleman.

Mr. SPARKS. I cannot yield now. The gentleman can correct me when I am through.

Another question to be considered was that of safety. Here is a large sum of money, $29,000,000, annually appropriated for pensions; and the question of safety in its appropriation is an important item. Now it strikes me, as the Government owes this sacred debt and as it has a custodian of its funds, supposed to be competent and honest, it is safer that the payment of the debt should be made directly from the repository of the funds when duly set apart and appropriated to the payment. In this connection my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, has given us some figures. He has shown where the agency system has proved a defaulter to the extent of nearly $300,000. In other words, pension agents have proved defaulters and defrauded the people of the United States in about this sum. I give it in round numbers at $300,000; it is a little less. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has given the precise figures in his speech. And I think it very likely some of his political friends may have objected to his presenting them; I do not know as to that; but at any rate, in a spirit of fairness and of justice and with a desire to do right that is commendable everywhere, he has presented them. And I am glad he has done so and that the duty did not devolve upon me. Now, sir, such defalcations cannot exist under the system here proposed. On the point of safety, therefore, we find that the plan here suggested is infinitely superior to the present system. Why, sir, it holds to reason that when eighteen men in different parts of the country are chosen as pension agents, many of them unfortunately selected to subserve partisan purposes—I am making no charge upon the republican organization, for it might be so if the other party were in power—it is presumable that so large a sum of money paid into the hands of these men is subjected at least to some risk, all of which is obviated by leaving the money in the Treasury until it is paid to the men to whom it is honestly and justly due.

But objection is made that this proposed system will delay the payment of pensioners. Let us see how that is. The Commissioner of Pensions, who, from all I have seen in the progress of this discussion, seems to be taking a very lively interest against this bill—I make no special charges against him, for as far as I know him personally I have thought much of him and think highly of him still—himself in his letter, maturely and deliberately prepared and sent to the Secretary of the Interior, substantially states that delay in payments would not occur except in the beginning, namely, for the first quarter after the act takes effect. When I made that point yesterday upon the gentleman from Maine [Mr. POWERS] he went back somewhere behind the screen and brought in a card stating that the Commissioner of Pensions found it necessary to back out of that proposition. Now, I do not care whether he backs out or backs in. It holds to reason and to common sense that it is true. How are your pensions paid now under the agency system? How many men go to the pension agents and get their money? Not more than 10 per cent. of them, perhaps. Not more, certainly, than 10 per cent. of them can do so in the great State of Illinois with its population of over three millions of people and with only one office in the State, and it located in its extreme northeast corner. Not more than 10 per cent. can do it at the offices in the city of Concord covering three or four States. They simply cannot do it. They do not do it. They get their pensions by drafts through the mail. How? The vouchers are sent to them. The affidavits are sworn to, identification made and returned to the pension offices accompanying receipts, and drafts for amounts are then sent through the mails to the pensioners. What is the difference to people of my district, and, in fact, to the people in every district in the State, except perhaps in the city of Chicago, in getting a communication from the city of Washington and one from Chicago? I think it is generally in favor of Washington. I would rely on getting a letter in the little town where I live from Washington earlier than from Chicago. I am speaking now for the pensioners who do not live at Chicago, but who live all over the State. And it is so throughout the whole country. In all these pension districts they live miles and hundreds of miles away. Look at North Carolina. My friend, [General SCALES], living on the northern line of North Carolina, were he a pensioner, would have to go to Knoxville, Tennessee. Let me ask, gentlemen, where would be the most convenient place for him to get his draft and transact the necessary business in relation to it—Washington or Knoxville? Is it not Washington? Every one knows it would be so. That is the way pensioners are distributed and the way pension agencies are distributed.

Now, sir, I say it holds to reason, it is common sense, that there would be no more delay in the plan proposed than in the present system. In the beginning, in starting the system, there may be some delay. Everybody, of course, knows such would be the case. But it would only be for the first quarter.

Four vouchers are sent to the pensioners. On the first voucher there may be some delay, but they have all these papers prepared, so that on the incoming payment they are ready to transmit the drafts at once, and there is no reason why they should not reach the pensioners on the identical day when the payment ought to be made; for they have a whole quarter in which to prepare them. Can there be any question about that? Mr. Chairman, how many minutes of my time remain?

The CHAIRMAN. Ten minutes.

Mr. SPARKS. We have first considered the question of safety and next the question of delay, in reference to both of which, in my judgment, the proposed plan is an improvement over the present system. We come next to consider the cost to the pensioner. On that point I wish to direct attention to a species of legislative claptrap that has been attempted in this discussion. I presume every gentleman has had placed upon his desk this morning an anonymous circular, a copy of which I hold in my hand. Where did it come from? Has it a father in this House? I can hardly think that it has. Here it is: Outrage on pensioners!—Wealthy pensioners!—Poor Government!—Economy with a vengeance!

The House of Representatives, in its anxiety to economize, proposes to tax pensioners $100,000 per year of their miserable pittance, to obtain them by paying pensions from the mill in the interest of bondholders.

Why, sir, it has not been long since we had fifty-eight of these agents. Why? For about the same reason as a wagon should have five wheels. It was because it afforded places for more office-seekers to get office. I am not particularly charging this upon the republican organization. I am in good humor to-day; I have not got my war paint on. It is my impression, if we were on the inside we would have had some hungry men to provide for too. [Laughter.]

We ran on the basis of fifty-eight agencies for a good while. They were good places to put hungry friends into to draw fat salaries. But the Treasury was robbed by it, and the present Administration (which I believe is to be approved now since the caucus last night) chose to cut that number down to eighteen. Why? Simply because it found a great big barnacle hanging upon the Treasury. It found so large a lot of pap-suckers here that it was necessary to turn some of them off, and it trimmed them down to eighteen. Has there been any delay in the service occasioned by it? No, sir. Everybody says the service has been better conducted; and yet we have reduced them from fifty-eight to eighteen.

Why, sir, when that was done—I do not speak for the whole country, I do not live all over it, but I remember when it was cut down—there was a terrible howl in my country; there was a howl at Springfield, because a fat officer's head had to go into the basket; so at Quincy; so in my own district, at the town of Salem. There was a howl all over the country. And now, when you propose to cut this thing right square off and end these blood-suckers, there is a howl; and we have these sensational, lying, anonymous circulars on our tables. Their paternity can scarcely be questioned; they come through the influence of the pension agencies. It is humiliating and disgraceful to us, representing as we do this proud nation, that scurvy fellows should be allowed to approach the hall of our deliberations with such balderdash and lying nonsense, with a view to influence our action, and it deserves the severest rebuke from every honorable gentleman on this floor.

But its falsity is apparent everywhere. There is not a correct statement in the circular. I will not have time, I am afraid, to dissect it. It says that forty-eight thousand affidavits will have to be sworn to by the pensioners and paid for by them at fifty cents per quarter aggregating $24,000 per quarter or $96,000 per annum, while it says under the present system they can go before the pension agent and swear to them free. Now, that would look as if that portion of them (by no means forty-eight thousand) who chance to live next door to the pension agent and swear to their affidavits before him might be injured. But how is it with the ninety out of the one hundred who do not live near the agency? They cannot go there, never have gone there, and in the nature of things never can go there. They have now got to swear before a justice of the peace or some other officer and pay for it and send it to the pension agent. Hence this hue and cry is all for the one man out of ten who lives at the agency and not for the body of the pensioners, all of whom should be on perfect equality. Our system they say would injure the ten out of the hundred. But let us see if that is so. My friend from Pennsylvania, prompted by his stern honesty and his desire to do everything he could for the soldier and his great care in this matter, has made provision in his amendment to make this bill in this respect infinitely better for the pensioner than it is now. How? This bill makes provision that every pensioner can go before any United States officer authorized to administer oaths and swear to his papers free. The officer is obliged to administer the oath free. What is the effect of that? How many United States judges have you got in the United States? Four or five times as many as you have got pension agents.

Hence, take the pensioners altogether there would be a saving in this for the reason that if they went before United States judges who would be compelled to administer the oath free there would be four or five times the number of officers to administer the oaths free. But what else? The bill provides that they can go before a revenue collector, who is in every district or about every district. There are one hundred and twenty-six of them. Hence they can go before one hundred and twenty-six revenue collectors and make their affidavits free. Here we have two hundred or three hundred officers, judges, and collectors before whom they can make their affidavits free; while now they can only go before eighteen agents. Which is in the interest of the pensioner? More than that, under this bill they can go before any United States commissioner and make their affidavits free, and there are over three thousand of them scattered all over the country. Hence we have nearly four thousand men under this bill, or about that before whom these pensioners can swear to their affidavits free, while under the present system there are only eighteen pension agents before whom they can do it without cost. Now which system is the best for the pensioner? The common sense of every man will at once settle it in favor of the proposed plan.

Now let me refer to the cost. I mean the cost to the pensioner in the draft he gets. The important thing to be considered is that the pensioner is not to be prejudiced in the payment that he gets. We want to make provision that the pensioner shall be fully paid, completely paid, and that the kind of payment he gets shall not be endangered nor discounted at a loss to him.

The bill provides that all the pensioners shall be paid by drafts drawn by the Treasurer of the United States on the Treasury of the United States, which are good and at par or a premium everywhere, and no question about it; while now they are paid by agents' drafts on banks, and a draft on a bank is sometimes dangerous; there may be trouble about it. It is not only dangerous to the pensioner, but it is costly to him because in my county, for instance, they will not take a draft on a Chicago bank at par, and the pensioner therefore is subject to a shave, while a draft by the Treasurer of the United States on the Treasury of the United States is at par everywhere and always. [Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time allowed by the House for debate has expired.

Mr. SPARKS. I am sorry for it, for I had some further remarks which I desired to make.

Mr. BRIGHT. Is it in order to ask an extension of the gentleman's time?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order in Committee of the Whole. The Clerk will now proceed to read the bill by paragraphs for amendment.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill by paragraphs, and read as follows:

For pensions for Army Invalids, $13,150,000; for widows, minors, and dependent relatives $12,830,000; for survivors of the war of 1812, $800,000; and for widows of the war of 1812, $20,000; and for fees of examining surgeons, $85,000, as provided by the several acts of Congress.

Mr. HANNA. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I propose briefly to direct my remarks to two questions involved in the consideration of the pending bill: first, the feature of alleged economy claimed for it by its advocates; and second, the great wrong and outrage which the pensioners would be subjected to by abolishing the present system of payment and adopting the mode proposed.

The idea that it will prove a measure of economy is a delusion. If the agents receive under existing law in the way of salary and fees compensation disproportionate to the amount of service rendered and responsibility incurred, then the true remedy, in my judgment, is to correct whatever abuse, if any, exists in that regard by giving the agent a certain fixed sum as a salary, and if the other fees now allowed by law amount to a sum more than equal to all other expenses, that the excess be covered into the Treasury. I think it will be conceded that the present Commissioner of Pensions, Mr. Bentley, is one of the most intelligent and efficient officials in the public service. He is thoroughly conversant with all the details, the workings, and the necessities of his department, and by reason of his experience his opinion and judgment should have far greater weight with members upon questions connected with the operations of his department than the speculative views of visionaries or of those who under the banner of reform seem bent on withholding the means necessary to the efficiency of the several Departments of the Government or of abolishing the necessary agencies to a prompt and satisfactory service. Reform is one thing, but defeat of the object and purpose of the Government is quite a different thing. In a letter of November 12, 1877, addressed by the Commissioner of Pensions to Hon. ROBERT E. WITHERS, of the Senate, he treats fairly and fully the question of economy involved in the proposed change in these words:

The question of general economy is involved in that of expediency. Upon this subject I am obliged to confess that I am unable to see where the labor of payment, and the duties incident to it, and to the custody of the pay-rolls, would be reduced by transferring the duty of paying to the Treasury Department; and until the plan is proposed which will reduce the labor and the duties incident to it, and to the custody of the pay-rolls, I must proceed upon the assumption that they would not be reduced by such transfer. If there is not a reduction of the labor and of the duties, I am clearly of the opinion that there would not be a reduction of expenses below what it will cost to pay through local agents, provided Congress shall readjust the compensation of the agents upon some plan similar to that recommended by me in my annual report.

The local pension agent may, and usually does, perform the labor and the duties incident to his office, closely adhering to common business principles; i. e., he employs his clerical assistants at the prices established in the business community for such labor, and requires his clerks to serve him diligently during usual business hours. This is in accord with his personal interest, since by this means the net proceeds of his office are enhanced.

The service in the departments at the capital is not so conducted, and in the nature of things cannot be conducted upon such principles. The objects of financial gain and business prosperity, which constitute the most powerful motive in common life and are the incentive of the local agent in the management of his office, are not a governing influence with a Government official. At best, he is but a servant with a stated salary, which no exertion on his part can increase.

In the Departments, a clerk cannot ordinarily be expected to labor earlier than nine a. m. nor later than four p. m. The clerks in the agencies labor from seven or eight a. m. to six p. m., and as a rule they are more diligent while they labor, because they are under the eye of him whose money pays for their services, and who will discharge them summarily and without relief if they fail to render him an equivalent for their hire. Besides this, the agent pays a less salary for the same class of labor than is paid in the Departments.

It is my opinion, based upon such observations as I have been able to make, the local agent transacts his business at a rate of not less than 40 per cent. cheaper than the same business can be transacted in the Departments at Washington even with the most zealous officers in charge.

Upon economical considerations, I am of opinion nothing, upon the whole, will be gained by transferring the pay-rolls to the capital, even if they should be connected with the Pension Bureau, much less if connected with another Department, making necessary a continuance of all the present machinery.

There is a presentation of this question of economy that is unsavable from any source entitled to equal weight and credit. We are thus told by one in a position to know whereof he affirms, who knows more of the practical workings of the Pension Department than the Secretary of the Interior or of the Treasury can by possibility know, no matter how efficient either of them may be, that "the local agent transacts his business at a rate of not less than 40 per cent. cheaper than the same business can be transacted in the Departments at Washington, even with the most zealous officers in charge;" and this statement is in perfect accord with the observation and experience of any member on this floor who has had aught to do with the work of the several Departments. It necessarily takes a given amount of time and labor to pay 232,104 pensioners, keep the books and accounts correctly, make the necessary examinations and computation for the protection of the Government, and conduct the correspondence; and the idea that all this labor can be performed cheaper in Washington than is now done in the States at the several agencies is simply an assumption.

Afterward, on the 20th of November, 1877, the Commissioner, in a letter to the Secretary of the Interior, reiterates substantially the same views, and combats with great force the plan of payment proposed by this bill. You will bear in mind that every three months 234,104 payments are to be made, and we are further told by the Commissioner of Pensions that "it is utterly impracticable to rest the responsibility for so many payments per quarter upon any single person, because the labor incident to it is greater than any one person can possibly perform." He then tells us that the scheme proposed would involve the absolute necessity of dividing the rolls into twelve sections of twenty thousand persons, with one superintending agent for each section, who would be compelled to pay each working day of the year two hundred and eighty persons in order to complete the payment of his section; and thus each one of the head men of these sections would have a retinue of clerks the whole cost of which we have no reliable data except the statement of the Commissioner, who says that the work would cost 40 per cent. more than as now done at the agencies.

Some gentlemen have said that now we have eighteen rolls corresponding with the eighteen agencies, whereas if the scheme proposed be adopted we shall have but one, and that therefore its adoption will be a saving of labor. Would not the one roll embrace the eighteen? Is not the whole equal to all the parts? Would there be any less number of names upon the one roll which embraces the eighteen rolls? It is idle to talk of a saving of labor in this regard. Again, it has been suggested that under the present system three sets of books are required and that the proposed scheme will dispose of one set, and thus a saving may be effected. Under any safe system for the Government, properly guarded with checks and balances, you cannot avoid a less number than three sets. The Pension Department proper should have one, it will be conceded; you cannot start the machinery in motion without that. Then the Department or officer issuing the checks to the pensioners must have another set, to the end that information be furnished as to who is entitled to the pensions. And then if the accounts are ever to be settled some Auditor must have another set. Any scheme which seeks to get rid of one set of these books is successfully met with the objection that such would be the opportunity for the commission of fraud that it ought not to be adopted. The argument of the Commissioner of Pensions on this point is unanswerable. After all, the whole question of economy, so far as the mode of payment is concerned, is whether the work can be done cheaper in Washington than in the States at the agencies, and the direct, unimpeached testimony on that point is that it can be done 40 per cent. cheaper in the States at the agencies than in Washington.

But, sir, I am opposed to this scheme on higher ground. I aver that the abolition of the agencies in the States and the adoption of the proposed mode of payment would result in practically robbing the pensioner of the amount which the Government intended he should be promptly and at stated periods be furnished. The uncertainty of prompt payment, the delays incident to the manner of doing business in Washington, all the hazards incident to the transmission of checks through the mails, and the whole machinery of the Departments here being subject to either the whims of Congress or of an Appropriation Committee, would result in compelling the pensioner to sacrifice his pension to those who are ever ready to take advantage of his necessities. Sir, it is idle to talk to me about prompt payment of pensions at Washington when we know that applications for pensions, by meritorious claimants, have been delayed for years by no fault of the Commissioner of Pensions, but by reason of the fact that the necessary information from the Adjutant-General and Surgeon-General's Office could not be obtained for want of the necessary clerical force. Experience in this regard warns me in the interest of the pensioner to avoid the hazards to which this bill subjects him or her.

Sir, at present the pensioners are promptly paid; they are satisfied with the present system and mode of payment. The agents selected, so far as my knowledge extends, are efficient, responsible, worthy, and acceptable to the pensioners. They belong to the rural localities in which the pensioners reside. In one sense the pensioners are the immediate constituency of the agent, and in the very nature of things would receive more faithful and tender consideration than from a stranger or a clerk in Washington. A failure to make the necessary appropriation for clerk hire in the Departments at Washington does not now affect the efficiency of the agencies in the States, as the agent pays the clerk hire and such payment does not depend upon the action or non-action of an Appropriation Committee. I repeat, if the compensation of the agents is now too large, that can be easily remedied; but in the name of justice and humanity I protest against a measure which, in my judgment, will result in practically robbing the pensioner. Away with all such schemes of reform.

Again, sir, while I am not a State-rights man according to the old political sense of the term, while I distinctly avow that my allegiance to the nation is paramount to that of my State, yet, sir, I beg to call attention to what seems to me an unnecessary centralization of all the machinery of the General Government at Washington and of the money power of the Government in New York.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York, obtained the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted upon the pending amendment, and it must be voted upon unless it be withdrawn.

Mr. HANNA. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I renew it, and yield my time to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPARKS.]

Mr. SPARKS. One word in answer to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HANNA,] and I make it with all respect to him. He is a Representative of a pension district. The pension office of his district is located at Indianapolis, his home. His views are likely to be influenced by the interests of that pension office. I am not speaking disrespectfully of the gentleman. It is as natural that he should sustain that office as that water should flow down an inclined plane. It is possible that the pension agent is a friend of the gentleman; in fact, I have been informed that such is the case. It is natural that the prejudices of the gentleman should be in favor of his friend the pension agent.

And now, sir, I desire to say a word as to the cost of this system. The cost of running the pension agencies has been about $450,000 a year. Last year we appropriated $457,000 for that purpose. This year the Department makes an estimate of about $330,000, but if you will look at the speech of my colleague on the committee [Mr. HEWITT, of New York] it will be clearly seen that these payments can be made in the mode this bill proposes for $130,000, and it will also show you that his estimates therefor come largely from the Pension Office itself. I do not dispute the high character of the Commissioner of Pensions; I do not doubt his intelligence and integrity; but repeat that the information that these duties can be discharged for $130,000 comes largely from his own estimates. Sir, we have undoubted assurances that under the system of paying these pensioners directly from the Treasury, as this bill proposes, the work can be done for $130,000 when heretofore it has cost the Government $450,000 to do it. I ask if this is not something worth saving.

Again, we are met with objections from the Committee on Invalid Pensions. Now, sir, I have profound respect for all the members of that committee so far as I know them; but I would ask those gentlemen when they come in here to antagonize this bill, admitting that we are in the line of reform of abuses, but complaining that it is their special province to correct them, why they have allowed this unnecessary charge upon the Treasury to last for so many years and have never discovered a remedy for it. That committee seem to think it unfair to them that the Appropriations Committee should have suggested a reform in this regard, while it admits that the Treasury has been robbed in the payment of this sacred debt for many years, and yet has never itself suggested any remedy whatever. Our committee has proposed in this bill an effective remedy in the abolition of these agencies, and it is due to fairness, it is due to honesty, it is due to truth that the House should fairly consider the plan which we present. The Committee on Invalid Pensions say "We will not do away with pension agencies yet, but will reform abuses within them." Sir, it is the pension-agency system that has produced all the trouble. These agencies are the fruitful source of all this extravagance in the payment of these honest and worthy pensioners. I suppose gentlemen on the Pension Committee think that "The hair of the dog cures its bite;" hence they will retain the agents. We do not propose such remedy, but think it would be better to get rid of the dog. [Laughter.] They object to a measure of reform which abolishes the agency system and brings down the expense of paying pensions to $130,000. They want to retain the pension agents and keep the expense at $216,000. They propose to continue the vicious system which robs the Treasury and the pensioners alike. We think, Mr. Chairman, that it is due to fairness to have this matter thoroughly considered, and when that is done we believe the House will come to the conclusion that the Committee on Appropriations, whether they may have made mistakes elsewhere or not, have in this matter done a good work.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. Mr. Chairman, several gentlemen preceding me have characterized this proposition as speculative. I regard it as a very simple matter of business. I do not know that I can make it clear to others in five minutes; but it is as clear in my own mind as anything possibly can be. This is purely a question of machine work so simple and feasible that the inquiry has often come to me while it has been under discussion, how many of those who oppose it are intimately connected with the patronage of fifty-eight pension agencies no longer required? Sir, this Administration is entitled to credit for having discovered that this business, instead of being conducted by fifty-eight agencies, could be concentrated into eighteen. The Committee on Appropriations of this House are entitled to credit for taking the hint from the Administration and showing how the business can be concentrated into one office, and with immense saving.

What is this case? There are nine hundred thousand duplicate payments to be made every year, more or less. I say duplicate payments, because the same thing is repeated over again and again to about two hundred and thirty thousand pensioners quarterly. It is suggested as a part of this proposition that these payments shall be made continuously through every month of the year instead of quarterly. In that case there will be an average of about three thousand payments on every working day. Now, I say, as a man who knows something about signing multitudinous checks and receiving multitudinous vouchers therefor, that these three thousand payments can be made from the Treasury building in Washington to the greater satisfaction of the two hundred and thirty thousand pensioners and at a much less cost than this committee has dared to suggest.

What is it that the Committee on Appropriations suggest? They propose an expenditure for this purpose of $130,000, which does not include anything for rent, stationery, or postage. This is nearly fourteen and one-half cents for every check. But the business when thoroughly organized can be done for ten cents on every check; and my colleague from New York [Mr. HEWITT] who spoke on this subject yesterday can find the man who will contract to do it to the entire satisfaction of the pensioners and the Government for ten cents a check and voucher, if the contract should extend over five years.

Of course the system now proposed is a change; and some incidental experiments will be required in bringing it into successful action. But the thing is a simple question of organization—how many men does it take to sign three thousand checks a day? Go to your large pension agencies, where a great number of vouchers are cashed in the first two or three days of each month when these payments become due, and you will get a surprising practical answer to that question.

I listened with a great deal of interest to the gentleman from Indianapolis, [Mr. HANNA.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending amendment is exhausted. The formal amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. CLYMER. I renew the formal amendment, and yield my time to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHITTENDEN.]

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I saw that the gentleman from Indiana had prepared his remarks with great care; and in the RECORD (I mean no reflection) I find the reason for his position on this question; and I ask the House to take note of it in voting upon this question as intelligent business men. At the Indianapolis office the compensation to the pension agent is $4,000; the voucher fees are $14,515; contingencies, $1,657.76; total, $20,172.76. Now, I make no reflection; but I say it is in bad taste for the representative of a pension agency in Indianapolis, where the total expenses are $20,000 annually, to come here and present a written argument for the continuance of a system which is so costly and unnecessary—as much so as any other abuse which has crept into the administration of the Government for the last twenty years.

Sir, I congratulate the Committee on Appropriations upon their suggestion of this plan. I hail it as the entering-wedge for the discovery and correction of other and greater abuses in the administration of other Departments of the Government; and on a future occasion I will allude to some of them. I stake my reputation as a man who knows what it costs to sign checks and take vouchers, doing it carefully in a business-like way, that under this proposed plan the Government, though not able to do the work so cheaply as an individual might, will reduce the cost of these payments to $100,000 annually in the third year of the experiment.

Sir, I accept no part of the responsibility which these assume who will vote against this proposition.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I am amazed that so good a business man as my friend from New York should be captured by this miserable claptrap pretense to economy in transferring the payment of these pensions to Washington; I say I am amazed at it, and that he should turn to my friend from Indiana [Mr. HANNA] and make a personal assault on him for advocating what I believe to be true economy is still more amazing. I do not represent any pension agents, and I tell the gentleman that if this work is done in Washington that precisely the same work which is now done by the special agents in the country will be done here in Washington, and there will be no saving in the number of agents or in the consequent expense. There are now eighteen rolls and you propose to make them twelve if you bring them here. You will have to have twelve pension agents located in Washington to do the work with their twelve rolls and it may be eighteen.

Now, Mr. Chairman, do you suppose in the manner in which clerks are employed in Washington they are going to do this work as cheaply as it is now done in the country under the agents themselves? It is simply absurd to talk about a proposition of that kind. Nay, more: the pensioners are paid to-day within fifteen days from the time the pension is due. The great bulk are paid within the first fifteen days. And what do you propose here? You do not propose to pay under fifteen days. No one has made a proposition to pay under that time. You propose to work this force so it will work the whole three months, and at the end of the three months you are to get the whole of the pensioners paid. I have gone into a computation, and I wish my friend from New York to listen to it, to see what will be the loss to the pensioners at 6 per cent. on account of the delay, and it is $250,000. I wish him to tell the pensioners in the district in which he lives that he has favored a reduction of $250,000 on their pensions.

I undertake to say that there is not a single table of statistics which will show this thing can be done for any $150,000. With all due deference to my friend and associate on the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I say he has not shown any such thing; and as a member of the Committee on Appropriations I here and now enter my protest against this thing in the interest of the pensioners of this country. Who made the discovery? It was not my venerable friend from the Lancaster district of Pennsylvania, and chairman of the subcommittee on appropriations. It was made long ago by the Commissioner himself. He reduced these pension agents from fifty-eight to eighteen; and of all the communications which have been addressed to us on this subject his is altogether the most intelligent. He recommended to this House the reduction of the compensation of these pension agents to a proper sum, and to let them go on as they are now in the payment of these pensions.

I only wish to say in conclusion that if this thing is undertaken you will find instead of doing it for $130,000, as the bill proposes, it will cost nearer half a million, and I stake my reputation on it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FORT. Mr. Chairman, if I believed the proposition ingrafted on this pension appropriation bill would be unjust to pensioners or delay the payment of their pensions, I certainly could not support it. I concede there may be doubt as to whether the change in the beginning would not cause some little delay in the payment of these pensions, yet not more than a day or two, and after the change gets into working order there will be no delay. Gentlemen on this floor have grown very eloquent in talking about the poor pensioners. They base their opposition to this measure on the ground of their deep solicitude about the welfare of the poor pensioner. One would think to hear them speak that they considered themselves the only friends and guardians the pensioners had. I have noticed, however, that these same gentlemen who have most love to express for the soldier have not been very willing to extend pensions, at least have not voted to extend pensions to those who seem to deserve them and grant a pension to a class of deserving soldiers not now on the pension-rolls. Opposition generally comes from those who did not happen during the time pensioners were manufactured to be very near the places where the manufacturing was going on. [Laughter.]

Now, sir, here is a question presented to us between the needy and worthy pensioners on one hand and the toiling tax-payers on the other. Between the two stand eighteen pension agents through whom the taxes collected from the tax-payers are distributed to the pensioners, and who toll the money by way of fat fees as it passes through their hands. The very lowest one of these pension agents gets $5,332.64 a year and the highest gets $23,337.88 a year for doing his or her official duty. It is a question with the tax-payers of the country whether they will still continue to pay such enormous salaries. The compensation paid to these agents will average over $15,000 a year.

I happen to know two or three of these pension agents, and they are very excellent people. I like them exceedingly; but as a taxpayer and a Representative of tax-payers I do not believe it our duty to longer permit it. I have no fault to find with the agents; the fault is not with them; the blame is upon us if we continue it longer. I know, Mr. Chairman, these high salaries are the result of consolidation, and this is our first opportunity to act, and we should not hesitate.

Mr. Chairman, I have noticed since I have been here in Congress that whenever a proposition is made to reduce the number of office-holders you find a hundred eloquent gentlemen on their feet in a moment, resisting it and denouncing the measure as foolish or impractic-cable, as they now do in this case. The trouble with them is, some friend must give up his place or some friend who is expecting a place will be disappointed, and hence their opposition. I do not wish to be personal, and I regret to state what is true. Very often, I will say, it has been on the republican side of the House, but not always.

And, sir, judging from past experience with the ex-Doorkeeper of this House, it would have been no better with the democratic side if they were in power. They are resisting the reduction of officers where they have the appointment, and in fact they have increased officers enormously wherever they could control the appointment, and the extravagance of the democratic party where they hold the control of patronage is beyond all precedent. So it seems almost impossible to cut down the number of office-holders or to reduce the list of offices by a direct vote of this House. Republicans seem to want to hold on to all they have, and the democrats are determined to increase wherever they have the appointments. The fifty-eight pension agents were not reduced to eighteen by a vote of this House. The law happened to be passed authorizing the President to reduce their number and consolidate the districts, and he did it; let it be remembered to his credit. I question whether it would ever have been done by a square vote of this House. The regret is that the President does not assume the further responsibility of a still further reduction. And I am glad to learn that he intends soon to do so if Congress does not.

I think, sir, that there can be no possible trouble and no considerable delay in paying pensions from the Treasury Department direct. A Treasury draft would be better and worth more to the pensioner than a pension agent's draft. Very likely it would have been better to have continued to pay pensioners only twice a year as was formerly done. They are now paid four times a year. It is perhaps more satisfactory to them, but I question whether it is any better for them to receive their pensions so often and consequently in such small installments. I often think that too frequent payments is not best. No complaint was ever made when pensioners were paid only twice a year, and it cost only half as much to pay under the former law as it does now. But I would not change the law back now; some might complain. I have no doubt some of them would want to be paid twelve times a year without regard to the cost of payment to the Government. Gentlemen have said if payment is to be transferred to the Treasury Department instead of by agents as now done, that it will cost $450,000, and the pensioner would be defrauded; that claim agents would have to be employed here. I ask them how and why? Thousands of pensioners are paid here now, and I respectfully ask gentlemen to name one case of delay, or any pensioner who had to employ a claim agent to get his pension here. The excellent pension agent, Mr. D. C. Cox, pays every one promptly and without cost or trouble to the pensioner, and in my judgment Mr. Cox as a bureau officer could and would pay them all.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ALDRICH and Mr. O'NEILL rose.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I was about to move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate on the pending paragraph.

Mr. THOMPSON. I hope that motion will not be made now. Other gentlemen want to be heard on this matter very briefly.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I do not want to do anything discourteous, but I am anxious to get the bill through. I withdraw the motion for the present.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I am in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. POWERS] on behalf of the Committee on Invalid Pensions. The very radical change in paying the pensioners contemplated by the Committee on Appropriations is of such vital importance to the pensioners as to command most careful consideration. Any system of transacting the business of the Government which is in good working order, and which is being transacted with such entire satisfaction to all parties concerned and with such perfect safety to the Government, should not be changed unless good and sufficient reasons are shown why such change should be made; whether such reasons have been shown I propose briefly to consider. It is contemplated to discharge eighteen pension agents who have been proven to be most efficient and faithful officers, and turn over this vast machinery, with all its multitudinous and laborious duties, to the already over-worked Secretaries of the Treasury and Interior and have the duties performed by bureaus which have already more to do than can be done with reasonable promptitude. The only reason given for this change is one of economy. It is claimed that it will effect a saving of $200,000 to the Government annually.

Is this true? Is there the least probability that upon trial it will be so proven? The cost under the present system of disbursing pensions is $287,317.15 per annum. This amount is paid to the eighteen agencies and out of it all the expenses of the several agencies, including clerk hire, rent, postage, &c., are paid. If the business of these agencies is transferred to Washington the Commissioner of Pensions estimates the increased expense to his bureau to be $132,246 a year, and the Third Auditor estimates the increased expense to the Treasury Department at $42,000. (See reports of Commissioner Bentley and Third Auditor Austin to the Senate Committee on Pensions upon this subject.) I am informed that upon further investigation these officers have increased their estimates.

I understand the plan proposed is that all vouchers must be examined and approved by the Commissioner, and then sent to the Treasurer to be paid. To the expenses already mentioned should be added the postage on vouchers and checks sent out, probably not less than $35,000 annually, which would make the cost under the new plan $209,246 per year.

The committee at first recommended an appropriation of $96,000 to meet these expenses during the next fiscal year. This glaring inconsistency seems to have finally struck them, for they now offer an amendment increasing this sum to $130,000; and should this unwise measure become a law, I venture to say and put it on record that another year will show a larger deficiency in this business than the entire amount appropriated to carry it on. No matter how liberal an allowance had been made for the expense of disbursing pensions from this city, it would have been a difficult task to successfully carry out this new plan; but with the small amount appropriated to cover the expense an attempt to pay two hundred and thirty thousand pensioners four times a year from a Washington office would, in my judgment, prove a most disastrous and ignominious failure.

There is no question that pension agents are now paid too much; but the most reasonable way to effect a reduction in the expense will be to cut down the fees as is contemplated by the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

As I have already stated, the present system affords perfect security to the Government and entire satisfaction to pensioners, and should be retained as long as this great army of pensioners, or anything approaching it in numbers remains.

Pensions should be paid promptly and with as little expense and trouble to the beneficiaries as possible. Promptness and freedom from vexatious formalities being so desirable, it seems to me all must admit that the Departments here are the last places to look for them. In fact I know of no city or village anywhere but what affords better facilities and conditions for the satisfactory transaction of business than this city of Washington; and to compel widows, orphans, and disabled veterans to wait every quarter for the uncertain and tardy returns from Washington would go far toward robbing our pension system of half the benefits it was created to confer.

In no point of view can I deem it wise to attempt this radical change.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Chairman, I suppose the only question before this committee is the question of transacting some business in a business-like way and in getting it done as cheaply as it can be done and as well as it can be done.

Now, the gentlemen who have discussed this question on both sides admit that about nine hundred thousand vouchers have to be made out in the course of a year and upon those vouchers the pensioners must be paid, no matter whether the work is done in Washington or whether it is done at eighteen separate, independent pension agencies throughout the country.

It appears to me that the plain, common-sense practical question here is this: where can we have that work done the cheapest and at the same time done well? I submit to any gentleman upon this floor upon either side of this question, whether he cannot go to his own home outside of Washington and have twice, if not three times as much clerical work done for the same money as he can have done in Washington City? I do not believe, sir, there would be a single negative vote on that proposition. I can go into my State—and I want to say here before I go any further that I have got no pension agent in my district, that I have got no particular man to favor—I can go into my State and get as much clerical work done for $600 as you can get done in the city of Washington for $1,600. And I know whereof I affirm when I make that statement. Does not every gentleman know that when you centralize the business in Washington City and put it in these Departments—and I am not saying anything against heads of Departments or tails of Departments; I am speaking of a fact patent to every man in this House—when you put business into the hands of these Departments, a man has to live a long while before he can chase it from one end of the Department to another and bring it to a conclusion.

If the object is to save money we have to cut down the fee of these pension agents. It can be reduced ten or fifteen cents on every voucher, and the work still be well done. But I say it can be done outside of the city of Washington much better than in it; and upon that the whole question turns. If gentlemen will look this thing in the face upon the facts as they exist I think no gentleman will deny that this work can be done outside of the city of Washington better than it can be done here; bringing the agencies nearer to the pensioner, and with a greater degree of certainty of the payments being made safely than if made here, and with the certainty of their being made sooner than they can possibly be made if the agencies exist in the city of Washington.

These two points, in my judgment, cover the whole matter, they cover the whole ground. We can save by the amendment already pending a little over $100,000, a clean saving, money in the Treasury, no discount upon it, and have the work done where it is now done, and without any change in the business of the country, without any check, without any complication, and without requiring the pensioners to investigate the matter so as to learn where and when to get their pay. We shall save money by this amendment reducing the fees on the vouchers paid out of the different pension agencies and leave the work in the present hands, and have the work done where it is done now and save money without making any check on the business and without any centralization.

Mr. THOMPSON. I am not surprised that some gentlemen advocate the bill reported by the committee, but I am surprised that gentlemen on the other side of the House who are so fearful of anything that looks like centralization should support the bill. It is simply a question in my judgment whether the work necessary to be done can be done as efficiently in the city of Washington and for less cost than it can be done in the various agencies in the States of this nation.

Now, the argument that would centralize this business in Washington City would also make the payment of the Navy here and abolish the naval pursers and paymasters. And why stop at that. Why not have a single centralized chaplain here, especially since the introduction of the telephone, and abolish all your naval chaplains and paymasters and pursers and have a single chaplain here, and let the money be paid out and the prayers printed every morning and sowed broadcast throughout the country. This would be economy. This bill may be in itself economy, I do not know. But there is one thing I do know, that for every dollar that this bill saves to the National Treasury it will rob the pensioner of two dollars, and I am not willing that economy in so small a matter as this should be at the expense of the pensioner, and for every dollar that is saved to the nation the pensioner will lose two dollars, and the bill had better at once be made a simpler measure which would be just as honest and wise a measure and just as easily understood. If it undertook to assess the pensioner 1 or 2 per cent., that would be economy, but directly at the expense of the pensioner, and I want every man who votes for this bill, and want the country to know, it is not economy except in the single instance that the Government pays less, but every dollar it saves is robbed from the pensioner. I am for economy, but as between economy and the pensioner I am for the pensioner, and let the Government pay the expenses of giving him his pension as heretofore.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I regret exceedingly that I cannot follow, as I have done uniformly heretofore, the Committee on Appropriations in this matter. If I believed that this measure was wise, that it was in the interest of economy and of the pensioner, I would give it my most hearty support, although it may have originated in the brain of the Committee on Appropriations, and not in the brain of the Pension Committee. But, sir, I do not believe that this is a measure in the interest of economy; I do not believe that it is a measure in the interest of the tax-payers of this country, nor do I believe that it is in the interest of the pensioner himself. The Committee on Appropriations say that $130,000 is all that is necessary under their system to pay the pensioners. Well, now I want to know where they got their figures. We have the assertion of the committee, we have the assertion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] that $130,000 is ample for this purpose; but, unfortunately for the gentleman and fortunately for the House and the country, the gentleman who reported this bill [Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania] submits papers which show upon their face that it will require from $185,000 to $192,000, instead of $130,000 for this purpose.

If we take the papers the gentleman exhibited as evidence in support of this measure we find that it will require, instead of $130,000, at least $185,000. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SMITH] introduced as evidence before the House a letter from the distinguished gentleman now at the head of the Interior Department, to which I wish to call the attention of the House:

If Congress will authorize the United States Treasurer to pay all pensions from the end of the present fiscal year, I doubt not every needed arrangement can be made by that time to carry the proposed plan into successful operation.

Several plans have been suggested for the payment of pensions by the United States Treasurer. One provides for the sending out of the quarterly vouchers by the Pension Office and on return their certification to the Treasurer of the United States. Another plan provides for the sending out of the quarterly vouchers by the Pension Office, their return to the Third Auditor, and their certification by that office to the Treasurer.

Now, it is this latter policy that the Committee on Appropriations propose in their bill. Now what does Secretary Schurz say as to the cost under these provisions?

Both of these plans would require considerable addition to the clerical force of the Pension Office and that of the Third Auditor.

The Commissioner of Pensions estimates that under the first plan the increased cost would be at least $137,000. Under the second he estimates the increase at $87,000. The Third Auditor informally estimates the increased expenses of his office at $45,000. I should favor the more simple and economical plan of leaving the sending out of the vouchers and their examination on return to the office authorized to make the payments.

That is $7,000 more than you propose to appropriate for the whole service.

Under the latter plan, he says, the pension office will require $87,000. The Auditor says that his office will require an appropriation of $46,500, making more than you propose to appropriate in this bill for the whole of it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RICE, of Ohio, obtained the floor, and yielded to Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. In addition to this $137,000 the Committee on Appropriations say that there will be required an appropriation for the Treasury Department of $55,000. Now add the $55,000 to the $137,000, and you have more than $180,000 instead of $130,000.

These are the figures submitted by the committee themselves. They are the official figures from the Departments; and any other information that gentlemen have given here has been unofficial. What authority has the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] to say that $20,000 will be sufficient for the Auditor's office when the Auditor in his official report, submitted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SMITH,] says that $46,000 will be required.

In addition to that they propose to send out these checks, free of postage, while the Government has heretofore paid $31,000 as postage upon them when sent out by the pension agents. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] says that it does not cost the Government anything to send them out. Well, sir, the gentleman has made a discovery. I thought that it cost the Government something for every letter and every paper that it carried through the mails. But my distinguished friend from New York has made the discovery that it costs the Government nothing to carry the mails. Well, Mr. Chairman, it may be true that there will be no additional cost, but there will be a clear loss to the Treasury of $31,000, which would otherwise be turned into it as postage which the pension agents would be required to pay under our amendment. This is just the same as if the Government absolutely had to pay out that much money, because it is a loss of $31,000. Now adding the $31,000 to the $185,000 required under the bill of the Committee on Appropriations, it makes the aggregate about $220,000—$6,000 or $7,000 in excess of the expense proposed to be incurred by the amendment of the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Chairman, there are two parties interested in this bill, the Government and the pensioners. The gentleman who has it in charge, my esteemed colleague, [Mr. SMITH,] has brought to us many facts and figures, and has taken the suggestions of several prominent officials. He has given to us the views of the distinguished Secretaries of the Interior and the Treasury of the United States, through their letters, and has indeed devoted with diligence a great deal of time to the subject. But I notice one omission, and in my opinion it is an important omission. While he has sought the views of Government officers he has not consulted with the other of the two parties interested, the party in my view of the question who has the greatest interest in legislation upon the payment of pensions. I refer to the pensioners. Has he written to one of them for an opinion? Has he selected a single recipient of a pension, be he a general, a colonel, a major, or a private? Out of two hundred and thirty-two thousand and more pensioners not one letter has been produced showing what the opinion is as to convenience and promptness of payment; no consultation with the invalid soldier drawing a pension as to what he may think of the present system of payment; not a word from one out of the vast roll of the recipients of the amounts due them under the law for their wounds and sickness incurred during their patriotic service to the country; not a line from the widow or the orphan child who waits patiently for the day to come to receive what is due under the present convenient and prompt system of payment by the pension agents. I have no doubt but that the testimony of these 232,104 pensioners would be for the continuance of payment by the eighteen existing agencies.

Mr. Chairman, I represent in part a city in which there is located a pension agency. Many thousands of pensioners are paid there. There is no complaint. When the days of payment come around that efficient pension agent, my esteemed constituent, and his force of clerks are ready promptly and expeditiously to pay, and the work at such times is greater than the work done by any clerical force in any other department of the Government. Their work continues all the year, also. All day from early morning to long in the evenings the pension agent himself and his clerks willingly devote their time to the duties imposed by the law. I do not think a salary of $4,000 per annum is too large a salary for a pension agent. The disbursement of money is immense, the responsibility is very great, the security given is very large and, at last, duty well and honorably and conveniently performed for pensioners deserves a proper compensation. The aggregate receipts from vouchers appear large, but of that the pension agent pays for his clerks, his office expenses, including many items, probably leaving him but little if anything to add to the salary of $4,000.

Mr. Chairman, in the Forty-third Congress the voucher fee was reduced to its present amount. That was not done even then, the reduction of five cents upon each voucher, until the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, who had charge of the pension bill of that year, had received the views of many of the pension agents as to their receipts. The expenses paid by the agents were taken into consideration before the reduction was made. I am not in favor of abolishing the agencies. When the number of agents was fixed at eighteen, it having been fifty-eight, there were many double agencies in the large cities, especially one for invalids and one for widows. The two agencies were abolished, and but one remained in such places. This reduction was judicious and proper. But to abolish all the agencies and to have the pensioners paid from one would be very expensive to the Government and to the individual pensioner and the payments of the pensions would be greatly delayed, to the inconvenience of the pensioner whose wants are pressing. I hope the change will not be made.

Mr. CASWELL. Mr. Chairman, let me say in the beginning that I am not one of those at all interested in any pension agent, and I trust no one will attribute to me any such motive in what I may have to say.

I do not wonder it has been suggested by some gentlemen that the proposition to reduce the original number of pension agents from fifty-eight to eighteen could not have passed this House. I for one would never have voted for such a proposition. I am one of those who believe that the nearer we bring the paymaster to the pensioner the sooner he will receive his pay and the better it will be for him.

It is easy to be seen that during the first fifteen days of each quarter, if we would make these payments promptly, a very large force will be necessary. We can understand it would be entirely impracticable to maintain such a force at the Treasury Department of this Government for so short a period. That, however, can easily be done at the several pension agencies. We all understand that these agents can with great ease secure the necessary force to adjust the vouchers and make the payments promptly. But such is not practicable in our Government Departments, and it cannot be put in successful practice.

To avoid this, it has been suggested that we divide these pensioners into twelve classes and assign to each class a certain number of days for payment.

Mr. Chairman, a moment's reflection will satisfy the House that such is utterly impossible. For instance, you may assign the first eighteen thousand men on the pension-roll to the first six days of the quarter. If we could control the men who are to sign and send forward the vouchers and have them executed and forwarded within that period, we might regulate the payments in that way. But, sir, those vouchers would arrive at all periods through the entire quarter, and those which reach the Department later than the period assigned to them would either displace those of the second or third class or they would be laid aside, and as a matter of necessity their payment would be delayed beyond the period assigned to them, and the pensioner compelled to wait sixty or ninety days or displace the payment of others. Confusion would follow, because we cannot control the men who sign and send forward the vouchers or fix the time in which they will be presented. This shows it would be utterly impracticable to divide and classify the payments.

Let me suggest, Mr. Chairman, that we continue the classification in the eighteen which we now have, and the payments be made as they now are at the eighteen pension agencies. This is quite practicable. They can at each of the agencies summon such temporary force as will be needed to adjust the vouchers, and pay them off within a few days at the longest. I am in favor of economy, and I have not risen to question the motive of any gentleman on this floor in that direction. As the law now is there is a limit to the expense, but if you send these men to the Treasury for payment there is no limit to the expense which may follow.

I have no doubt, sir, the present agents are receiving too much compensation. That grows out of the fault of the law as applicable to the consolidation. The voucher fee is too large. But that is the result of the consolidation. This excessive compensation will continue until Congress corrects the evil. The fault heretofore has been in the law enacted for the payment of a larger agency, but if it remains much longer the responsibility will rest upon us. The amendment, however, offered by the gentleman from Maine by direction of the Committee on Pensions, reduces this compensation to one which is just and fair.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Mr. Chairman, the only practical question which remains before the committee is the choice between two plans, one submitted by the Committee on Appropriations and the other by the Committee on Pensions. This debate, if it has had no other effect, has had this one, and that is to prove we can save by the more expensive of the two plans suggested over $100,000 annually in the cost of paying pensions, and that amount will pay for the time and labor given to the discussion.

If the Committee on Pensions had suggested their plan to the Committee on Appropriations at the outset I have no doubt it would have been accepted. There was no plan before us and we were compelled to dig one out for ourselves. Now as between the two plans submitted to the House I am quite clear the Committee on Appropriations have devised the more effective and more economical one. I have heard no good objection to it, but it has been loudly asserted that the pensioner will be robbed, but no specification as to the mode of robbery was made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania who indulged in that language. But my colleague on the committee from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] did specify it would come in the loss of interest. Mr. Chairman, I am astonished that my colleague on the committee should not have looked more carefully into the subject. We do not propose to delay the payment of the pensioner one hour. Let me say there is a simple mode by which pensioners can be paid even under the present system from the Treasurer's Office so as not to produce delay. It appears from the statement made by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. POWERS] the number of variations in the pay-rolls in each quarter are from 12,000 to 15,000, being only 5 per cent. of the total number of pensioners.

These variations occur only in the cases where there are widows who remarry or where there are minor children who come to the age of sixteen years. Now, the pay-rolls show the number of these persons and give their names. All, therefore, that the Treasurer has to do is to set his force at work to draw checks, omitting all the cases where there are minor children or where there are widows; and then when the vouchers come back he will merely have to compare them with the omitted name. There are only fifteen thousand of them, and in five days, at the rate of three thousand a day, which is less than his estimate of a day's work, he can complete them all; and that is all the delay that occurs. But no doubt even this delay can be avoided when the system gets fairly in operation.

Now, I come to the statement of my friend from Alabama, [Mr. HEWITT.] He says that the figures of the Committee on Appropriations show it will cost $192,000. He is mistaken. His first figure is got from the Commissioner of Pensions, who says the cost of the first plan, which we do not propose to adopt, will be $137,000. We propose to adopt the second plan, the cost of which he estimates at $84,000, but in which he makes an error of an allowance of $6,000, reducing the amount to $78,000. Now, this $78,000 is a large and liberal estimate, because he now has a body of clerks who are compelled to keep up a pay-roll in his own office, as he says, not entirely perfect but which must be perfected under the system which we propose. The allowance of $85,000, which we made for filling up the vouchers, to be done in the Pension Office, is abundantly ample, and has been gone over by a gentleman, whose letter is printed in one of these documents before the House, Mr. August Huddenhauser, one of the clerks of the Treasury. It will be found on page 13 of miscellaneous Senate document No. 33 of the present session of Congress. In that estimate he allows for the Pension Office $60,000. We allow $65,000. In the Third Auditor's Office, where—and I call attention of gentlemen to this fact—the Third Auditor himself only asks $40,000 to $45,000, and not $46,500, as stated by the gentleman from Alabama—in that office there is already kept a roll. (I observe the gentleman from Alabama is looking for the estimate. I will give him the page. It is on page 13.) There is already kept a pension-roll; and with the addition of $20,000 Mr. Huddenhauser estimates that all the comparison of the vouchers can be made, and there cannot be a doubt that the allowance is sufficiently large, when it is considered that the variations do not exceed fifteen thousand in any one quarter, or sixty thousand a year. The allowance of $20,000 is therefore at the rate of 33½ cents for each voucher in which any change occurs involving computation.

The total expense up to this stage is therefore only $85,000. And then there only remains the filling up and mailing of the checks, the cost of which the Treasurer gives at $55,000, which makes the sum of $140,000, as I showed in my remarks of yesterday. Now there is no possibility of exceeding this outlay for doing all the work which is done by the pension agencies at a cost of $315,000, unless either the Commissioner of Pensions, or the Third Auditor, or the Treasurer is mistaken in his estimates. It has been stated that the Commissioner of Pensions has made a different estimate to the Committee on Pensions, and says that one hundred and fifty clerks will be required in lieu of the fifty-one clerks which he estimated for in his letter of November 27, 1877. But I will not be so unjust to the Commissioner of Pensions as to believe that these conflicting estimates are made for the same work, and indeed I am sure that the fault will not be found with him for this apparent discrepancy. The committee have simply misapprehended his reply, or he has misunderstood their question.

Now the only question remaining is whether the system will work. There is nothing else before this House. Gentlemen here who have not taken the trouble to go to the Departments, and who have not seen the heads of bureaus, say it will not work. But I have been in person to all of them. I have interrogated them. I have investigated the work. It is as plain and simple work as is done in the counting-house of any merchant. There is no reason for delay; and I say that instead of its costing more than $140,000, in my judgment the work can be done for $100,000. I can understand how eighteen pension agents can bring a great deal of influence to bear upon this House. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THOMPSON] referred to telephones. They have got telephones that speak here through a great many mouths. The only telephone which I want to hear in this Hall is that which comes from the great mass of the tax-paying people of this country who are now oppressed under the great load of national, State, and municipal taxation which has destroyed the prosperity of the country and will entirely prevent its recovery until we introduce and carry out these measures of economy. The pensioners do not stand in the way of retrenchment. In proportion to their means they have more to gain by it than any class in the community, for the taxation which we impose here enters into every article of clothing which they wear and every portion of food which they consume. What they want is the full worth of their money when they get it, and the best friend of the pensioner is not the member who talks loudest on this floor, but the one who votes to reduce taxation in every case where it will not impair the efficiency of the public service. I can tell gentlemen that the work of reduction initiated in the Forty-fourth Congress will have to go a great deal further and deeper before the expectations and just demands of the people for retrenchment in the public expenditures will be satisfied.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania, rose.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I move that the committee rise. My object is that the House may close debate on the pending paragraph and amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. BANNING having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. GARFIELD reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 3974) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1879, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I move that the rules be suspended and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to resume the consideration of the special order; and pending that motion I move that all debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto be limited to one minute.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I move to amend that by striking out "one minute" and substituting "five minutes."

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, it was not agreed to.

The motion limiting debate to one minute was agreed to.

The motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. GARFIELD in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the pension appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The House has ordered that all debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto be limited to one minute. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SMITH] as having the floor.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I do not desire to occupy the time.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, all the formal amendments will be considered as withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I offer the following amendment:

In line 15 strike out the word "eighty-five" and insert in lieu thereof the word "fifty," and add to the paragraph the following:

Provided, That a fee of $1 and no more shall be paid to examining surgeons for each examination of pensioners as provided by law, except when the examination is made by a board of surgeons, in which case the fees now allowed by law shall be paid.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Does the gentleman offer that amendment by authority of the Committee on Pensions?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I do.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

For Navy pensions to invalids, $210,000; and for widows and dependent relatives, $334,000; for fees of examining surgeons, $1,000, as provided by the several acts of Congress: Provided, That the appropriations aforesaid for Navy pensions and other expenditures under that head shall be paid from the income of the Navy pension fund, so far as the same may be sufficient for that purpose.

Mr. HANNA. I move to strike out the last word. I would not have troubled the House with a single word if it had not been for the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] and the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT,] who thought proper to call attention to the fact that I am the member from the Indianapolis district that has a pension agency, and therefore, perchance, I was actuated by mercenary motives; and also for the remarks of the gentleman who last took his seat, who took occasion to say that some members upon this floor spoke through telephones, and that those telephones were perchance pension agents. I say to him that the telephone through which I speak is more than twenty thousand pensioners in Indiana who by the passage of this bill as it has been reported would be wronged and robbed; and experience will prove that if you put this bill in force the pittance which the Government of the United States has allowed to the pensioners of my patriotic State will be wrung from them and that they will be robbed of it by shysters and agents around the city of Indianapolis, and it will fall into the hands of the bankers and business men in New York, who hope under the operation of this bill to have the $28,000,000 transferred to the depositaries of New York City. Talk to me about mercenary motives! If I had occasion to seek for mercenary motives under the guise of business I would trace it to the hope that this $28,000,000 to pay pensioners is to find its way into the banks of New York as another means of making the West and South tributary, as we have been long enough, to New York City. [Laughter and applause.] Talk to me about mercenary motives! I could find them if I thought proper to dwell upon that.

As to the remark made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] in reference to myself, I do not deign to reply to anything so groveling. I say that the delay and hazard to which you will subject the pensioners by the passage of this bill will practically result in robbing them of their pensions, and there is no way to avoid it. How many applications for pensions are pending to-day from meritorious claimants that cannot be heard and perchance may not be heard for a year. Why is it that nearly one hundred thousand applications have not been heard? It is not by reason of any fault on the part of the Commissioner of Pensions, but because your Committee on Appropriations, insisting on a peculiar policy, have refused to make appropriations for the necessary clerks in that office and in the offices of the Adjutant-General and the Surgeon-General. The committee now propose to subject two hundred and odd thousand pensioners to the same niggardly policy, to prevent the administration of public justice. I want you to think of it. This is not a party question.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] attempted to raise the party cry on this question. God forbid that the democratic party, low as it is, should sink so low as to be controlled by party considerations in the discussion of a question of this sort. That will not do. [Applause.]

Mr. SPARKS. I dislike a speech of the character of the one just made by the gentleman from Indiana.

It is always unpleasant to me when I have done full justice and treated an opponent with fairness and kindness that he should come back at me like a Texas bull or a bear. I spoke respectfully of the gentleman from Indiana, as every gentleman knows who heard me, as much so as it was possible for one gentleman to speak of another. I did say that he was from a city in which was located a pension agency, and that it was natural that human prejudices should make him feel especially interested in holding that office there.

The gentleman says that I have drawn politics into this debate. In that peculiar manner that he has of looking ugly and talking loud and saying harsh things, he says that I have tried to drag in politics here. Sir, that charge is not warranted by anything that I have said, and therefore, to express it mildly, it is not the fact. I commended the excellent chairman of our subcommittee, [Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania,] a republican, who is the author of this measure. I spoke of his action with unbounded respect. I tried in every word that I uttered to commend the action of republicans who had attempted to relieve the country of this unpardonable robbery of the public Treasury and the pensioners through these cormorant pension agents. I commended specially the gentleman from Pennsylvania, a republican member, who had suggested this plan for saving the public money. It is true I did intimate that many of these agents had been appointed originally through political partiality, and I further said that the other party (my own) now soon to get control of this Government—the party which by fairness ought to have it now—would be in the same trouble with these pension agents if they were continued. The members of the party shortly to come into power have an eye for office as well as other men; and if that party had the dispensation of these offices it would very likely dispense them like other men.

Mr. CHITTENDEN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending on which debate has been exhausted.

Mr. HANNA. I withdraw the amendment, so that the gentleman may renew it.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. Mr. Chairman, I renew the amendment. I wish in all seriousness to show how little force there is in the arguments of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HANNA] and other gentlemen against this proposition. I have no more to do with the banks of New York than the gentleman has; every syllable, every letter of his in respect to that is as applicable to him as to me. That ends that. Now, in regard to the question of the robbery of pensioners, the gentleman might as well charge me with putting my hand into his pocket and stealing whatever money he has in it as to use any such a phrase as that with reference to the operation of this proposed measure of the Appropriation Committee now under consideration. It is simply "bosh." [Laughter and applause.] It is unworthy of any man who is capable of having votes enough to bring him to this floor. There is not a word of truth or sense in it. [Laughter and applause.] Now I will prove it.

The statements presented here yesterday (and I ask for them the attention of every man here who understands figures) show that 87½ per cent. of the pensioners have lately received their pay through the post-office to their satisfaction. Now any man at all candid, any man capable of rising above party and personal interests in this hour of his country's need, should ask himself, if 87½ per cent. of these payments have been satisfactorily made through the post-office, what difficulty is there in paying all the rest in the same way? This consideration answers every word that has been uttered against the practicability and justice and fairness of paying all the pensioners through the Treasury Department at Washington. The objection to this system is absurd; it is not grounded in reason, in common sense, in business sense or in any sense, but looks simply to the interest of fifty-eight agents whose time is out. The agencies have done their work. Their establishment was in some sort a war measure. The war is over, and the time has come when we, the Representatives of the people, must undertake to get back to peaceful methods and to do the things that make for peace—the things which tend to restore our whole country to that degree of brilliant prosperity which is at once its birthright and sure inheritance.

Now, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HANNA] is a lawyer, an eloquent lawyer; he can "make the worse appear the better reason;" but I say to him that no pensioner of his district or State or of any State of the Union will be injured or robbed by this bill if it shall pass, and it is high time his stale thrusts at "bloated bondholders" ceased.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania, obtained the floor.

Mr. HANNA. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to yield to me for a few minutes.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I will give the gentleman two minutes.

Mr. HANNA. In order that I may be correctly understood, I wish to explain what I mean by saying that this bill will result in practical robbery. Take, for instance, the pension agency in my own district. The salary is $4,000; voucher fees, $14,515; contingent expenses, $1,657.76; total, $20,172.76. Now, bear in mind that out of this the pension agent pays all his clerk hire, his rent, his fuel, his postage, the entire expenses of the office.

Mr. FORT. How much does he pay?

Mr. HANNA. Why does not the Appropriations Committee give us the facts instead of howling about "fraud?"

Mr. SPARKS. The gentleman has adverted to me once or twice, I think, rather severely. Will he allow me to ask him a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The two minutes of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HANNA] have expired. The gentleman from Pennsylvania resumes the floor.

Mr. SPARKS. I wish to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time is out.

Mr. SPARKS. I want merely to ask the gentleman from Indiana whether his law partner is the pension agent at Indianapolis.

Mr. HANNA. I will answer that.

Mr. SPARKS. Do.

Mr. HANNA. I will say that my law partner fought in the war from the first to the last; he fought with Hooker above the clouds; he fought for the Union when you did not.

Mr. SPARKS. I want it distinctly understood that the law partner of the gentleman is the pension agent at Indianapolis; and I can prove it, and "That's what's the matter with HANNA!" [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN, (who had been rapping vigorously with his gavel during the preceding colloquy between Mr. HANNA and Mr. SPARKS.) The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SMITH] has the floor. The Chair does not intend to allow debate out of order to be heard, if he can prevent it.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I give notice that I shall not indulge in any personality. I think that this proposition ought to commend itself to every man who looks at the facts as presented. Those facts I endeavored to present yesterday, and this morning they appear in the RECORD. Now, how have they been gainsaid?

Mr. KEIFER. Will the gentleman allow me just one remark in regard to a statement in his speech of yesterday?

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I beg the gentleman not to interrupt me now.

Gentlemen have not looked at the facts presented in the RECORD, or they have entirely ignored them. Some gentleman has referred to the absence of facts. Such has not been the case, Mr. Chairman. I put the official statement upon record, furnishing the exact amount paid to those pension agents. Is that denied? No; on the contrary all these gentlemen who have risen here, and especially my friend from Maine in his opening, have said the facts stated by me as to the exorbitant salaries paid to these pension agents are correct. That much at least has been gained. It is a point on which we are all agreed. Even those opposed to this proposition admit that.

Now, what in reference to the next point? Is there any delay to result from this change? There was none when the fifty-eight pension agencies were consolidated to eighteen, and there need not be any when the eighteen agencies are consolidated into one.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this morning before I left my room a pensioner, a soldier who had lost a leg at Atlanta, called on me and stated that he had been in service at the Treasury Department for ten years; that he understands this whole subject; and he undertook to say in the presence of the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions that the amount I put originally of $96,000 was sufficient, he supposed, at least after the machine had been got into working order, and that the $130,000 provided for the first year would be amply sufficient. He is a man of experience in this matter. He is the same gentleman who wrote the intelligent letter which may be found in the RECORD.

Mr. POWERS. What State was he appointed from?

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. That has nothing to do with this case, but he was not appointed from Pennsylvania. We are now acting in reference to the good of the whole country and how to secure the best results at the lowest cost. I do not care where these gentlemen come from when they furnish us with intelligent statements and valuable facts.

One word further, Mr. Chairman, in reply to those gentlemen who have spoken on this subject and said this would work an injury to the pensioner. In this statement they are directly at variance with the record. My bill is intended to protect the pensioner. It gives him a check from the Treasurer of the United States instead of a check from the pension agent, and a check from the Treasurer of the United States is equivalent to gold. In addition, it affords facilities to the pensioners to make oath before certain revenue officers, which the existing laws do not give them.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate on the pending paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Perhaps by unanimous consent debate can be closed without going into the House.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. Very well; I ask by unanimous consent that all further debate on the pending paragraph be closed. There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending formal amendments will be considered as withdrawn, and the Chair will direct the Clerk to read the next paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pensions payable under the act of March 3, 1878, namely, for survivors of the war of 1812, $532,000; for widows of the war of 1812, $967,974; Provided, That so much of this sum as may be necessary shall be immediately available.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. It has been stated here that the Commissioner of Pensions has written a letter in which he states the expenses in this bureau, if this change be made, would not exceed over sixty or seventy thousand dollars.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Seventy-eight thousand dollars.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Very well, sir; $78,000. The Committee on Invalid Pensions had the Commissioner of Pensions before them when this bill was first reported to the House and we propounded to him the question, "If this bill passes in the form in which it is presented to the House what will be the additional cost in your bureau?" He said he could not do the additional work which would be required in that office with less than one hundred and fifty additional clerks. That is what he stated to the Committee on Pensions long after this letter to which the Committee on Appropriations has referred.

I have one word to say to this side of the House. Pass this bill in the form in which it is presented and the Commissioner of Pensions tells you in his letter that it will require one hundred and fifty more clerks in his office to perform the additional duties imposed upon him by this bill. When he asks for those one hundred and fifty additional clerks will you refuse to give them to him? Will you gentlemen who represent northern constituencies dare to do it, backed as he would be by two hundred and thirty thousand pensioners? Will you refuse him when he comes here and demands that additional force? He tells you he cannot get along without it. He will do it—be sure of that—be sure he will make the demand and you will not dare refuse it. Then instead of a reduction of expenditures you will only be increasing them. You will be putting yourself absolutely in the power of a bureau in Washington; a bureau whose demand you have never refused and dare not refuse. In addition, remember, the first time this change comes into effect will be September next and everybody admits on both sides of the question there will be delay of a month or more. I give you this word of warning and remember it.

My honest opinion is the amendment of the Committee on Pensions will save more money to the country and to the tax-paying people than the proposition of the Committee on Appropriations. It makes no change in the manner of paying pensions. It makes no radical change, but remedies an evil which has grown up heretofore in paying enormous salaries to pension agents. That has been the complaint of the country, and that evil has been remedied.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions has cut it down. We have carefully estimated it, and we do not believe that a solitary pension agent can possibly receive more than $4,000 per annum.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LATHROP. I have only a word that I care to say on this subject. In the first place, I am absolutely opposed to any and every proposition to concentrate in the city of Washington what can be done as well elsewhere. It has been one constant and growing tendency until you have here in this city a community of one hundred and twenty thousand or one hundred and forty thousand inhabitants; but, if you inquire what it is made up of, you find it has no general business and is composed of officeholders, clerks, and claim agents. And every tendency and every power of that community is exerted here day by day to concentrate the management of affairs still further in these Departments.

Here is a new proposition. There is one suggestion I wish to make in regard to it. Every Government building here is crowded like a bee-hive ready to swarm. The Government is now paying well-nigh $200,000 per annum rent in this city to accommodate the business already here. The attempt is made to have these buildings multiplied, and multiplied they must be if this system of concentration is to be pursued. Every proposition to bring work here is in that direction. And yet work which can be done anywhere in the country for $1 cannot be done here for less than $2. I make no complaint of the officers, I make no complaint that in these crowded Departments we must go through a whole line of red-tape formalities; nor that if you have an errand to do you must begin Monday morning, and if you have it done Saturday night you have done marvelously well. The officers are obliging, and employees diligent so far as I know. The formalities are necessary to save from confusion. But I am opposed to adding another day's work to the Departments in this city as a mere matter of public policy when it can be done as economically in other parts of the country. I am in favor of every economy suggested by the Committee on Appropriations or the Committee on Pensions, and if it is true, as alleged here, that these agents are paid more than they ought to be, then I will vote with any man who wishes to cut their emoluments down to a living point. But I agree with the Commissioner of Pensions in his statement that this labor can be done in the country 40 per cent. at least cheaper than it can be done here. And in view of that fact, which no man will stand up here and deny, is it not true, when with a given amount of labor to be done you propose to bring it here and concentrate it in these Departments and swell up the appropriations which have to be made to them, that thereby you deliberately determine to increase the expense 40 per cent. above what it ought to be rather than effect any economy? It seems to me wise to leave these agencies as convenient to the pensioner as possible, and see to it that no unnecessary cost or expense is incurred.

Mr. HENDERSON. If I believed, Mr. Chairman, that any saving of expense could be made to the Government without injury or detriment to the pensioner, I for one would be willing to vote for the change proposed by this bill, and which abolishes the pension agencies. But I am satisfied in my own mind from such examination as I have been able to give the subject that this cannot be done. Gentlemen talk about a saving of expense. How is it to be made? We have now eighteen pension agents. Abolish their offices and who are to take their places? Is some one man to do it? Is some one of the heads of the bureaus in the Treasury Department to have charge of the business of paying pensioners? Or will it not require a number of reliable and responsible officers to have charge of it? If but one man is assigned to this duty and is to take charge of this matter of disbursing so many millions of dollars in all parts of the country, it seems to me delay in making payments would be unavoidable, and injury, expense, and trouble would result to the pensioner. If a number of officers are to have charge of the business in addition to all the necessary clerks, as I believe will be the case, then where is the saving? Mr. Chairman, in disbursing so many millions of dollars, in paying so many pensioners scattered all over the country, in examining so many vouchers and performing all the responsible duties connected with the payment of pensions, I doubt very much whether it can be done much more economically than by the agencies now established. I am in favor of economy, but not at the expense of the wounded, crippled, and maimed soldier of his country. Although I might feel assured that there would be some saving of expense to the Government, yet I would not favor this change if it is to be at the expense of the pensioner, if it is to involve him in expense, in trouble and delay in getting the small pension allowed him. If that is to be the result, and I believe it will be, Mr. Chairman, I do not favor any such economy as that.

In consolidating the pension agencies and reducing the number to eighteen the compensation has been largely increased, and it should be reduced. It is a just and rightful economy to do that, and I am in favor of it, so as to give to pension agents a just and reasonable compensation for their services, their labor and responsibility, and if I believed any great saving could be made without delay to the pensioner in receiving his pension I would be in favor of the change proposed by the bill; but I do not, and am therefore opposed to the change and shall vote for the amendment which has been agreed upon by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, as I understand, and which was offered by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. POWERS,] a member of that committee.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Mr. Chairman, I do not like the change proposed in the mode of paying our pensions. It must necessarily crowd an amount of business into one locality and upon one officer that will largely delay the transaction of business. That is my first objection to it. My next objection to it is that this delay is going to operate with great hardship upon those who receive but a pittance, for the pensions are paid in small sums. A delay of a week in the obtaining of a pension is a matter of great importance to those who receive it. It is not a matter merely of the sending a paper and the signing of a paper. Every voucher sent to the Pension Office, whether it be here or elsewhere, must be examined before action can be taken upon it and the check returned to the pensioner. There is another view which I want to commend to my friends on the opposite side of the House. We are not above the idea of patronage and those who are out of the power of distributing patronage are jealous of its use. That is natural, and I find no fault with it, but this bill proposes to put the patronage of $900,000 into the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury, and that will stand against the power of appointing eighteen pension agents. This patronage instead of being diminished is to be increased by this bill.

But there is another difficulty which I propose to meet right here. It is proposed really that members of Congress shall do the pension business of the country. That is what it will come to. We are the hardest-worked men in the country. I do not hesitate to say that we stand here to run the errands of our constituents; and I am perfectly willing to do the work if I can do it within twenty-four hours; but if I am to have four thousand letters a year added to my present correspondence in addition to getting pensions for my constituents, the burden will be greater than I can bear, and I say to you, if you pass this bill the consequences be upon your own heads. I have a little satisfaction in the fact that you will have to suffer yourselves if you pass your bill.

The formal amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. WAIT. I cannot understand from any gentleman who has thus far spoken that we have any evidence before the House to prove that the existing system has not worked admirably well up to the present time. We all of us, without regard to party relations, claim to be the friends of the unfortunate men and women who are to some extent dependent on the public bounty and the small aid which they receive from the Government in the shape of pensions. Now, if we really believe in the principle that this is an obligation that the country owes to its gallant wounded and disabled soldiers and to the widows and orphans of the brave men who are dead, and that we should aid them in this manner, then I say that every facility which enables us to carry this small pittance to them with the least embarrassment and expense, and which is given by existing laws, should be continued in full force and not in any manner invaded or embarrassed by placing difficulties in the way of payment.

We all must see the very great embarrassments which now exist in obtaining the payment of pensions on the part of those unfortunate persons who are entitled to the same from the General Government. Work has got so far behind at the present time in the hearing and deciding on applications for pensions that in the Pension Bureau, or rather in the Surgeon-General's Office, it takes a year and a half for one of these men or women who are entitled to this public aid to obtain an answer to their letters of inquiry, and the House has recently found that it was compelled in justice to these applicants to put an additional force of clerks on in the office of the Surgeon-General in order to bring the business up with correctness and dispatch. If you impose this additional burden upon the Pension Bureau the pensions would not be paid until months and months after the proper time when the parties entitled to the same should receive them under the obligations of the law. The pensioners of the country deprecate this proposed legislation and beg that they may not be subjected to the red-tape and delays that would inevitably follow the proposed change in the existing laws.

The gentleman who now presides over the Pension Bureau, Hon. Mr. Bentley, is probably as faithful, competent, and efficient a public officer as ever filled this very responsible position. He is honest and intelligent and has had large experience, and his opinion in reference to this matter ought to have very great weight with the House in its action in the premises. I hope that the proposition submitted by the Committee on Appropriations will not prevail.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BURCHARD. I fail to see how the pending proposition will perform the necessary work any cheaper than it is done under the existing law. I fail to see how it is that any necessary force to perform the various duties connected with the recognition of the pensioners, the examination and passing upon the vouchers, can be done any cheaper in the Treasurer's Office at Washington than it can be done at the various agencies in the country. I understand that under the system now in force the roll that is made up at the pension agencies from records kept at the Pension Office must be kept somewhere and transmitted to the Treasurer's Office.

It is proposed that the whole work shall be done in the Treasurer's Office. It is now done in the pension agencies so far as clerical work is concerned. This is not a proposition to reduce the compensation of the officers now employed. We are now paying four-thousand-dollar salaries, and it costs a certain sum for the examination of vouchers, amounting in the aggregate to about $300,000 a year. It may not be necessary to pay as much money as that for this service, but it is absolutely necessary that there should be a clerical force to do the work, and that force will be necessary in the Treasurer's Office, if we transfer this work to that office. It is necessary now in the pension agencies, and mark you that from the day when Alexander Hamilton established our treasury system it has always been required that more than one officer shall pass upon anything done in the Treasury. You must have two sets of officers to do the work, one to issue the checks or make payment to pensioners, the other to pass upon the accounts and vouchers. The work must be performed somewhere, and you must provide the necessary clerical force to do that work in the Treasurer's Office if you transfer the work now done at the pension agencies to the Treasurer's Office. Nothing would be saved in that respect by the transfer. If the agents' salaries and emoluments are too large reduce their fees and compensation. It is not necessary to abolish their offices.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate.

Mr. DURHAM. I suggest to the gentleman that by unanimous consent we agree that debate on this pending paragraph be closed.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, debate upon the pending paragraph will be considered as closed and the formal amendments pending to it will be considered as rejected. The Chair hears no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

That from and after July 1, 1872, or as soon thereafter as practicable, pensions shall be paid by the Treasurer of the United States, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the sum of $30,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, not otherwise appropriated, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated to carry this act into effect; and this sum shall be immediately available: Provided, That until the said act is carried into effect, the special paying agents shall not be allowed more than ten cents per voucher, and shall, in addition to their proportion of salaries, be paid only for such contingencies as may be approved by the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of the Treasury. And all acts and supplements of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. POWERS. I desire now to offer the amendment I have already indicated.

The CHAIRMAN. The question will first be taken on the amendments from the Committee on Appropriations, as indicated yesterday by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SMITH.] These amendments are directed to perfecting the text of the paragraph. When they have been voted on, the amendment of the gentleman from Maine to strike out and insert will be in order.

The amendments offered by Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania, on behalf of the Committee on Appropriations were read and agreed to, as follows:

In the thirty-seventh line, after the word "Treasury," insert "and the Secretary of the Interior;" so that the last paragraph will read:

That from and after July 1, 1878, or as soon thereafter as practicable, pensions shall be paid by the Treasurer of the United States, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of the Interior, &c.

In the thirty-eighth line strike out "96" and insert "120;" so as to read: "and the sum of $130,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary," &c.

In the forty-first line, before the word "provided," insert the following:

Provided, That the pensioner and his witnesses may make affidavit to the voucher before any United States officer authorized to administer oaths or before any collector of the internal revenue, who is hereby authorized and required to administer the oath, said oaths to be administered free of charge: And provided, That where the affidavit has been made before such officers or justices of the peace a certificate of the prothonotary or clerk of the court shall not be necessary unless specially demanded by the Third Auditor: And provided further, That false swearing before the said United States officers shall be deemed perjury and subject the offender to the penalty of the same: And provided further, That the voucher may be modified or dispensed with if, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior, the Treasurer of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury, the same can be done without detriment to the Government.

In the forty-seventh line, and after the word "and," insert "an act establishing paying pension agencies and;" so as to read:

And the act establishing paying pension agencies and all acts and supplements of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. POWERS. I move to amend by striking out the whole of the pending paragraph after the words "eighteen hundred and seventy-eight," in line 2, and inserting in lieu thereof what I send to the Clerk. The Clerk read as follows:

Agents for the payment of pensions shall, in lieu of the percentage fees, pay, and allowances now provided by law, be allowed and paid the following compensation for their services, postage upon vouchers and checks sent to the pensioners, and all the expenses of their offices:

First. A salary at the rate of $4,000 per annum.

Second. Fifteen dollars for each one hundred vouchers prepared and paid by any agent in excess of four thousand vouchers per annum.

Third. Actual and necessary expenses for rent, fuel, and lights, and for postage on official matter directed to the Departments and bureaus at Washington, to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior; and the sum of $216,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated to pay the salaries, fees, and allowances to said pension agents; and all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. DURHAM. Although I am not in charge of this bill, I make a point of order on this amendment, under Rule 120, that it is new legislation and not in the interest of economy.

Mr. POWERS. I contend that it is in the interest of economy; that it reduces the expense of the existing system $106,000, and that it is pertinent to the subject-matter of the bill.

Mr. BURCHARD. As the provision reported in the bill would not be in order under the rules but for its being in the interest of economy, this provision is germane as an amendment, although it may change an existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair, upon examination of the amendment, is constrained to overrule the point of order. Although the Chair does not feel competent to say whether the whole scheme will be more economical than the one proposed by the Committee on Appropriations, yet the amendment on its face reduces fees and salaries below what they are under the existing law.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which has just been read is presented by me at the request and by the instruction of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, after a careful consideration of this whole subject. If I have not mistaken the gravamen of the charge in reference to the pension agents, it is that, especially since the consolidation of agencies, they receive too large fees. This amendment cuts down their fees to the extent of $106,000, and I think no gentleman who carefully considers what these agents have to do and the expenses to which they are subjected can say that if this amendment be adopted they will receive anything more than a fair and reasonable compensation. I print, as a part of my remarks, the following table:

Table showing the number of pensioners on the rolls of the several pension agencies on the 1st of January, 1878; the amount of compensation, fees, and allowances received, and the amounts expended for use of office by the several pension agents, from July 1, 1877, to December 31, 1878; together with a statement showing the average cost per pensioner to the Government and to the agent during that period.

No one complains that this business of paying pensions is not now very well done through the several agencies, except that there is now somewhat more delay than before the consolidation. Why should we enter upon the new and untried scheme proposed by the Committee on Appropriations? I have seen no statement that I regard as reliable which at all satisfies me that, should we transfer this business to a bureau to be established in Washington, the expense will not be larger than under the existing system.

Much has been said about the letter of the Commissioner of Pensions which has been read here. Sir, the Commissioner on the 23d of March last sent a letter to the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, from which letter I take a paragraph which I ask the Clerk to read, as it shows the views of the Commissioner after careful consideration in regard to this change.

The Clerk read as follows:

An element which would greatly affect the economical side of the question in case of transfer of the pay duties either to the Pension Office or to the Treasury Department has not been mentioned.

I have been unable to devise a plan by which the payments can be spread over each quarter so that the volume of duties and labor would be about the same from day to day and furnish constant employment to a certain working force.

In a communication addressed to the honorable Secretary of the Interior on the 20th of last November, discussing the subject of abolishing the agencies, I stated that I thought such a plan might be adopted, but after much study of the subject I am convinced that it is impracticable. The success of such a plan depends largely upon elements over which the office making the payment would have no control. It would be necessary that the executed vouchers should come in for payment with regularity, so that each pensioner could be paid at regular intervals of three months. Any irregularity in this respect would at once produce confusion and cause delay in the payments.

It needs no argument nor the experience under the present plan of making all the payments due on a day certain, each quarter, to prove that vouchers would come in large numbers on a day subsequent to that upon which the pensioner would be entitled to his turn for payment, and that condition is alone fatal to the plan, as any plan of payment which shall be adopted must make the payments as promptly as they are now made, in order to give satisfaction to the pensioners, and it will be found inexpedient to reduce the cost of payment if the present promptness of making the payment cannot be maintained.

A plan for the payment at either the Treasury Department or the Pension Bureau must include provisions for the payments to fall due, all on a stated day, once in three months, as under the present system; and this necessitates the employment of a much larger force for one month of each quarter than is needed for the balance of the time, and in the Departments it is nearly if not quite impossible to handle economically a force of employees which is subject to such frequent additions and reductions, for obvious reasons.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. REED obtained the floor and yielded his time to Mr. POWERS. Mr. POWERS. On March 23 that was the view of the Commission of Pensions, and he fully believes in those statements to-day. I think that is a sufficient answer to what has been read from any previous communication from him and I believe it will be admitted by all that he knows something about this whole matter. Much more in fact than any other person in Washington.

Let me see whether gentlemen on the Committee on Appropriations have any fixed opinion or any definite plan which they have devised to pay these pensioners and to pay them promptly. I find, by referring to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on page 43, the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] did give us a scheme. It is as follows:

But there is a far better system than the quarterly system. It is one which will commend itself to the judgment of the House as it has to the mind of every public officer who has taken it into consideration; and that is to divide the roll of pensioners into twelve equal parts and let one-twelfth be paid the quarterly pensions each month, so that the work goes unceasingly on and the payment of pensions will be made with perfect regularity.

I refer to this not to take any special advantage of it as a technical quibble, but to show how little the whole subject has been looked into when this scheme was devised. Divide the roll of pensioners into twelve equal parts and let one-twelfth be paid a quarterly pension each month. Then you will get through the roll at the end of the year, and not before. In this way you will pay the pensioner once a year instead of every quarter. If that is not the only interpretation of the language of the gentleman from New York, I do not see what other construction it is susceptible of. I do not suppose the gentleman intended it, but that is what it means, and all it could be made to mean, that you are to divide the roll into twelve equal parts and pay one-twelfth a quarterly pension each month. It will take the entire year to pay them, and as you pay each a quarterly pension you will pay only one-fourth part of what is due them. This certainly would be economy with a vengeance. You divide the pension-rolls into three equal parts and then pay one-fourth each month, and you will pay them four times a year and their whole amount. I should like to know what officer or what man that scheme has ever been submitted to. I know the gentleman did not intend anything of the kind, but it is indicative of how carefully the Committee on Appropriations have matured their scheme. I ask any gentleman to read it. Adopt that which he says will commend itself to every gentleman in this House, and you will only pay once a year and you will only pay one-fourth part of the sum actually done. Well might this cost less.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The simple answer to all the gentleman has said is that I have never said any such thing as that which he attributes to me and my language is not susceptible of any such construction.

Mr. POWERS. I know, or at least presume, you did not intend to thus deprive the poor pensioner of his pittance, but I submit no other conclusion can be drawn from your proposition. It is a fair sample of the whole scheme, immature as it has been presented here, as I could fully demonstrate it to be if I had the time for that purpose.

This matter has just begun to get to the country, Mr. Chairman, and I have received a great many letters on the subject, as I have no doubt other gentlemen have. I see that they have held a meeting at Des Moines, Iowa, in reference to this subject, and I have a report of the meeting sent to me on a postal card this morning. As some anonymous communication was read this morning, I will send the card to the Clerk's desk to be read, as it shows the feeling throughout the country in reference to this attempt to put the poor soldier and the widows and orphans of soldiers through the circumlocution office in this city, and entail upon them the delay and expense which necessarily follow. This will show, Mr. Chairman, what is the feeling among the pensioners in reference to this proposed measure, against which I most heartily protest. I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEAR SIR: We learn from reliable sources that a determined effort is being made by the Secretary of the Interior to induce Congress to abolish all of the agencies in the various States for paying pensions, and require all pensioners to send vouchers to the Treasury Department at Washington for payment after the 1st of July. All who have occasion to write to the Departments at Washington on business are aware that a reply is now seldom received short of from one to three months. If an attempt is made to examine and pass upon the vouchers of two hundred and thirty thousand pensioners at one office in Washington, each quarter, under one official, and pensioners are to wait the slow process of payment by that method, the Government might as well confiscate our pensions at once. We would earnestly urge all pensioners to protest at once against this great wrong that Congress has now under consideration. Send remonstrance, signed by all the pensioners in your vicinity, addressed to your member of Congress or Senators at once.

Signed by—

The following form, or something similar, will be sufficient as a protest to be signed by pensioners:

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

We, the undersigned pensioners, learning that it is proposed to abolish the agencies in the various States where our pensions are now paid, and require all pensioners in the United States to send their vouchers to the Treasury Department at Washington each quarter for payment, most earnestly protest against the proposed change, as the attempt to pay two hundred and thirty thousand pensioners quarterly from one office would result in great delay and annoyance to us in getting our quarterly payments and replies to letters relating to payment. Such a change would be a wrong and hardship inflicted upon us, and could in no way benefit the Government.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BANNING. I move to strike out the last word, and I do so for the purpose of saying a few words on this subject. I do not know how much reduction the amendment of the gentleman from Maine will effect.

Mr. POWERS. One hundred and six thousand dollars.

Mr. BANNING. What I wish to call attention to is this: we formerly had a pension agent at Cincinnati, but in the interest of economy, as it was claimed, he was taken away and the Cincinnati pensioners are now paid from Columbus. I see by the report here that the pension agent at Columbus gets $26,000 a year. Out of this amount he pays the expenses of his office, as I understand; that he not only pays all his clerks, but all his other expenses. For the purpose of accommodating pensioners at Cincinnati, I am told he sends clerks there to pay them each pay-day. It is a great accommodation to those pensioners. They were much concerned at first and very earnestly opposed the removal of the pension agency from Cincinnati where I think it should have been kept, but since the removal I believe the agent at Columbus has succeeded in paying those pensioners promptly.

Now, sir, what I wish to get at is this: if the gentleman's amendment will reduce the salary of the pension agent at Columbus it may be he will be unable as heretofore to send clerks down to Cincinnati to pay the pensioners in that vicinity.

Mr. POWERS. Here is the statement.

Mr. BANNING. The gentleman from Maine has been kind enough to furnish me with a statement which he says is correct, and I find the amount paid at Columbus for clerk hire is a little over $7,000 for six months. This would leave the agent over $12,000 a year.

Mr. POWERS. That is for six months.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. No, for seven months.

Mr. BANNING. Does this cover all the expenses of his office?

Mr. POWERS. It does not.

Mr. BANNING. Does the gentleman know how much they are?

Mr. POWERS. I know what they have been according for the first six months.

Mr. BANNING. How much?

Mr. POWERS. It is all in the paper submitted as a part of my remarks, and the committee have carefully taken all that into consideration in preparing this bill and have made the salaries as low as they thought the work could possibly be done for.

Mr. BANNING. While I am in favor of economy in every direction, I do not want to economize where in any way whatever it will interfere with the prompt payment to these men of the pensions that are due them. I have not heard yet any good reason given why these men might not as well and perhaps better be paid from Washington direct as be paid from Columbus all over the State of Ohio, or all over that district, or from Indianapolis and other centers throughout the country. And the only objection I have to the gentleman's proposition is this, that it is going to interfere with the agents in sending clerks or subagents to pay in the large cities and in certain vicinities. This is my objection to the amendment of the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. Chairman, if the pensioners can be paid by letter from Columbus at Cincinnati, then they can just as well be paid from Washington City. We may as well pay them from the fountain-head as through subagents. I do not know; I have not examined this matter enough to be satisfied which is the better way or whether it is really best to make any change or not.

Mr. POWERS. I believe in cutting down all large salaries.

Mr. BANNING. I believe in cutting down salaries, too, wherever we find them to be too large. I know we must reduce expenditures and practice rigid economy. But I want to be satisfied that the cutting down does not interfere with the men who have lost their legs and arms or sacrificed their health in defense of the Government.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FORT. Mr. Chairman, I rise to offer an amendment to the amendment. But before I ask the Clerk to read it I desire to say that there seems to be great dread the soldiers will suffer delay in getting their pensions. I wish to ask whether it is not true that all the disabled soldiers at the several soldiers' homes throughout the United States, even as far away as Milwaukee, Wisconsin, are paid in Washington by Mr. Cox, the agent here? If so, I ask again, have these disabled soldiers and pensioners been defrauded? If they have been, why is it that gentlemen have neglected their interests so long? Why do they not provide that these soldiers in the various homes throughout the country who are so disabled that they cannot travel shall receive their pay there at their respective homes? Has there been any complaint from these pensioners? Has one of their claims ever had to pass through a claim agency in Washington? Have they been subjected to delay or expense? No, sir; they get their pay regularly from Mr. Cox, the agent here, and I cannot see why the whole of the invalid pensioners cannot be paid as well and cheaply and regularly as those at the homes. Now I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the last section of the bill and insert this as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Maine, Mr. POWERS:
And be it further enacted, That on the 1st day of July, 1878, or as soon thereafter as practicable, the Secretary of the Interior shall turn over and transfer all the books, rolls, papers, furniture, and fixtures belonging to the Bureau of Pensions to the Secretary of War, and thereafter all the duties now devolved upon the Interior Department relating to pensions shall devolve upon and be performed by the War Department, and all laws and parts of laws now governing the Interior Department in respect to pensions shall apply to and govern the War Department; and the Secretary of War shall detail a sufficient number of the unemployed officers of the Army to prepare all pension-rolls and vouchers of pensioners without delay and without cost to the pensioner, and forward the same to the Treasurer of the United States, who shall, on receipt of same, transmit a Treasury draft to the pensioner.

Mr. POWERS. I make a point of order on that amendment.

Mr. FORT. I believe I still have the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order can be reserved until the time of the gentleman from Illinois is out.

Mr. FORT. I hardly expect that amendment will be adopted, because it is economy and cuts off these pension agents. It provides that the War Department shall make this payment by the unemployed officers of the Army who are now under pay, and who are for the most part off duty, and who I am confident would rather be employed than to be idle. I have the authority of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BANNING,] who is chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of this House, for saying that over eight hundred unemployed Army officers are now on the roll. These are educated, reliable gentlemen, well fitted for such duty, and I do not see why they cannot be employed in making up these pension-rolls and making up the vouchers and forwarding them to the Treasury and in paying the pensioners in that way.

Mr. Chairman, I have no fault to find with the Pension Bureau or its management. I consider the present Commissioner of Pensions, Mr. Bentley, an excellent officer, who does his whole duty and does it well, and I doubt whether the management of his office could be improved upon. Although this as well as the last democratic House of Representatives have failed to make the adequate appropriation for clerks and have reduced his force, yet he has with commendable energy carried his work along with remarkable dispatch, and I have nothing but praise for him and his subordinates; yet I believe the Pension Bureau ought to be transferred back to the War Department, where it naturally belongs. The Interior Department has no appropriate connection or relation to the War Department, where the causes of all pensions are recorded. The War Department have the muster-rolls, the records of musters and discharges and of battles and of hospitals, and should pass upon all claims for pensions and should pay all pensions. It would simplify business and facilitate the determination of all applications for pensions. I should be glad to be informed how it came about that pension affairs ever passed into the Interior Department. What reason is there for it? What has the Interior Department to do with war affairs or the results of war? The Interior Department cannot decide on the application for a pension. The Interior Department must first consult the War Department and get abstracts and copies of its records before it can know a thing about the claim or the claimant. The Interior Department has no war records; and it is this correspondence between the two Departments that causes delay, mistakes, and expense. It is needless circumlocution.

Why, sir, you might as well provide that the Interior Department should pay the troops in the field as that it should pass upon applications for pensions and pay the pensioners. In my judgment if we wish economy we should simplify business and let each Department of the Government attend to its appropriate duties. This would reduce our needless expenditures hundreds of thousands of dollars and have the business done better and more promptly. If the Interior Department is to continue in charge of pension affairs, our laws should be so amended as to provide that in time of war all officers should report to the Secretary of the Interior as well as to the Secretary of War and require the Interior Department to keep a war record also, which of course would be ridiculous. There are unemployed Army officers enough to supply the place of all pension agents and pay pensions without the cost of one additional cent and without charging the pensioner one single penny.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PAGE. I would ask the gentleman from Illinois if his amendment changes the law in any other respect than by transferring the service from the Interior Department to the War Department.

Mr. FORT. It changes the law in no other respect.

Mr. KEIFER. For two days I have listened here to a discussion which seems to me has spread over almost every phase of this question, and at last, when the members of the Committee on Appropriations are brought up to the point, they cannot give us the facts upon which they ask the Congress of the United States to legislate in a matter which is to affect directly over two hundred thousand of the people of this country, and indirectly hundreds of thousands more. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] yesterday seemed to be startled at the idea that we were paying the pension agents of the country from ten to sixteen thousand dollars a year simply for vouchers, and then the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SMITH,] who is a member of the Committee on Appropriations, put a statement in the RECORD of what had been paid for these purposes, and it is upon that kind of a statement that we are asked to vote for this bill.

Now, let me state that it is an absolute fact that the man who is put down on that list as receiving the largest sum for the payment of vouchers cannot make, after he pays his clerks, his office rent, stationery, postage, and other expenses, $6,000 a year. I know that he does not make that much. I had it from his own lips. The statement put in the RECORD by the member from Pennsylvania shows that the agent at Columbus receives over $26,000. There is nothing furnished to show what he pays out. We are expected to go into important legislation without the facts and for the reason that the Committee on Appropriations get one side of a statement and leave out entirely the other side.

Mr. PRICE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. KEIFER. I have so short a time and there are so many gentlemen who wish to interrupt me that I must decline to yield to anybody. My colleague [Mr. BANNING] rose and spoke a few moments ago about the pension agent in Ohio. That pension agent in Ohio extends facilities to the thousands of persons who have to be paid in Cincinnati, but my colleague said that because he did not have sufficient information as to the pay of the agents he thought he was in favor of the bill of the committee. Do we not know that agent goes either in person or by a clerk to Cincinnati on the 4th of each month, when pensions are due, and remains there as long as it is necessary to pay off the pensioners, for the sole purpose of accommodating these thousands of men and saving them from expense and delay, and from distress among themselves and their families; and does this out of his own pocket? And yet we are told that he is receiving twenty odd thousand dollars a year when he is really expending a very large portion of the amount in the interest of the pensioners who need their money and need it promptly.

Now, it is said by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORT] that those pensioners who are in the soldiers' homes are paid direct from Washington. They amount to but six thousand, and if you want to legislate in their interest then you must not impose upon the Department here the labor of paying all the pensioners throughout the country, because that would prevent them from receiving their pay as promptly as they now do.

Mr. PRICE. They get their pay from Washington now.

Mr. KEIFER. The six thousand in the soldiers' homes do, but if you require the Department to pay the two hundred thousand the same machinery will not answer with the niggardly legislation of this Congress in the direction of allowing clerks. Do we not know of the great delay, day by day, week by week, month by month, in giving a few additional clerks to the Surgeon-General's Office that is now being asked for in order to hurry through the decision of the large number of applications for pensions? Congress stands quietly by and witnesses this delay, and yet it is proposed now to cast additional labor upon that Department.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. POWERS] raises a question of order upon this amendment. He will please state what his point of order is.

Mr. POWERS. My point of order is that the substitute offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORT] changes existing law, that it is not germane to anything in the bill, and it is not in the interest of economy. It is well known that it will cost more than ten times as much to pay these pensioners through the War Department than to pay them through the Pension Bureau.

The CHAIRMAN. On the point of order raised by the gentleman from Maine, the Chair will state that the bill introduced into the House, reported from the Committee on Appropriations, contained a change of law in regard to the payment of pensions. No points of order were reserved upon the bill, and the discussion has proceeded without a point of order being raised upon this section of the bill, and other amendments of the same character which propose to change the mode of paying pensions are considered as coming under the general consent given by the House when this bill was reported from the committee. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. EAMES. I desire to ask if it is in order to offer a substitute for the substitute of the gentleman from Illinois?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order to offer further amendments until the substitute of the gentleman from Illinois shall have been voted on.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I ask for a vote.

Mr. HANNA. I desire to say one word in the way of an inquiry. As I understand the law, all the officers of the Army upon the retired list are prohibited by provisions of existing law from accepting positions in the civil service.

Mr. FORT. Besides those upon the retired list there are eight hundred Army officers unemployed.

A MEMBER. Oh, no.

The question was taken upon the substitute offered by Mr. FORT, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. EAMES. I desire to offer what I send to the desk as a substitute for the provision of the bill and also for the amendment of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. POWERS.]

The Clerk read as follows:

That from and after July 1, 1878, each pension agent shall receive as compensation in full for all services now required by law an annual salary of $4,000 instead of the allowance now provided by law, and in addition thereto such sum as shall be necessary for clerk hire, rent, fuel, lights, postage, and stationery, the account for the same to be sworn to by the agent and approved by the Secretary of the Interior; and the sum of $216,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated to pay these salaries, fees, and allowances to said pension agents; and all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. EAMES. In explanation of this proposition I desire only to say that it proposes to fix the salary of pension agents at $4,000. It also provides for the payment of clerk hire, rent, fuel, lights, postage, and stationery. It differs from the proposition of the gentleman from Maine in this: substantially, it leaves out the fees authorized by that amendment to be paid to the pension agents for vouchers. I hope this substitute will receive the approval of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. POWERS. The objection to the substitute of the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. EAMES] is that, if adopted, it would simply transfer the Washington system of paying and employing clerks to the several pension agencies. That is all there is in it.

The substitute was not agreed to.

The question then recurring on the amendment of Mr. POWERS, it was agreed to; there being—ayes 121, noes, 60.

Mr. MAISH. I move to amend by inserting the following as an additional section:

That from and after the passage of this act, or as soon as practicable thereafter, all pension agencies shall be filled by officers of the Army and Navy on the retired list, and when officers are so employed they shall receive the full pay of officers of the same rank in active service, and no more.

Mr. POWERS. I make the point of order that this amendment changes existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine, as the Chair understands, makes the point that the amendment changes the law in regard to duty of retired officers, and is not in the interest of economy, as it restores them to full pay.

Mr. CLYMER. I submit that the point of order is not well taken. This proposition is in the interest of economy. These officers while on the retired list receive three-fourths of the regular pay. The full pay of a pension agent is $4,000. So that this amendment, while doing away with pension agents, puts in their place officers who will only receive an addition of one-fourth upon the pay they are now receiving. Manifestly the amendment is in the interest of economy.

Mr. FOSTER. But will not this additional one-fourth make the pay of these officers more than $4,000?

Mr. CLYMER. In no event can it be more than $4,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair, in view of the liberal construction which has been put upon the rule, is inclined to think that the amendment must be considered in order.

Mr. BUTLER. This is a good opportunity now to make General Shields a pension agent. [Laughter.]

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I hope that our friends here will not forget that it is the policy of this House (and I concur in it) to turn the Indian Bureau over to the War Department, and thus give employment to these military officers. If in the discharge of those duties the fingers of these officers, drilled to routine and red-tape, do not move quite as fast as would be necessary in making out and transmitting the checks to our pensioners, no hurt will be done. These officers may be very properly employed to attend to the duties of the Indian Bureau; and I hope we shall not interfere with that project by the adoption of this amendment.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to call the attention of the gentleman who offers this amendment to this point: How are these officers to give their bonds? That is an important matter.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) An Army officer is liable to trial and punishment by court-martial if he commits any defalcation of the public funds. He would instantly lose his commission as an officer. In other words, our security for his fidelity is the life tenure of his office.

Mr. FOSTER. How is the liability to trial by court-martial any protection to the Government? That does not pay back the money if there is any defalcation.

Mr. BANNING. These officers have protected the Government when it needed protection in another and more important direction.

A MEMBER. Oh, that is mere claptrap.

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment of Mr. MAISH, there were—ayes 91, noes 106.

Mr. MAISH and others called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. POWERS and Mr. MAISH were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 88, noes 99. So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I move the committee rise and report the bill to the House.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. I wish to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion to rise is not in order so long as an amendment is offered.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

That from and after July 1, 1878, the office of pension agents shall be filled by wounded or disabled Union soldiers.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania, moved that the committee rise and report the bill to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARFIELD reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 3974) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1879, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I demand the previous question on the bill and pending amendments.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER. There are four amendments reported from the committee. If no separate vote is asked on any of the amendments the question will be taken on the amendments of the committee in gross.

No separate vote was demanded.

The amendments of the committee were agreed to; and the bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. ELAM, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 1135) to authorize the issue of a patent of certain lands in the Brothertown reservation, in the State of Wisconsin, to the persons selected by the Brothertown Indians; and

An act (H. R. No. 1412) to prevent depredations upon property in the District of Columbia.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 1058) to repair and put in operation the mint at New Orleans, authorizing the coinage of gold and silver thereat, and making an appropriation therefor.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. COX, of New York, in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN. Under the order of the House the committee takes up for consideration at this time the bill (H. R. No. 4246) making appropriation for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move the first reading of the bill, for information, be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLOUNT. I believe I am now entitled to the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia having charge of the post-office appropriation bill is recognized.

Mr. CLYMER. I ask the gentleman from Georgia to yield to me to move the committee rise.

Mr. BLOUNT. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. CLYMER. I move the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COX, of New York, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration a bill (H. R. No. 4246) making appropriations for the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted in the following cases:

To Mr. WHITE, of Indiana, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. SINNICKSON, until Tuesday next.

RESTORING MODELS TO THE PATENT OFFICE.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, forwarding a communication from the Commissioner of Patents, relative to an appropriation of $5,000 to enable him to continue the work of restoring models injured by the late fire; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

DREDGING.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a claim of the Hartford and New York Steamboat Company for dredging done; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. WADDELL, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4286) to establish post-routes in several States therein named; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. CONGER. I should like to know whether this bill contains any provision other than the establishment of post-routes.

The SPEAKER. The chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads is asked to state whether the bill contains any general legislation.

Mr. WADDELL. It contains nothing whatever, but provides only for the establishment of post-routes.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WADDELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. CLYMER, (at four o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. COX, of New York: The petition of Patrick Finnis and 750 citizens of New York City, to be aided to leave the city and settle on Government land—to the Committee on Education and Labor.

By Mr. DAVIDSON: Papers relating to the establishment of post-routes between Saint Augustine and Daytona, and between Orlando and Bartow, Florida—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. DEAN: The petition of the mayor of Boston and others, for the removal of a sand-bar in Boston Harbor—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. DICKEY: The petition of Lewis Richey and 128 other citizens of Brown County, Ohio, for the repeal of the resumption act—to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. DUNNELL: The petition of citizens of Minnesota, for an increase of mail service between Worthington and Currie, in said State—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. ELAM: Papers relating to the claim of Dr. H. C. Thweatt—to the Committee of Claims.

By Mr. GOODE: The petition of 38 merchants, masters, agents, owners, and pilots of vessels, of Norfolk, Virginia, against the transfer of the life-saving service from the Treasury to the Navy Department—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. HARMER: The petition of merchants and manufacturers of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, and vicinity, against the passage of the pending tariff bill—to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. HENRY: Papers relating to the claim of Selmar Seibert—to the Committee of Claims.

By Mr. MACKAY: The petition of merchants and manufacturers of Philadelphia, against the passage of the pending tariff bill—to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. O'NEILL: The petition of merchants and manufacturers of Philadelphia, of similar import—to the Committee of the Whole House.

By Mr. ROBBINS: The petition of H. W. Douglas, William S. Arnold, E. S. Zachary, John H. Jarves, and other citizens of Yadkin, North Carolina, against the abolition of the western judicial district of North Carolina—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania: The petition of 49 merchants and manufacturers of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, against the passage of the tariff bill now pending before Congress—to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. STEELE: The petition of Burwell & Springs and others, merchants and dealers in sugars, that the duty on sugar be made at so much per pound without regard to color or quality—to the same committee.

By Mr. SWANN: The petition of John A. Hambleton & Co., T. H. Broadwater & Co., and 15 other business houses of Baltimore, Maryland, against the revival of the income tax—to the same committee.

By Mr. THROCKMORTON: A paper relating to the establishment of a post-route between Weatherford, Bellevue & Brock's Springs, to Graham, Texas—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. WARD: The petition of 50 citizens of Phoenixville, Pennsylvania, and vicinity, against the revival of the income tax—to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. WILLIAMS, of Alabama: The petition of citizens of Auburn, Alabama, that aid be extended the Texas Pacific Railroad—to the Committee on the Pacific Railroads.

By Mr. WILLIAMS, of New York: The petition of C. W. Putman, M. M. Bridges, and others, for the equalization of bounties to soldiers of the late war—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, April 12, 1878.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move that the rules be suspended and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to resume the consideration of the post-office appropriation bill.

Mr. BRIGHT. I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Georgia, so that the House shall resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. I demand the regular order. The regular order, I believe, is the morning hour for reports from committees of a private nature.

Mr. FORT. Let us having the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BRIGHT] that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar would not be in order till after the morning hour, but the motion of the gentleman from Georgia is in order.

Mr. BLOUNT. I feel compelled to insist on my motion.

The SPEAKER. The way the gentleman from Tennessee could reach his purpose would be by inducing the House to vote down the motion of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. MILLS. Under the rules of the House we cannot go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar except on Friday. There is now a large accumulation of bills on the Private Calendar and they ought to be considered on this the only day of the week which can be devoted to their consideration.

The SPEAKER. The remedy is to vote down the motion of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. MILLS. I hope the House will vote it down.

The question being taken on Mr. BLOUNT's motion, there were—ayes 58, noes 69.

So (further count not being asked for) the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. I now demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being demanded, the morning hour begins at fifteen minutes past twelve o'clock.

Mr. HOOKER. I rise to ask unanimous consent to present a bill for reference.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot interrupt the morning hour by asking unanimous consent. The Chair will recognize the gentleman afterward. The morning hour is for a specific purpose and has commenced.

Mr. HOOKER. Very well.

GEORGE A. ARMES.

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business of the morning hour coming over from last Friday is the bill (H. R. No. 4242) to authorize the restoration of George A. Armes to the rank of captain.

Mr. BRAGG. I regret exceedingly to be obliged to oppose a report of a majority of the Military Committee who have recommended the passage of this bill. I only do so because I think upon a question of principle this bill ought not to pass.

Irrespective of the question of the merit or demerit of the officer whom this bill seeks to restore there is a question of public policy underlying all, which controls my judgment in my vote in opposition to the passage of this bill, and that is this: it has already been announced semi-officially to this House that in the opinion of the Military Committee there are already in the neighborhood of eight hundred supernumerary officers in the military service of the United States. And while the Military Committee are endeavoring to induce this House to indorse their views and to devise means to relieve the service from those supernumeraries and to relieve the Treasury from the expense of supporting and maintaining them, it seems to me a very grave inconsistency on the part of that committee to make a report to restore an officer who has been out of the service nearly nine years, and who was discharged as the result of a court-martial held in 1869 or 1870 dismissing him from the service.

If we have too many officers against whom no charge as yet has been made, and all of whom have fair records both for bravery and good conduct, if the necessities of the service require that they shall be discharged from the service, it seems to me improper for us to start a military machine by which here in this House we will be mannufacturing additional officers to place upon that list who will also within a short time require to be discharged. If this officer shall be restored, why not restore all of those officers who were discharged upon the consolidation of the regiments? When they were reduced from forty-five to the number that now exists, those men were discharged. They had fine records; they were equally meritorious with this officer. No charge was brought against them, but the needs of the service were urged as the reason why they should be mustered out, and they were mustered out. A large proportion of them are knocking at the doors of Congress and asking to be restored. If we are to restore one, why ought we not to restore all? There is no more objection to any one of them than there is to this officer; and I am not aware that there is perhaps any greater objection to this officer than there is to any one of them.

But I put my opposition to this bill upon the score of public policy that it is improper for this House to be making officers to-day when we have pending before the House a bill which provides for the muster out of a great number of officers of the same rank as this one because the service no longer needs them and we require to be relieved of the expense of longer maintaining them. That is one ground upon which I put my opposition to this bill.

Another ground of opposition is this: I am one of those who do not believe that it is proper for a committee of Congress to sit here and review the proceedings of a court-martial. The code of military law provides for the trial of officers of the Army. They are tried by military court; they are tried by courts that hear the witnesses, that know the surroundings of the case, that see the appearance of the witnesses and the appearance of the officers on trial. Those courts are much better able to determine than we are whether the testimony of the witnesses is credible or otherwise.

It is true the witnesses may be attacked afterward ex parte, and it may be shown that their character is not entirely credible; they may be by their personal character entirely disreputable. Yet it will not be contended that even such witnesses may not tell the truth. The court that knows all the surrounding circumstances, that sees the witnesses as they testify, that sees all the little incidents which support their testimony, may determine that in some given case those witnesses tell the truth, although their general reputation for truth and veracity may be bad.

Now, when such a court has heard all the witnesses, has seen them face to face, has listened to all the corroborating circumstances, knows all the surroundings of the case and then passes upon that case; and when the case is sent up to the reviewing officer and he has passed upon it, and is then sent up to the Judge Advocate General and he has passed upon it; when all the higher officers who review the case have passed upon it, it seems to me that it is not proper for us, eight or nine years subsequent to that time, to sit here as a court of review and pass upon the action of that military court and summarily restore an officer who has been so long out of the service.

I have still another objection to the passage of this bill. By reference to volume 18, page 564, of the Statutes at Large, it will be found that in 1874 an act was passed by Congress relieving this officer from all stain or stigma upon his character by reason of the proceedings of this court-martial. The Secretary of War was required, by the act of Congress, to grant this officer an honorable discharge. That relieved him from all stain on his character by reason of the judgment of the court, so that he no longer stands as a disgraced officer by reason of the finding of that court.

In addition to all that there was a provision in that act granting to this officer, by reason of this honorable discharge, one year's pay and allowances of a captain of cavalry, which amounted to over $3,000, and that money was received by him. Therefore, even if the finding of the court was improper in the first instance, even if it cast a reflection upon the character of this officer in the first instance, that stigma has now been removed and he stands upon the record just precisely the same as the other officers who were mustered out of the service because they were supernumeraries. And in addition to that Congress provided that he should be paid one year's pay and allowances, over $3,000, which he accepted and drew.

Now, shall it be said that at this time, when we are endeavoring to reduce the number of our supernumerary officers, we shall by action of the same Congress which is seeking to reduce that force, increase it by putting this officer again on the rolls, so that he may be again mustered out of the service and receive another additional year's pay and allowances provided for officers so mustered out?

I wish to pass no reflection at all upon this officer. It is not the basis of my opposition that any reflection is cast or should be cast upon this officer. It is beneath me as a legislator to attempt to cast any reflection upon him. He stands with an honorable discharge, acquitted from anything that would cast reflection upon him by the action of the court, and that discharge has been granted by the highest legislative body in the country, the Congress of the United States. He has received that honorable discharge; he has received in addition a year's pay and allowances. It seems to me that upon policy and upon principle this House ought not to extend any further relief to him. Or if it does extend it to him, then similar relief should be extended in justice to every other officer who was also mustered out, but who never was tried by a court-martial.

Mr. MAISH. I now yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HASKELL] for ten minutes.

Mr. HASKELL. I have but a word to say in regard to this case. I do not desire to enter into a long discussion of the general principles involved in it. But inasmuch as this officer at one time in his life was in command of Kansas troops upon the frontier of my State and distinguished himself by gallantry and soldierly conduct in several engagements, and inasmuch as he has received favorable mention from so many of the prominent citizens of my State, I deem it to be but fair, when a bill concerning him is pending in this House, to make some statements in reference to the causes which led to his dismissal from the Army.

I state as a fact that cannot be controverted that notwithstanding the action of that court-martial this officer was dismissed from the service upon a set of charges not one of them having in the most remote degree one single particle of truth in it, not a word.

This gentleman is a Virginian, a young man who at the age of sixteen entered the Army of the Union, who unaided by any official influence or any power of prominent relatives worked his way up to an honorable position in the Regular Army. While in the discharge of his military duties he was assailed by an unjust and absolutely untrue set of charges, and dismissed from the service.

The bill, as I understand, does not restore him arbitrarily to the Army. However just in my opinion such an act would be, that is not the object of the bill. It simply permits the President of the United States to appoint him to his old rank of captain in his old regiment whenever a vacancy shall occur in that regiment. Absolute discretion in regard to the appointment is lodged with the President. That is all there is in the bill. Mr. Armes will receive no pay under the bill, and no rank. The President is simply authorized, if he so desires, to appoint Mr. Armes whenever a vacancy of his rank occurs in his former regiment.

As to the character of the man nothing can be said against it; and as part of my remarks I desire to have read from the Clerk's desk a testimonial from the former governor of my State and from General Hancock, showing the services of this officer and his good character, giving him only a just meed of praise.

Mr. SAMPSON. The gentleman will allow me to ask whether the bill now under consideration is House bill No. 1642?

Mr. HASKELL. I think not. I think that bill has been substituted by a Senate bill.

Mr. SAMPSON. I see that the provision of this House bill is—That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to restore the name of George A. Armes to the lineal list of captains of cavalry.

Mr. HASKELL. I ask the Clerk to read first the letter I have sent up, and afterward the bill pending before the House.

The Clerk read the letter, as follows:

Major Armes is well and favorably known in my State, where he has rendered valuable service in the protection of our frontier, and it is unnecessary for me to say more than to read what ex-Governor Crawford says:

"I have been intimately acquainted with Captain George A. Armes during the past ten years, and know him to have been one of the most daring, efficient young officers in the Army. His command was stationed in Western Kansas while I was governor of the State, and in all our Indian wars of that time no officer displayed more vigilance, courage, and skill than did Captain Armes. The charges upon which he was tried were in my opinion baseless and untrue, and the evidence adduced wholly insufficient (when considering the general character of the witnesses) to warrant the finding and sentence in the case. I hope, therefore, that he may be speedily restored to his place in the Army, as a simple act of justice to a gallant young officer and gentleman."

"The following is a copy of one of a number of dispatches received from Major General W. S. Hancock, relating to Captain Armes."

"S. J. CRAWFORD."

PORT HARKER, KENTUCKY, August 26, 1877.

Governor CRAWFORD:

Captain Armes, Tenth Cavalry, with one company of his regiment and two companies of the Eighteenth Kansas Volunteers, was attacked on the 21st instant, at noon, on the Republican River, by a large force of Indians, reported to be eight hundred to one thousand in number, and were engaged until the night of the 23d. Our troops, about one hundred and fifty in number, covering a wide space of country, were finally forced to retire with a loss of three men killed and left on the field and thirty-five wounded who were brought in. The command also lost forty horses during the engagement. Captain Armes reports a large number of Indians killed and wounded; Lieutenant Price, of the Eighteenth Kansas, says about one hundred and fifty. The command encamped about three miles from Fort Harker last night. Major Moore, of the Eighteenth Kansas, with the remainder of the battalion, and Major Elliott, of the Seventh Cavalry, with about two hundred men of that regiment, started this morning for the Indians.

WINFIELD S. HANCOCK,
Major-General United States Army.

The Clerk then read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the provisions of law regulating appointments in the Army by promotion in the line are hereby suspended for the purposes of this act, and only so far as they affect George A. Armes; and the President can, if he so desire, in the exercise of his own discretion and judgment, nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint said George A. Armes, late captain in the Tenth United States Cavalry Regiment, to the same grade and rank of captain held by him on June 7, 1870, in any vacancy occurring in the grade of captain in said regiment: Provided, however, That no pay, compensation, or allowance whatever shall ever be given to said Armes for the time between June 7, 1870, and the date of appointment hereunder: And provided further, That the acceptance of any benefit under this act by said George A. Armes shall be taken and construed to be by his election a bar to any claim for pay or allowances from the date of his discharge to his acceptance of a commission, if one be granted him, and under the provisions of this act.

Mr. HASKELL. Now, Mr. Speaker, knowing as I do the gallant conduct of this young officer upon the border of my State in protecting it from the ravages of the Indians, knowing the meritorious service that he performed for my people in protecting their homes, and knowing that he was dismissed from the service on a set of charges not one word of which was true, I believe that the small and insignificant compensation allowed him by the terms of this bill is an act of justice that the House will not hesitate to accord him.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Mr. Speaker, I believe that the report of the Committee on Military Affairs should be sanctioned by this House. I have examined with some care the evidence that has been produced against Captain Armes. I have also examined the various reports that have been made by three or four committees not only of this House but of the Senate in his favor. In each case the committee has uniformly reported that Captain Armes should be restored to the service on certain conditions.

Unfortunately for Captain Armes, he fell under the disapprobation of a certain gentleman whom I do not suppose any one will undertake to defend in this or any other Congress. This gallant young officer was persecuted and prosecuted with industrious hatred by one who was then Secretary of War—W. W. Belknap—whom none will defend now; none who will do him such reverence now as in former days. As long as Belknap was Secretary of War young Armes was oppressed and stood no chance to vindicate himself. It would have been well for that Secretary had he not carried his immense power in harassing this young officer so far and vexing him so long. He at last drove him to despair, and that officer, who had won the admiration of a Hancock, a Palmer, and his associate officers on the bloodiest battle-fields, turned upon the Secretary and unearthed those acts and charges which soon drove him from power. After eight years of suffering Congress is at last about to do justice to young Armes. He should be restored at once, as recommended by the committee. Justice is often slow, but she ever travels apace, with her scales evenly balanced, dealing out good for good and evil for evil. Her steps may be checked by crime and wrong for a time; but, as sure as a God reigns, she will move onward and grind to powder those who oppose.

Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of this House to what General Hancock said of Captain Armes. The name of Hancock commands the warmest respect of every American citizen. He was a true, bold, steady, and brilliant fighter on the battle-field, and since peace has returned to our land he has been as true, bold, and sturdy follower of the law. A true soldier always makes a true citizen:

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE MISSOURI,
Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, December 25, 1866.

Second Lieutenant George A. Armes, Second United States Cavalry, was attached to my staff as a volunteer aide-de-camp during part of the time I commanded the Second Army Corps and served under my orders in the campaign of 1864 (Wilderness), in which he was engaged in several of the most important battles of that period, with credit to himself and advantage to the service. I found him always ready night and day for the most disagreeable duty. When any service requiring hard riding accompanied by danger offered Lieutenant Armes was a volunteer.

I have to thank him for his efficient service from the "North Anna" to Petersburg.

Very respectfully,

WINF'D S. HANCOCK,
Major-General United States Army.

I present another letter from a distinguished officer of the United States Army bearing testimony to the gallantry of this young officer, and I will state here that neither of these letters has ever been in print. This letter is from Colonel I. N. Palmer, colonel of the Second Cavalry. I suppose no one here discredits the character and care of Colonel Palmer:

WASHINGTON, March 30, 1877.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your letter of yesterday, requesting me to state what your record was in the Second Cavalry, I will state that during your whole service in that regiment I believe you had the reputation of being an energetic, faithful, and sober officer. I very well recollect the complimentary notice of your conduct in general orders from the headquarters of the Department of the Platte. Although you were not under my immediate command, I of course knew your general reputation. Of your conduct after you were promoted out of my regiment I cannot speak, as I was entirely separated from you; but in the matter of your trial I was very sorry to see that any weight should be given to the evidence of Captain Graham, whom I knew to be one of the most unprincipled villains in the country, and who was not only ignominiously dismissed from the service for great crimes, but who was afterward convicted of being a common highwayman and a murderer. I have heard, and I believe it to be a fact, that Graham was at one time a convict in one of the New York penitentiaries.

Of Captain Cox, who was also a witness against you, I can only say that he had a very bad reputation, and his subsequent career and fate in the Army plainly showed that he was not a man to be believed on his oath.

You are at liberty to make any use of this you may choose.

Very respectfully yours,

I. N. PALMER,
Colonel Second Cavalry.

Captain GEORGE A. ARMES.

Captain Armes was convicted, I say, by the persecution of the Secretary of War upon the evidence of four men and a woman of bad repute. Three of the men were discharged from the public service and sent to the penitentiary; as to the fourth I know not where he is, but he was of equally bad character. Are we to cast this cloud of odium upon this young officer on the testimony of such characters, merely to accommodate the past prejudices of a retired Cabinet officer? I hope not. I say for one I will not do it by my vote, unless that evidence is corroborated by other evidence than that of these five notorious and disreputable characters. I will stand by the report of the committee. If Captain Armes is restored to his military character it will be but a simple act of simple justice, much to our credit as fair and impartial law-makers, unmoved by other impulses than right and justice.

Mr. MAISH. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] and then I shall call for a vote.

Mr. FRYE. I wish only to say this, that I have read with care every word of the report of the Military Committee on this case. Many gentlemen have it before them and there is no minority report; and I say that when gentlemen of this House read the statement of facts reported by this committee there ought not to linger the shadow of a single doubt as to the merits of the case. If these facts are true that this committee have reported they would be sufficient to grant a new trial in any criminal case that was ever tried in this country. If the reported facts are true—and of course we must accept them as true, there being no minority report—why under the sun any man in this House can vote against this little meed of justice which this committee so carefully and guardedly recommend should be granted to this man who has been thus abused by perjurers, murderers, and burglars, as the committee show, I cannot for the life of me see. I hope that the House will sustain the report of the committee with unanimity.

Mr. MAISH. I now ask for a vote.

Mr. MILLS. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a few moments.

Mr. MAISH. There are a number of my colleagues on the committee who are anxious to make reports, and I have promised to call for a vote; otherwise I should be willing to give the gentleman as much time as he wants. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. MILLS. I understand an act of Congress has been passed offering to this officer the permission to retire with one year's pay, and that he has accepted it.

Mr. MAISH. That is true; and the same committee that recommended the bill to which the gentleman refers also recommended the restoration of this officer to his rank; and I think no one will contend that what has already been done should exclude him from this act of justice.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MAISH moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM G. HALPINE.

Mr. BRAGG, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with an amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 1015) for the relief of William G. Halpine, for losses sustained while serving in the United States Army in 1862 and 1863; and moved that the bill and amendment be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

THOMAS F. ALEXANDER.

Mr. BRAGG also, from the same committee, reported back, with an amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 521) for the relief of Thomas F. Alexander, of Illinois; and moved that the bill and amendment be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

JAMES M. RUBY.

Mr. BRAGG also, from the same committee, reported back, with an amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 2852) for the relief of James M. Ruby, and moved that the bill and amendment be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

HENRY BECKMAN.

Mr. BRAGG also, from the same committee, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 1929, a bill (H. R. No. 4288) for the relief of Henry Beckman; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN GAULT, JR.

Mr. BRAGG also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4287) for the relief of John Gault, jr., late major of the Twenty-eighth Regiment of Kentucky Volunteer Infantry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JAMES D. WOOD.

Mr. BRAGG also, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 3958) for the relief of James D. Wood, late captain and assistant adjutant-general; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

THOMAS W. SEGAR.

Mr. BRAGG also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4289) for the relief of Thomas W. Segar; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ELIAS B. BELL.

Mr. BRAGG also, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 2472) for the relief of Elias B. Bell, late private of Company E, Third Regiment of West Virginia Cavalry; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

MAJOR JUNIUS T. TURNER.

Mr. BRAGG also, from the same committee, reported back, with an adverse recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 2461) for the relief of Major Junius T. Turner; and the same was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRAGG moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was laid on the table; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CEMETERY LOT, MONTGOMERY, ALABAMA.

Mr. CLARK, of New Jersey, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back favorably a bill (H. R. No. 3434) releasing title to a certain cemetery lot to the city of Montgomery, Alabama; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JOHN J. MANUEL AND DAUGHTERS.

Mr. CLARK, of New Jersey, also, from the same committee, reported, as a substitute for House resolution No. 100, a joint resolution (H. R. No. 157) providing for transportation by the military authorities of John J. Manuel and two infant daughters from Camp Howard, Idaho Territory, to Saint Charles, Missouri; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PETER SCOUDEN.

Mr. CLARK, of New Jersey, also, from the same committee, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. No. 461) for the relief of Peter Scouden, late a corporal of Company K, Twelfth Indiana Volunteer Cavalry, a resident of White County, Indiana; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

INDIAN WAR EXPENSES, IDAHO.

Mr. CLARK, of New Jersey, also, from the same committee, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 2904) to provide for ascertaining and reporting the expenses incurred by the Territory of Idaho, and the people thereof, in defending themselves from attacks and hostilities of the Nez Percé Indians in the year 1877, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

LIEUTENANT THOMAS BLAIR.

Mr. McCOOK, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. No. 4005) for the relief of Lieutenant Thomas Blair, Fifteenth United States Infantry; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM HINES.

Mr. McCOOK also, from the same committee, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. No. 4007) for the relief of Private William Hines, Company F, Eighteenth United States Infantry, who lost his trousers and blanket by fire at Aiken, South Carolina; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

SETTLERS ON FORT HARTSUFF MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. McCOOK. I am also directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report back favorably a bill (H. R. No. 3874) authorizing the Secretary of War to transfer to certain settlers whose lands were included within Fort Hartsuff military reservation such portions as are not needed for military purposes, and to ask for its present consideration. The preamble recites that the lands of certain settlers were included within the limits of the Fort Hartsuff military reservation, in the State of Nebraska, at the time of its establishment by executive order. The bill then authorizes the Secretary of War to relinquish such portions of said reservation as may not be needed for military purposes to said actual settlers who have valid claims to any part of the lands included within its limits, and that they be allowed to perfect their claims under the provisions of the homestead, pre-emption, and tree-culture laws.

Mr. DUNNELL. I move to amend the bill in line 8 by striking out the word "pre-emption."

Mr. McCOOK. I have no disposition, Mr. Speaker, to consume the time of the House by attempting any explanation of this bill. The report accompanying the bill I think will fully explain why in the judgment of the Committee on Military Affairs it should become a law. So far as the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Minnesota is concerned I confess I do not see its applicability. The bill itself was suggested by the gentleman's colleague [Mr. STRAIT] who is well informed in regard to the location and pre-emption of lands in the Western States, and if any such amendment were necessary he certainly would have suggested it. I do not know what the gentleman's reason is for the amendment and I hope he will explain it. If it is a proper amendment there will be no objection to its adoption.

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, when this reservation was set apart the total amount of land included was two thousand and thirty-three acres. The committee have carefully investigated the subject and they find that in the reservation was included the six hundred acres of land which had been located by these parties, as appears very fully from the papers in the case.

The Secretary of War and the Commissioner of the Land Office both gave their opinion that it would not interfere with the interest of the Government at all to pass a bill of this character and allow these poor fellows who had located their lands before the reservation was established to retain these lands, and for that reason I trust the bill will pass as reported from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DUNNELL. It will be remembered that it was the policy of the last Congress to let lands included in the military reservations and thrown into market be taken up under the homestead law exclusively, and that all the bills of this character reported to the last Congress restoring portions of military reservations to the public domain required that they should be entered under the homestead law rather than under the pre-emption policy, and that they should be located exclusively under the homestead rather than under the pre-emption law.

Mr. McCOOK. I call for the reading of the report in this case; it is very brief and will explain the matter to the House better than I could.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. McCook, from the Committee on Military Affairs, submitted the following: The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was submitted the bill (H. R. No. 3874) for the relinquishment of certain lands within the limits of the Fort Hartsuff military reservation to actual settlers at the time the reservation was established, have had the same under consideration and report the following:

The records and documents show that the reservation was declared by two executive orders, dated August 17, 1874, and September 16, 1874, respectively; that it is situated on the north fork of Loup River and its tributary, the Calamus River, in the State of Nebraska, and that its aggregate area is 2,033.19 acres. The part first declared was retained for supplying wood and hay to the post and the second was made for the site of the post itself.

At the time the first named reservation was selected it was reported that there were claims of citizens to some of the lands embraced therein, but no action was taken and the reserve was declared. Letters are exhibited, however, from the claimants and the register of the land office at Grand Island, Nebraska, showing very clearly that several claims had been located prior to the declaration as a reservation, and that the necessary declaratory statements had been properly filed for record. Two were filed on September 10, 1873, one on March 24, 1874, and one April 23, 1874. Captain William Stanton, United States Engineer, who appears to have conducted the correspondence with the register of the land office, in his report to department headquarters, says: "To relieve the Government from those and all other such claims which may arise and to relieve both the Government and the citizens interested, I would suggest that the United States relinquish a part of the reservation, retaining for hay land only that part lying in the fork between the Calamus and the north fork of the Loup River, which is a part of sections 9, 10, and 15, township 21 north, range 16 west, in Nebraska. The hay and wood reservation as thus reduced would embrace about 837 acres, and if it be desired to enlarge the reservation it might be extended to include sections 16 if no part of that section is claimed by citizens." In addition, the post commander states that "it may facilitate the settlement of this matter if it is known that these subdivisions are of no present value to the post, as they are distant from it eleven miles." * * * I believe that the hay and wood reservation could altogether be relinquished without detriment, and certainly that part to which pre-emptors have claims." The Secretary of War, in transmitting the papers, recommends that he be authorized by act of Congress to relinquish such portions of the reservation as are not needed for military purposes.

As the claims of the settlers are unquestioned and as the justice of the suggestions of the Secretary of War and the officers conversant with the facts is evident, your committee recommend the passage of the act.

Mr. BANNING. I hope that the bill as reported by the gentleman from New York [Mr. McCook] will be passed. Certainly there is no reason why the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota should prevail.

Mr. STRAIT. This is not opening a reservation; it is simply allowing four settlers who had settled upon these lands before they were created a Government reservation to obtain titles to their lands. It is recommended by the Secretary of War and the Commissioner of the Land Office, and certainly there can be no question as to the propriety of it.

Mr. DUNNELL. It will be remembered that the last Congress passed a law repealing the pre-emption law and adopting a policy, so far as this House was concerned, of looking upon the public domain now open to settlement, as open to settlement under the homestead law and under no other, and there is no reason why these men, who are called pre-emptors, but who are neither pre-emptors nor homesteaders, but squatters, should have an advantage over others now. If you propose to give them the lands give it to them as squatters and not as pre-emptors or homesteaders.

Mr. McCOOK. It seems to me that the matter is clear and distinct. These men had a right to the land and had pre-empted their land and had been pre-empted it prior to the establishment of the reservation when the Government swept them into the reservation. The object of the bill, which is recommended by the Secretary of War, is to restore to these men who had been included on a Government reservation their little rights and their little property. I hope the amendment will not prevail and that the bill will pass.

Mr. FRYE. I desire to ask the gentleman a question, if he will yield for that purpose.

Mr. McCOOK. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. My question is whether or not, in the gentleman's opinion, the adoption of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Minnesota may not prevent absolutely the restoration of these lands to the settlers?

Mr. MCCOOK. I think it would. That would be the practical effect of the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. FRYE. Then I think the amendment ought not to be adopted.

Mr. DUNNELL. If it is conceded they had a right to their lands under the pre-emption law, before Congress determined at the last session that these lands should be taken up under the homestead and not under the pre-emption law, then there is no necessity for the passage of the bill.

Mr. MCCOOK. I will not attempt to discuss the question of the pre-emption law or homestead law, for I confess that I am not very learned about those matters, but this restores the settlers to their original rights, which they acquired under the law and which had been taken from them by their lands being included in a military reservation. I call the previous question upon the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question was taken on the amendment offered by Mr. DUNNELL, and it was not agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MCCOOK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ANN ANNIS.

Mr. CLARK, of New Jersey, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 1141) for the relief of Ann Annis, widow of Harvey Annis, late second lieutenant Company G, Fifty-first Regiment United States Colored Infantry; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JOSEPH R. PRATT.

Mr. STRAIT, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 1173) for the relief of Joseph R. Pratt; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ALFRED MULLER.

Mr. STRAIT also, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 1162) for the relief of Alfred Muller, late acting assistant surgeon United States Army; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM S. HANSELL & SONS.

Mr. STRAIT also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4290) for the relief of William S. Hansell & Sons; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

DR. MARY E. WALKER.

On motion of Mr. STRAIT, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Dr. Mary E. Walker, and the same was referred to the Committee of Claims.

BRIDGE WITHIN THE FORT RILEY RESERVATION.

Mr. STRAIT also, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (S. 484) to authorize the construction of a bridge abutment and approach within the Fort Riley military reservation.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of War to permit the county commissioners of Davis County, Kansas, in erecting a bridge across the Republican River, to construct one abutment of the same upon land included within the military reservation of Fort Riley, and also to permit the eastern approach to the same to be laid out across said reservation; provided that such bridge and highway leading thereto shall always be open to Government transportation free of charge, and that such point shall be selected for the construction of said abutment and approach as shall be mutually agreed upon by said county commissioners and the Secretary of War.

Mr. STRAIT. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.
Mr. WHITTIER. Is there a report accompanying this bill?
Mr. STRAIT. There is a letter from the Secretary of War which I will have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, December 27, 1877.

Sir: In the matter of the petition of the board of county commissioners of Davis County, Kansas, praying that a right of way may be granted for a public road through the Fort Riley military reservation, to connect with a bridge to be constructed across the Republican River, referred by you, I have the honor to inclose herewith a report on the subject from Lieutenant E. H. Ruffner, chief engineer of the Department of the Missouri. I concur in the views of Lieutenant Ruffner, but beg to inform you that the right of way requested will have to be granted by Congress, the Executive having no authority to grant or convey any interest in land belonging to the United States except in pursuance of an act of Congress expressly or impliedly authorizing him so to do.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

GEO. W. MCCRARY,
Secretary of War.

Hon. P. B. PLUM,
United States Senate.

Mr. PHILLIPS. It simply authorizes the commissioners of a county in the State of Kansas to build a bridge upon a military road. There can be no objection to it.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STRAIT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PETER G. MILLS.

Mr. STRAIT also, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 1167) for the relief of Peter G. Mills, with an amendment.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of War to cause the records in the office of the Adjutant-General of the United States Army to be so amended as to remove the charge of desertion against Peter G. Mills, private in Company K, Tenth Regiment Minnesota Volunteers, and grant the same an honorable discharge.

The amendment reported by the committee was as follows:

Strike out lines 6, 7, and 8, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Discharge Peter G. Mills, late of Company A, Fourth Minnesota Infantry Volunteers, from the service of the United States on the 7th day of August, 1868, and granting him an honorable discharge from the said regiment and correcting the record as to his muster-out of Company K, Tenth Minnesota Infantry Volunteers."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STRAIT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MILLS. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. MILLS. I call for the regular order.

Mr. BRIGHT. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. HENDEE. I want to make a request of the House. I desire to ask that to-morrow may be set apart for the discussion of the District of Columbia bill, no vote to be taken upon it.

Mr. EDEN. The gentleman's proposition, then, is for general debate upon the bill?

Mr. HENDEE. It is for general debate, no vote to be taken.

Mr. EDEN. It may be the desire of the Committee on Appropriations to go on with an appropriation bill.

Mr. SPARKS. I object to the proposition of the gentleman from Vermont; I understood the gentleman wanted to have a night session for that discussion.

Mr. HOOKER. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BRIGHT] to yield to me to introduce a bill.

Mr. HENDEE. Cannot I make a motion to the effect that my request indicates, so that a majority of the House may control it?

The SPEAKER. That is not in order. The gentleman from Texas demands the regular order, and the regular order is the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. BRIGHT. I will yield to the gentleman from Mississippi for the introduction of a bill.

ADDITIONAL TERMS OF UNITED STATES COURTS.

Mr. HOOKER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4291) to provide for the holding of an additional term of the United States district and circuit court for the southern district of Mississippi; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DICKEY. I desire to offer a resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Oregon. I call for the regular order.

The question was taken upon Mr. BRIGHT's motion; and it was agreed to.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, (Mr. KNAPP in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar for the consideration of bills upon the Private Calendar, and this being consideration day the Clerk will report the first bill upon the Private Calendar.

COLLEGE OF WILLIAM AND MARY.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 189) to reimburse the College of William and Mary, in Virginia, for property destroyed during the late war.

Mr. CONGER. Has not that bill been objected to twice?

The CHAIRMAN. It has, but this is consideration day.
Mr. BRIGHT. It was objected to twice, but it is now up for consideration.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. The bill has been objected to twice.
The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. GOODE. It was objected to twice; once by one member and then by five. It was objected to first on December 7 by Mr. CONGER, and afterward there were five objectors on the 16th of February.

Mr. EDEN. Let the report be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Education and Labor, to whom was referred the bill to reimburse the College of William and Mary, in Virginia, for property destroyed during the late war, beg leave to adopt the report which was submitted on a similar bill at the first session of the Forty-fourth Congress, as follows:

On the 8th day of September, 1862, the principal building of the College of William and Mary was destroyed by fire. This college is in the town of Williamsburgh, thirty-five miles from Fortress Monroe, on territory which remained under the control of the United States during nearly the whole of the war. Williamsburgh is situated on the narrowest part of the peninsula, partly in the county of York and partly in that of James City. York County was in the hands of the Union troops from May, 1862, to the close of the war. It was never during that time treated as rebel territory; was expressly excepted from President Lincoln's original proclamation of emancipation; it formed a part of the State of Virginia, which had for a time its seat of government at Alexandria under Governor Pierpont; was represented in Congress and gave the necessary constitutional assent to the separation of West Virginia. The college is a little over the line in James City, but was in the town of Williamsburgh, and was held by the Union forces, as was York County, and was practically Union territory as much as the rest of the town of which it formed a part.

Before the fire the United States took possession of the college building for military uses. Its rooms contained hay and other stores, and cavalry equipments. The day before the destruction of the building a court-martial was going on in it, which was not over at the time of the destruction. On the morning of May 9, after a conflict between the Union forces and a body of rebel cavalry, the latter got possession of the place for a few hours. After their withdrawal, some returning stragglers of the garrison, provoked by defeat, and under the influence of drink, set fire to the building, and prevented the residents of the neighborhood from extinguishing the flames till it was wholly consumed.

The sum appropriated by the accompanying bill is somewhat less than the actual value of the building, which was erected in 1859, and is without the addition of interest.

We are of the opinion that the United States should restore the building so destroyed, for several reasons which do not apply to any other claim whatever which can hereafter be made for the injury or destruction of property during the rebellion. The Government had taken possession of the property for its own purposes, excluding the owners, and preventing them from taking any measures to secure its protection. This was on what was practically friendly and not hostile territory, and the case should be treated as if it had happened in Washington or Philadelphia.

There are other considerations which appeal most powerfully alike to reason and patriotic feeling in demanding this relief.

Every civilized nation has its hallowed spots, about which its patriotic memories cluster, and whose names rise before the imagination whenever these memories are stirred. Sometimes these spots are the scenes of famous battles, as Bunker Hill or Saratoga or Yorktown; sometimes the places where the foundations of great States have been laid, as at Jamestown or Plymouth; sometimes where great events have occurred, as Independence Hall or Faneuil Hall; sometimes the dwelling places of heroes or statesmen, as Mount Vernon or Westminster Abbey; sometimes the venerable institutions of learning which have educated and trained the great benefactors of the people, as Oxford and Cambridge, Harvard, Yale, Princeton, and William and Mary. Under our form of government these hallowed spots are in the custody of States. But they hold them as trustees for the whole people, and the gratitude and affection which surround and hallow them are the gratitude and affection of the whole people. Unless this be true, the American people, alone among civilized nations, are without any common objects of national reverence.

The colleges of the period preceding the war of the revolution were among the most potent forces in accomplishing our independence and founding our Constitution. Among them none can claim precedence over William and Mary. The names of Washington, to whose genius in war and to whose influence in peace we owe the vindication of our liberties and the successful inauguration of our Constitution; of Jefferson, author of the Declaration of Independence, who announced the great law of equality and human rights; of Marshall, without whose luminous and far-sighted exposition the Constitution could hardly have been put into successful and harmonious operation, are inseparably connected with hers. She first called Washington into the public service in his youth, giving him her commission as deputy surveyor, the office of surveyor-general being then held by the corporation of the college. He was for the last twelve years of his life chancellor of William and Mary. Jefferson and Marshall were her graduates. We doubt if any college in America or Europe can, in proportion to the whole number borne on its catalogue, show so large a list of names famous for conspicuous patriotic service or can extract from its history a passage like this, which is taken from President Ewell's historical sketch of William and Mary:

"Besides her long roll of most eminent divines, lawyers, and physicians in private life, she has given to the country two eminent Attorneys-General of the United States; to the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, nearly twenty members, and to the Senate of the United States, fifteen Senators; to Virginia and other States, seventeen governors; to the country, one historian and numberless eminent writers; to the State and the United States, thirty-seven judges; to the Revolution, twenty-seven of her sons; to the Army of the United States, a Lieutenant-General and a score of principal and subordinate officers; to the United States Navy, a list of paladins of the sea, headed by Warrington and Thomas ap Cateby Jones; to the colleges and university, twelve professors; to the nation, three Presidents—Jefferson, Monroe, and John Tyler; to Independence, four signers of its Declaration; to the first American Congress, its President; to the Federal judiciary, its most eminent Chief-Justice, John Marshall; to the Federal executive, seven Cabinet officers; and to the convention which framed the Constitution of the United States, Edmund Randolph, its chief author and draughtsman.

"In all, she has given to her country more than two hundred heroes and sages who have been pre-eminently distinguished in public service and in peace."

Your committee are of opinion that if the accidents of war had led to the injury of Mount Vernon, of the house or the tomb of Washington, or of Independence Hall, in Philadelphia, we should have hastened to repair the injury. We shall more truly honor Washington by restoring the living fountain of learning, whose service was the pleasure of his last years, than by any empty act of worship or respect toward his sepulcher.

There is another view of this matter which impresses some of the members of your committee with very great force. It is unquestionable that, by the law of nations, institutions of learning are exempted by all civilized nations from the hostilities of war. They are to be classed in this respect with public libraries, monuments, collections of art or science, hospitals, &c. The Government of the United States, in its Instructions for the Government of Armies in the Field, originally prepared by Dr. Lieber, revised by a board of officers of which Major-General Hitchcock was president, and approved by President Lincoln in 1863, binds itself by these rules:

Extract from General Orders No. 100, Adjutant-General's Office, section 2, paragraphs 34 to 36.

"34. As a general rule, the property belonging to churches, to hospitals, or other establishments of an exclusively charitable character, to establishments of education, or foundations for the promotion of knowledge, whether public schools, universities, academies of learning, or observatories, museums of the fine arts, or of a scientific character, such property is not to be considered public property in the sense of paragraph 31; but it may be taxed or used when the public service may require it.

"35. Classical works of art, libraries, scientific collections, or precious instruments, such as astronomical telescopes, as well as hospitals, must be secured against all avoidable injury, even when they are contained in fortified places while besieged or bombarded.

"36. If such works of art, libraries, collections, or instruments belonging to a hostile nation or government can be removed without injury, the ruler of the conquering state or nation may order them to be seized and removed for the benefit of the said nation. The ultimate ownership is to be settled by the enduring treaty of peace. In no case shall they be sold or given away, if captured by the armies of the United States; nor shall they ever be privately appropriated or wantonly destroyed or injured."

It is needless to multiply citations. Every authority on the law of nations who touches this subject, from Grotius to Halleck, agrees that the destruction of property of this class is a violation of this law. But it cannot be maintained that the Government is liable for all injuries committed either by its authority or wantonly by its troops, without orders, upon property protected by this rule. But there are many examples in history which seem to place the case of endowed institutions of learning, established by funds given for public purposes, upon grounds of their own, and give them a peculiar title to reparation when so injured, which is not possessed by the public school, or even by the church. The funds or buildings of the public school are public funds belonging to the hostile sovereign and appropriated to the fulfillment of a function which that sovereign undertakes to perform for the citizen. The funds or buildings of the church, though consecrated to the highest objects, are the property of particular sects, and are neither within the control nor for the use of mankind at large. But, in the language of an eminent judge, "the arts and sciences are admitted among all civilized nations as forming an exception to the severe rights of warfare, and as entitled to favor and protection. They are considered, not as the peculium of this or that nation, but as the property of mankind at large, and as belonging to the common interest of the whole species." (Case of the Marquis de Somerueles, Stewart's Rep., Nova Scotia, p. 482.)

The endowed corporation of the college can do nothing except hold and apply its funds to a cause which is for the benefit of mankind at large. It cannot commit an act of war, and the hostile character cannot properly be imputed to it. While a violation of the law of nations in the conduct of the war for the suppression of the rebellion cannot constitute a claim upon the Government of the United States, using the term "claim" in the sense of a legal constraint, we believe this Government should, in dealing with an American college, imitate the frequent examples which history furnishes, where the most highly civilized nations and the most famous commanders have respected their moral obligations by making voluntary reparation at their own expense of injuries inflicted on endowed colleges and kindred institutions by the operations of war.

During the battle of Princeton the Americans, in dislodging the British from the college building, fired a cannon-shot through the walls. Washington, in order to make good to the college the damage sustained by the fire of his troops, made the trustees a present of fifty guineas.

During the war of Independence the buildings of William and Mary were repeatedly occupied by British troops. They were in every instance respected as sacred to the cause of letters and left intact. After the close of the war, Louis XVI, the ally of America, caused the buildings, accidentally destroyed by the fire of his troops, to be replaced and every injury to be repaired.

Thus it appears that a Virginian, the chancellor of the college of William and Mary, rendered to a northern college the justice which is now asked for her. Thus it appears that a foreign monarch rendered, under like circumstances, to William and Mary herself the justice which she now asks of her countrymen of the Republic. The British troops, under Tryon, when they occupied Yale College in 1773, spared Yale College, although its students in arms harassed their approach. But President Clap's manuscripts were carried off. President Stiles addressed a letter to General Tryon, in which he represented that "a war against science had been reprobated for ages by the wisest and most powerful generals. The irreparable losses sustained by the Alexandrian library and other ancient monuments of literature have prompted the victorious commanders of modern ages to exempt these monuments from the ravages and desolations inseparable to the highest rigors of war." General Tryon replied, that, "disposed by principle as well as inclination to prevent the violence of war from injuring the rights of the republic of learning, he very much approved of the president's solicitude for the recovery of the manuscripts," and caused every effort to be made for their recovery and restoration.

In the war with Great Britain of 1812, a quantity of paintings and prints, designed for the Academy of Arts at Philadelphia, were captured by the British on their passage from Italy, and taken into Halifax. Dr. Croke, the distinguished judge of the admiralty court, without hesitation ordered them to be restored, saying, in addition to the passage already quoted, "Heaven forbid that such an application to the generosity of Great Britain should ever be ineffectual." (Case of the Marquis de Somerueles, above cited.)

We believe that to follow the example of Washington, of Louis XVI, of Judge Croke, of Tryon, will make every college in America safer, if civil strife or foreign war should ever hereafter disturb our peace. Every new State, as it takes its place in the great family, makes haste to establish its university. Their pupils, scattered over the country, retain an attachment for them and for each other, which is one of the strongest bonds of the Union. In her bloodiest and angriest civil strife England has respected her great schools and colleges. The cause of William and Mary is, in this respect, the cause of every college in the country.

No gentleman need fear that a vote for this bill will furnish a dangerous precedent for large claims against the Treasury or will expose him to public reproach. No other institution in the country can present a case standing upon like principles with that of William and Mary. A careful inquiry has failed to develop evidence of injuries sustained in the late rebellion by endowed institutions of learning exceeding in all the amount of $100,000.

A bill like the present passed the House in the Forty-second Congress, but was not reached in the Senate for want of time. It was received with expressions of approbation by the press of all parties and by persons connected with the colleges throughout the country. The committee report the accompanying bill.

Mr. GOODE. It is proper for me to state, Mr. Chairman, that the able report which has just been read is the production of a distin-finished member of the Forty-fourth Congress from Massachusetts; I refer to Hon. GEORGE F. HOAR, now a Senator from that State. This bill, or one exactly like it, was originally introduced into the Forty-first Congress by another distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, now a Representative upon this floor, Hon. Mr. BUTLER; and was favorably reported by the Committee on Education and Labor of that Congress. It was again reported from the same committee in the Forty-second Congress and passed through the House of Representatives. It was again reported in the Forty-fourth Congress, but was not reached on the Calendar for want of time. At an early period of the present Congress the Committee on Education and Labor again reported this bill with a favorable recommendation.

A memorial signed by the governor and all the members of the Legislature of Virginia, without distinction of party, has been sent to Congress praying for the passage of this bill. The sympathies of all the people of Virginia are earnestly enlisted in behalf of this ancient and venerable institution of learning, and they are now looking with anxious solicitude to the action which Congress will take upon the bill under consideration.

It is not my purpose to enter at this time upon an elaborate discussion of the merits of this bill. The report of the committee just read is so full and comprehensive that it is not necessary for me to do so. I propose to recapitulate very briefly the grounds upon which we claim the favorable consideration of Congress.

The College of William and Mary is located in Williamsburgh, the old colonial capital of Virginia. The district of country in which it is situated was recognized by President Lincoln and by the Congress of the United States as Union territory. It was expressly excepted from the original proclamation of emancipation. It had its Representative upon this floor at the time of the destruction of the college buildings. It formed a part of the State of Virginia of which Pierpont was governor and which had its seat of government at Alexandria.

Mr. CONGER. May I ask the gentleman whether these college buildings were in York County, which was excepted, or in the county of James City, which was not excepted from the original emancipation proclamation?

Mr. GOODE. The buildings were located in Williamsburgh, and Williamsburgh lies partly in the county of York and partly in the county of James City. I am not prepared to say whether the buildings were altogether in the county of York, or whether they were partly in the county of York and partly in the county of James City.

Mr. CONGER. If they were in the county of James City you admit that they were not excepted in the proclamation?

Mr. GOODE. The gentleman is correct about that; James City was not excepted.

Mr. CONGER. I understand that they were all in the county of James City.

Mr. GOODE. Resuming my recapitulation, I desire to say that these college buildings were destroyed by fire during the revolutionary war. They were again destroyed in 1859. They had been rebuilt in 1861, and the college was in a flourishing condition, giving every promise of a useful and prosperous career. In its endowments, its appliances, including buildings, library, and apparatus, and in the public confidence which it enjoyed, its friends and patrons had every reason to feel satisfied. In May, 1861, the thunder of artillery began to reverberate through its ancient halls, and the existence of the war rendered it necessary to close its doors and to suspend its academic exercises.

After the advance of General McClellan in 1862, Williamsburgh, as the key of the lower peninsula, was occupied by the armies of the United States until after the termination of the war. On the 9th day of September, 1862, a conflict occurred between the Federal garrison in Williamsburgh and a body of confederate cavalry, during which the confederate cavalry gained possession of the town and held it for a few hours. Upon the withdrawal of this force, returning parties of the garrison fired and destroyed the college buildings, and prevented all attempts on the part of the citizens of the town to extinguish the flames.

I desire to say that the testimony adduced before the Committee on Education and Labor proved conclusively that this act of destruction was altogether unauthorized and unnecessary. I will here call the attention of the committee to what is said by Colonel Campbell, of Pennsylvania, the officer in immediate command on that occasion:

PITTSBURGH, February 7, 1872.

Professor BENJAMIN S. EWELL:

I was in command on the morning of the 9th of September; taken prisoner from Williamsburgh about nine o'clock that morning; did not order the college to be burned, nor was it burned until after my departure. In my judgment there was no military or other necessity for destroying the buildings, as they contained no stores or other public property of any character that was valuable. The act was a wanton one.

DAVID CAMPBELL.

Again, General Dix, who was in command on the peninsula at the same time, writes as follows:

No. 3 WEST TWENTY-SIXTH STREET, NEW YORK.

February 7, 1872.

DEAR SIR: William and Mary College was not destroyed by official orders. After the lapse of ten years I would not like to speak of details without consulting my papers; but my recollection is that the destruction of the property was wholly unauthorized, and that it was the act of disorderly persons.

Very truly yours,

BENJAMIN S. EWELL, Esq.

JOHN A. DIX.

Again, General Meade writes as follows:

I am satisfied, on examination of the facts of the case, that the destruction of the buildings of William and Mary College by our troops was not only unnecessary and unauthorized, but was one of those deplorable acts of useless destruction which occur in all wars.

Mr. POTTER. By whom does General Meade say the buildings were destroyed?

Mr. GOODE. He says that he is—

Satisfied on examination of the facts of the case that the destruction of the buildings of William and Mary College by our troops—was not only unnecessary and unauthorized, but was one of those deplorable acts of causeless destruction which occur in all wars.

The Federal troops—

The destruction was by the Federal troops.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I repeat, the testimony shows that there was no military necessity whatever for the destruction of these college buildings. The victory which finally crowned the efforts of the Union arms was not thereby hastened and no legitimate purpose of the war was thereby subserved. I submit—and I desire to call the attention of gentlemen on the other side who are opposed to this measure—I submit that from time immemorial it has been a recognized custom among all civilized nations to afford immunity to institutions of learning and to hold them exempt from the casualties of war. This custom, Mr. Chairman, so honorable, so responsive to the higher instincts of our humanity, has been so long acquiesced in that it has almost acquired the force of positive law. In other words, works of art, temples of religion, public edifices dedicated to science and learning, have hitherto among civilized nations been held too sacred to be subjected to the desolations of war. There are many conspicuous examples in illustration of this doctrine, furnished in the able report of Mr. HOAR. I will not detain the committee by adding to them, but will ask the Clerk to read a letter addressed to a member of the Forty-second Congress by Hon. Robert W. Hughes, now the judge of the United States district court for the eastern district of Virginia.

The Clerk read as follows:

A memorial, signed by the governor and all the members of the Legislature, without distinction of party, has gone to Congress, asking aid for the ancient College of William and Mary. The profoundest sympathies of our Virginia people are enlisted in the fortunes of this historical corporation, and we shall look with fond and earnest solicitude to the action which Congress shall take upon this memorial of our Legislature.

During the war of Independence the buildings of William and Mary were repeatedly occupied by British troops. They were in every instance respected, as sacred to the cause of letters, and left intact. After the close of the war, Louis XVI, the ally of America, caused the building accidentally destroyed by his troops to be replaced, and every injury repaired, doing royal homage to the sacred cause of learning.

In 1865, when General Sheridan passed through Charlottesville, the seat of the University of Virginia, he detached a faithful guard to protect the institution from all injury, and the fact is recorded, to his enduring honor, upon the archives of the University.

This noble institution, which Thomas Jefferson gave to our country, was fortunately preserved, although the more venerable college, which gave him to America, had fallen a victim to the Moloch of war.

With such conspicuous examples of homage to learning from kings and heroes, presented by the history of these two learned corporations of our State, I cherish the loyal belief that it will be only necessary to bring the facts of this case before Congress to secure from that body the action which is prayed for in the memorial to which I have referred.

I refer you to the proofs filed with the Committee on Education, &c., of the House, of the facts of burning and destruction, and to various letters in possession of the committee from distinguished personages, for full information respecting the merits of this appeal on behalf of William and Mary, and especially do I refer you to the letters of Generals Grant, Sherman, BUTLER, Meade, McClellan, Schofield, BURNIDE, and Rev. Henry Ward Beecher and Rev. Dr. Tyng, generally commending the claims of the college to public favor.

May I venture the hope that Congress will embrace all such occasions as this application presents of conquering a genuine loyalty at the South by a policy of noble liberality?

Mr. GOODE. Now, Mr. Chairman, such being the recognized usage among civilized nations in regard to institutions of learning generally, I submit that surely there is nothing in the circumstances of this case or in the antecedents of this college to justify the application of a more rigorous rule. The history of the College of William and Mary is the history of the Commonwealth of Virginia and, to some extent at least, the history of our common country. It has been beautifully said by an eminent divine that "A nation without memories is a nation without liberty." What grand and glorious and precious memories cluster around this venerable institution! Founded in 1693 by the sovereigns whose names she bears, she points to-day with maternal pride to a long line of illustrious alumni who for more than a century have illustrated the glory of American institutions and shed enduring luster upon the American name.

George Washington in early youth went forth from her halls into the wilderness of the West with a surveyor's staff in his hand; Thomas Jefferson, the author of the statute establishing religious freedom and the Declaration of American Independence; James Monroe, the pure and incorruptible patriot whose administration was distinguished for having restored the "era of good feeling"; John Tyler, the brilliant orator and fearless statesman, to whom the credit of the Ashburton treaty and the annexation of Texas justly belongs; Peyton Randolph, the first President of the continental congress; John Marshall, the able, learned, upright judge; Winfield Scott, who bore the banner of his country in triumph to the halls of the Montezumas—all these and more than two hundred others who have been pre-eminently distinguished as scholars, divines, soldiers, and statesmen, drank at her fountains of learning and carried with them from her halls those influences which rendered them immortal and made their lives an ornament and a blessing to their country.

Where else upon this continent, Mr. Chairman, will you find such memorials of the mighty past? Where else will you find such associations to quicken the pulse and inspire the heart of the young with all those elevated principles and lofty desires "which make ambition virtue?" Do the members of the American Congress owe nothing to associations such as these; and can they listen unmoved to an appeal for help coming from an ancient and venerable institution which for more than a century has been the nursing mother of patriots, heroes, and statesmen?

Now, Mr. Chairman, if there are any gentlemen on this floor who believe that the passage of this bill will establish a dangerous precedent and open the door of the Treasury to an avalanche of southern war claims, I beg them to pause and consider; and if they will, I know they will dismiss all such apprehensions from their minds. No case like this in all its features can ever again come before the American Congress. It stands upon exceptional grounds and is essentially sui generis. Professor Silliman of Yale College, known to you all, says in a letter addressed to President Ewell, bearing date July, 1874:

Fortunately your case establishes no precedent—

Why?—

because there can be no case like yours.

And, Mr. Chairman, there can be no other such case as this. No other institution of learning in the land with the history and associations of William and Mary was destroyed by the war. No other institution in the land destroyed by the war has given to the country two eminent Attorneys-General of the United States; to this House of Representatives, nearly twenty members; to the Senate of the United States, fifteen Senators; to Virginia and other States, seventeen governors and thirty-seven judges; to the colleges and universities, twelve professors; to the Army, one Lieutenant-General and many principal and subordinate officers; to the Navy of the United States, a long list of paladins of the sea, headed by Warrington and Thomas ap Catesby Jones; to the nation itself, three of its most eminent Presidents—Thomas Jefferson, James Monroe, and John Tyler; to the cause of Independence, four signers of its Declaration; to the first American Congress, its president, and to the Federal judiciary, its most eminent Chief-Justice.

Why talk about precedent in a case like this? Instead of establishing a precedent we but follow a precedent which has been set in other cases possessing not half the peculiar merits this does. I find, sir, upon examination that the Forty-first Congress passed the following bill, approved by the President in January, 1871:

That the Treasurer of the United States be, and is hereby, authorized to pay to the treasurer of the Kentucky University the sum of $25,000 in full compensation for all claims which could be made by said university or by the Transylvania University, to whose rights it succeeded, for occupation of their buildings at Lexington as a general hospital for United States soldiers.

Mr. KEIFER. Will the gentleman yield to me to make an inquiry?

Mr. GOODE. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEIFER. I wish to know whether the gentleman understands that the $25,000, or any part of it, or a single dollar of it, was for the destruction of buildings?

Mr. GOODE. Not at all; but for use and occupation.

Mr. KEIFER. Simply for rent.

Mr. GOODE. For use and occupation.

I maintain, sir, that inasmuch as this act of destruction was altogether unauthorized and unnecessary, as shown by Colonel Campbell, General Dix, General Meade, and a long line of other Federal officers, our case possesses a more peculiar merit.

Again, Mr. Chairman, I wish to remind this committee that the Congress of the United States have from time to time donated nearly eighty million acres of the public lands to the new States and Territories for educational purposes. These lands were acquired by the common blood and the common treasure. They were held in trust by the Government for the common benefit of all the people of the United States. I do not complain of these acts of Congress. I am willing to concede they enabled the new States to achieve magnificent results in the establishment of their school systems and in the education of their people. But, in my humble judgment, Congress committed a grave error when it failed to make equally liberal provision for the education of the people in the older States. The bill now under consideration presents an opportunity to repair to some extent the wrong and injustice which have been done.

What is it? An appeal for help? Help for what? An appeal for help coming not only from the mother of States, but from the oldest institution of learning in the land except Harvard; an appeal for help in the great work of educating the young men to whom the destinies of our common country will soon be committed; an appeal for help coming from an institution round which cluster associations which we may not disregard so long, sir, as the nobler instincts of our humanity find in our breasts a resting-place.

Why, Mr. Chairman, it was but the other day this House with remarkable unanimity voted an appropriation of money to complete the monument to the Father of his Country. A noble act—a praiseworthy act intended to show that his name—clarum et venerabile nomen—is still held, and will be held forever, in grateful and affectionate remembrance by the people whom we represent. But, if I may say it without irreverence, I believe if the spirit of George Washington could be permitted to revisit these scenes and influence our deliberations he would say that in no way could we do greater honor to his memory or more acceptable homage to his name than by restoring to its former position of usefulness the old college which he served so faithfully and loved so well. In a letter bearing date the 27th of October, 1781, addressed by General Washington to the president, masters, and professors of William and Mary College, he says—and hear it my countrymen, hear this voice of Washington from the grave—he says:

The seat of literature at Williamsburgh has ever been, in my view, an object of veneration. As an institution important for communicating useful knowledge and conducive to the true principles of national liberty, you may rest assured it shall receive all encouragement and every benefaction in my power to bestow for its re-establishment.

That is the language of George Washington. And, sir, the author of a book entitled Our First Hundred Years says, in speaking of the petition of William and Mary:

Its eloquent utterances will be heeded at no distant day when an American Congress shall assemble, which will represent, if not the magnanimity which always inspires a generous conqueror, at least the feeling of justice which lives in the breasts of the true-hearted people of the North.

Now, Mr. Chairman, why shall not this bill pass? I have heard of only two objections to it: first, that the passage of the bill will establish a dangerous precedent; second, that during the late civil war between the States the professors and students of the college sympathized with the South and took up arms against the Government. I have endeavored to show that the first objection is not well taken, because no case like this in all its features can ever again come before the American Congress, and besides, it has been stated by those who have examined the question that, if all the institutions of learning at the South which were destroyed during the war should be rebuilt it would not involve an expenditure of more than one or two hundred thousand dollars. As to the second objection, Mr. Chairman, I prefer to assume, until the contrary is shown, that it is unnecessary to discuss it here. I prefer to believe that the Representatives of the people here assembled will be willing on this occasion to forget the animosities and bitterness of the war and to consider this question under the benign influences of the sweet charities of peace.

Will the time never come, Mr. Chairman, when we will be able to recognize the fact that the war is over and that it is a high and patriotic duty incumbent upon us all to extinguish and forget the bitter memories of the past? Shall we continue to stir rudely the ashes of the dead and fight over and over again in this Hall the battles of the war? Is not this one common country and are we not again one people? Do we not bear our due proportion of the common burdens, and shall we be denied an equal participation in the common blessings of the Government? I have reason to believe from communications which I have received that the liberal-minded people of the North, especially those who fought in the war, would hail the passage of this bill with approval and satisfaction.

Mr. Chairman, I would be derelict in duty on this occasion and fail to reflect the wishes and feelings of the faculty and board of visitors of William and Mary College and of my constituents generally, if I did not make public recognition of the material aid and operative sympathy which the bill now pending has received from the grand old historic Commonwealth of Massachusetts. Whatever the fate of the measure may be, I desire to say for the authorities of the college and the people of Virginia generally that they will ever remember with emotions of gratitude the friendly aid and the words of sympathy and of cheer which they have received from the State of Massachusetts. They will never forget that it was a son of Massachusetts who consented to introduce the memorial of the college in the Forty-first Congress. They will never forget that it was another son of Massachusetts who drew the report which has just been read in the hearing of this committee and which is of itself sufficient to establish his claim to be considered not only an accomplished scholar but a worthy Representative of a great Commonwealth which has always been found foremost in the ranks of those who recognize the amenities of literature and render homage to the sacred cause of learning. Sir, it is an auspicious omen for the future, in these days of political excitement, when the voice of party and of faction is so often heard to vex the public ear, it is indeed refreshing to see two great commonwealths, Massachusetts and Virginia, the land of Otis and Adams, the land of Henry and Jefferson, coming together in the fraternal spirit of the olden time and clasping hands over the ashes of an illustrious institution, hallowed by the memories of two centuries but unfortunately destroyed in the rude shock of war.

But I beg pardon of the committee, Mr. Chairman. I did not intend to occupy its time so long. I intended to present this case briefly. I will only add now that the charter of this college gave her the office of surveyor-general of Virginia. By virtue of that charter the college had the right to appoint all the deputy surveyors and to receive a portion of their fees. When Virginia for the common good surrendered that vast and almost illimitable domain in the Northwest out of which five or six States have been since formed, the legitimate result of that act of munificence was to deprive the college of its chartered endowment and cripple it in its pecuniary resources. Now, sir, in view of the circumstance I confidently invoke the friendly aid of the Representatives of those young and prosperous States in the Northwest and trust, sir, they will gladly embrace the present opportunity to lift this venerable institution from the dust and start her upon a new career of prosperity and usefulness. [Applause.]

Mr. LORING. Mr. Chairman, the bill under consideration, providing for the reimbursement of William and Mary College for the destruction of its property during the civil war, is not now for the first time brought to the attention of Congress. It has often been considered here, and has been so fully discussed that it would seem to be impossible to state any new facts or frame any new argument in connection with the subject. The history of the case is very familiar. At the outbreak of the war in 1861 this college, which had become distinguished in the history of American education for the powerful and illustrious jurists and statesmen whom it had sent forth to interpret our laws and guide our national councils during all our colonial, revolutionary, and constitutional periods, was brought into antagonistic relations to the Federal Government. Situated as it was in territory where the right of a State to withdraw from the Union was most vigorously and earnestly asserted, it was involved at once in all the most active operations of the war in support of that assertion. With the zeal and earnestness characteristic of cultivated men, the faculty and the students of the college united in the work of dedicating its halls to the accommodation of confederate troops, and in filling up the ranks of those who were arrayed against the Government. In the catalogue of the college may be found a long list of those who laid aside their studies and went forth to meet the alumni of the northern colleges in that fearful combat which clothed the scholarship of our land with a new and unwonted radiance of devotion and valor, repeating the brilliant lesson taught by Themistocles when he led the educated Athenians at Salamis, and by Von Moltke when he "marshaled the educated Germans against France." All this is not denied. During the first year of the war, until May, 1862, the college was held, first as barracks and then as a hospital, by the confederate forces. From that time until the close of the war, except for a few hours on the 9th of September, 1862, it was occupied by Union troops and was used by them for the storing of military supplies and other purposes of convenience to our armies. In a skirmish on the 9th of September, 1862, the main building was burned by the Federal forces who occupied them, and at later periods of the war, during which the same forces held possession of them, "all the remaining houses on the college premises were, with the inclosures, burned or wholly or in part pulled to pieces." And for this destruction a large body of the friends of good learning throughout this country desire that the college should be remunerated at the hands of Congress.

Now, sir, I have no desire to discuss this question in accordance with the strict construction of the law or with a keen eye to the exact nature of the unfortunate incidents which I have briefly recited. I do not care to condemn the college and deny its appeals to our generosity and kindness because its sons rushed to battle and laid down their lives in a condemned and misguided cause. I do not care to advocate its claims for damages on the ground that its property was destroyed while occupied by the Federal Government and for the convenience of Federal armies in time of war. I do not care to ask whether it stood on Union or confederate soil during that unhappy period. I do not care to bring the question where it will be involved in the intricacies of the law. I am aware that in view of the acknowledged "right of the victorious invader to tax the people or their property, to levy forced loans, to billet soldiers, or to appropriate property, especially houses, lands, boats, or ships, and churches, for temporary and military uses," the claim of William and Mary College for legal damages may be a slight and questionable one. I am also aware that by general military order 100, issued by our Government during the rebellion, "the property belonging to churches, to hospitals, and other establishments of an exclusively charitable character, to establishments of education, or foundations for the promotion of knowledge, whether public schools, universities, academies of learning, or observatories, museums of the fine arts, or of a scientific character, * * * may be taxed or used when the public service may require it," even while it is to be secure against all avoidable damage, and shall in no case be wantonly destroyed or injured under official orders.

If my attention is called to the fact that the buildings of the college were occupied for merely temporary purposes, and not by our Army for general army uses—uses tolerated by the rules of war which govern an invading army in an enemy's country—I can only reply that I am not considering the authority under which they were occupied, nor the character of the occupation, but the fact that they were destroyed in an unfortunate conflict, whose sorest wounds we would gladly heal. My mind turns naturally to the established law that friends and sympathizers of a belligerent power must share the trials and hardships and losses imposed by that power upon its enemies whom it invades, if they are found on the hostile soil of the belligerent; and I anticipate the argument which would be made against this case, even if the college had a loyal record, by those who will not realize that the terms of peace offered by the Federal Government to those who had failed in their efforts to destroy it were distinguished not only for justice but for a fraternal magnanimity never to be forgotten by either party to the great conflict and to the still greater pacification which has followed. When I am reminded that no evidence appears that these "buildings were taken possession of by our Army or by the garrison for general army purposes with a view to rendering compensation therefor to the owners," I can only say I have no disposition to place this case in that line where a legal technicality may defeat it or where, by being favorably passed upon, it will establish a troublesome and expensive legal precedent.

I sympathize fully with those who would carefully limit the liability of the Government, with respect to the wide-spread and necessary and at the same time distressing destruction of property which grew out of the civil war. There are woes innumerable in this direction which time alone can cover with oblivion, and which no public treasury could possibly compensate. It is not the destruction of educational property, or any other property, by authorized or unauthorized persons in time of war and in accordance with or in violation of the rules of war, therefore, that I would consider in connection with this case. I am ready to concede in the outset that no nation should be held accountable for "injuries done to others by disorderly, unauthorized soldiers belonging to its armies." I am ready to concede that a temporary occupation of premises, whether educational, church, or charitable property, by a nation's armies, does not create a liability analogous to that growing out of a permanent occupation, for which due compensation has been contracted by proper and recognized authority. I yield to law and to well-established precedents on all these points. I have no desire to break down the safeguards which the wisdom of experience has erected around the Treasury for the complicated emergencies which grow out of wars foreign and domestic. But recognizing the full force and importance of all legal obligations and duties, realizing the importance of avoiding every measure that can be interpreted in any way as a dangerous or a tempting precedent, I feel compelled, nay, I am anxious to consider the destruction of William and Mary College as an act for which our country should provide a prompt and liberal compensation. To my mind the case stands above all the legal objections to which I have alluded and belongs to that class which civilized nations have recognized as appealing to that tender regard for all man's endeavors to improve his moral and intellectual and religious nature, by which alone can we mitigate the horrors of war. If an unwritten law of broad humanity and generous sympathy for those institutions which elevate and refine and ennoble society is applicable anywhere, it is in a case like this.

Now, sir, in order that I may satisfy the minds of gentlemen here that I am not mistaken in assuming that institutions like William and Mary College have enjoyed an immunity from the destruction that attends on war, in every civilized community, let me refer to the statements and illustrations with which we have all been made familiar in the long period during which this case has been discussed. Of the destruction of these buildings General Meade said, it "was not only unnecessary and unauthorized, but was one of those deplorable acts of useless destruction which occur in all wars," and that he took "great pleasure in recommending the appeal of Professor Ewell to all those who have the means and the disposition to assist him in the good work in which he is engaged." History abounds with illustrations of the anxiety man has manifested to conduct civilized warfare in such a manner as to indicate his sacred regard for all institutions dedicated to education, religion, and charity. In all the civil wars of England her schools and colleges have been scrupulously preserved, and Eton, Harrow, Rugby, Oxford, and Cambridge, the ancient schools and universities of the realm, bear witness to the lofty determination of our English ancestors to stay the desolation of war before the shrines of education and religion.

Need I remind gentlemen of the prompt and resolute determination of the allied powers to restore the objects of taste and art which had been ruthlessly borne to Paris by the armies of Napoleon in his great wars? Is it necessary to recall the action of Great Britain in taking care that the paintings and prints designed for the Academy of Arts in Philadelphia should be returned to that institution, after having been captured by her cruisers on the high seas during the war of 1812? Have gentlemen forgotten the reparation made by Washington to the college at Princeton for merely accidental damage sustained by it during the battle at that place? Have they forgotten the alacrity with which the British General Tryon restored to Yale College the manuscripts of its venerable President Stiles which were borne away during the revolutionary conflict which raged around and within that renowned institution? The practice of modern warriors and the rules of modern warfare have always provided for the protection and preservation of all libraries, schools, universities, and colleges. To barbarous invaders alone, on the other hand, has been left the ignoble business of despoiling the alcoves and tearing down the walls within which sound learning was stored and bestowed. He who studies history aright will remember that the high value set by man upon that national power which springs from mental and moral culture has led the cultivated people of all ages to the sacred preservation of schools and libraries in times of war. The conflict between those who have erected schools and colleges and those who have destroyed them may be said indeed to mark the strife between the conflicting forces of mankind. In no such conflicts have we been engaged; nor have we placed ourselves in association with those to whom education is a stumbling-block, but always with those who even in their bloodiest wars have not forgotten their sacred obligations to cherish the best attributes of man and in their civil wars have never forgotten their duties to the civilized world.

Now, sir, what is this college I am considering, what its significance, what its service, what its relation to the guiding thought of the American people? In order that I may impress upon the minds of gentlemen here the exact estimate I entertain of the peculiar claim it has on our respect and veneration and pious care, as a monument erected by the fathers to the cause of good learning, I beg to be allowed to dwell for a few moments on the character of the institution itself as one of the earliest fountains of American knowledge, and to appeal to the love and veneration we have for those who planted our free institutions on this continent more than two centuries ago, and who amid all their trials and sufferings looked forward with heroic faith to a republic of freedom and education. Why, sir, this college for which I speak holds a place in history as much more important and conspicuous than the ordinary institutions to which I have alluded as the dawn of a young and powerful republic is more radiant than the dim and somber decline of a decayed and broken dynasty. It was planted by our fathers in the wilderness when they brought with them to these shores their heroic purpose and the principles of free government upon which this imposing civil fabric now rests. Founded in the latter part of the seventeenth century it shared with Harvard the generosity and tender care which the ripe scholars of that day bestowed upon their seminaries of learning. "The generous Boyle," stretching out one hand to Virginia and the other to Massachusetts, bound these two infant colonies together by the tender tie of mutual gratitude to a common benefactor and friend. To these colleges the colonial treasuries were open when the accumulated funds were the fruits of hard toil and stern economy. In that powerful southern colony, where for many years the wealth and culture of England gathered on this continent and whose voice was always heard in every great crisis, the College of William and Mary was an object of the most tender regard, as it was also in England whence its benefactors came. Its doors were open to the best scholars of the old country, who came here to pursue their investigations unmolested and to share the free thought of the New World. As time went on it became the nursery of the great principles on which our Government was founded and of the great men who declared these principles and defended them with their blood.

Are you sure, sir, that the significance and power of this college and of her elder sister, Harvard, have been estimated at their true value as the representative and guiding institutions of our earliest colonial days? Why, sir, they held in their hands and planted on these shores the best modes of thought and culture which made England famous in that era when she was tossed and riven by intellectual and moral and religious protests. At that time Bacon in science, Milton in literature, Cromwell and Hampden and Pym in politics all represented that advancing and protesting force which has given England her power and sent a democratic vitality into the colonies, which were largely peopled and almost universally inspired by independent Englishmen. It was an era of right, and not of privilege. The hard lines of scholasticism were breaking up. Great scholars were scholars for the people, and not for the schools. The Protestants and non-conformists, and separatists of England could not accept as a guide to their thought a system of philosophy which was made indisputable by the doctrines of a church whose ecclesiastical authority they denied and whose spiritual guidance they rejected.

The learned men of England who watched, and many of whom took part in, the colonizing of America had long applied their minds to the investigation of problems connected with the best systems of popular government. When William Brewster was graduated at Cambridge, England, in 1585, he carried his excellent scholarship at once into the work of guiding and counseling that little band of pilgrims who were then waiting at Scrooby for an opportunity to found an empire on freedom of conscience in matters of religion, a popular government on the consent of the governed. Occupying a high position among the progressive and independent thinkers of his time, he became familiar with the doctrines which disestablished the church in the most religious and fervid spot on earth in that day, and which shook the throne of England. And what a defiant crowd of scholars taught in the same school, inspired by the same thought and speculation, bent on the same purpose, flocked to these shores, bringing the independent spirit of the Protestant with them, under the care of the Huguenots of Carolina, the Covenanters of New Jersey, the Puritans of New England, the Quakers of Pennsylvania, and the cavaliers of Virginia, all joining hands in their great work with the Catholics of Maryland. When Roger Williams came to this New World and found no rest for the sole of his foot, until he had established for himself an opportunity to exercise the most "unqualified freedom of conscience under human government," he brought with him the culture which controlled the most powerful thought of England in his day. When Sir Harry Vane brought to the gubernatorial chair of the Massachusetts Bay colony a spirit of liberality and freedom which called around him the liberty-loving men of his times and clothed him with a power which Winthrop himself in support of magisterial authority could barely overthrow, he came fresh from Oxford and the best schools of Holland and Geneva, imbued with that spirit of learning which neither church nor state could subdue, and which won for him the divine tribute of Milton's verse and an immortality in the most immortal chapter in history—that chapter in which is recorded the founding of civil and religious freedom in America. And so came Endicott and Hooker and Cotton and Raleigh, familiar with the faces of those who are now to us the classic English writers, born of a people who were untamed and untamable in their self-assertion, who were nurtured on the sublimest English poetry, upon whose heaven-kissing summits the poets of all succeeding generations have been gazing with hopeless wonder and admiration, and on the most defiant English philosophy which opened the path trod by all modern investigators—a people who declared for freedom and then fearlessly struck for it, who asserted a prerogative and then demanded a right, who in the Old World now rally round a throne as the insignia of their national power and in the New World stand by a constitution as the expression and embodiment of their social and civil principles.

Born as these men were of controversy, dialectics, and debate, they strove with each other on the "weightier matters of the law," and disputed with ecclesiastical fervor upon the covenant and the doctrines until the integrity and safety of the State itself seemed involved in the controversy. The pious zeal of John Endicott in executing the laws against those who differed from the religion of the colony, the political ardor of John Winthrop in organizing a defeat for Sir Harry Vane as governor of the colony on account of his defense of Mrs. Hutchinson against the bigotry of the colonial clergy, mark the spirit and character of the controversies which sprang up in those early days of civil and religious freedom. But on one point they united: the establishment of a popular system of education in which all might have a share; a system intended to cultivate all men into a fitness for the enjoyment of the privileges of a free state, and for the exercise of its rights they never forgot and never neglected. They might exhaust themselves over "fixed fate, free-will, fore-knowledge absolute," they might rend the State itself in a contest over the covenant and the half-way covenant, the civil rights of communicants and non-communicants, but for the cause of free education as the foundation of self-government they joined hands, and poured forth liberally from their resources in support of the school-house and the college. It was education which had filled their minds with the doctrines of freedom, and they believed that through education all men could be brought to a true understanding of the church of Christ, and to an intelligent exercise of their rights as citizens of a free state. For the disputations of the schools they substituted the debates of the town meeting; for the private school they substituted the district school-house open to all; for a corporation of learning they substituted a republic of letters. They left behind them a system of state and society in which education would naturally confine itself to narrow channels, and they entered upon the organization of a state whose power would arise and increase from a general diffusion of knowledge through all ranks and orders of men.

On the soil which they reclaimed and occupied has grown up a system of education which offers its blessings to all, which indeed would compel all to partake of its living waters; a system supported and developed by the liberality and care of the state, and so universally organized that it would be easier to escape from the influences of the sun than from the omnipresence of the American college and school-house. To this western hemisphere they gave a republic of civil freedom; to the world they gave an impulse to popular education which has made the land of their birth as well as that of their adoption the abode of the most liberal educational endowments known on earth. Had the American colonists done nothing more than this, had they failed to establish an independent nationality and simply organized their universities for the culture and protection of a sound political and social philosophy, they would have accomplished a work for which their memories would ever be held in grateful remembrance; a work whose influence is now felt wherever the light of civilization shines; a work in the performance of which the most powerful and enlightened nations of our day are engaged in a generous and honorable rivalry.

And not only did these colleges lay the foundations of our national characteristics, but they have taken a foremost part in that system of education which has deepened and developed our American nationality, and has produced an abundant crop of American citizens, not subjects, not persons destined to specific duties high and low, but citizens clothed with intelligence, and responsibilities, and supplied with abundant opportunities for the exercise of all their faculties. When Samuel Adams took his master's degree at Harvard in 1743, he selected as a subject for his thesis the following question which his career has made immortal: "An supremo magistratui resistere licet, si aliter servari respublica acquiritur?"—"Whether it be lawful to resist the supreme magistrate, if the commonwealth cannot otherwise be preserved?" While Thomas Jefferson was yet an infant in his cradle on the beautiful banks of the Rivanna, this Boston boy, educated in the Boston schools, and filled with the effects of the Puritan culture of Massachusetts, had reached, even at the very commencement of his intellectual endeavors, a fundamental civil problem, upon the solution of which all the philosophical thought of Jefferson exhausted itself in support of the American Revolution, and to establish the affirmation of which Washington dedicated all his imposing powers. In the mind of this young graduate of Harvard the condensed thought of more than a century of colonial life found an abiding place, and the topic which occupied his meditations was the subject which lay nearest to the hearts of his people. He was not alone in his investigations. The highest and best laws of state and society occupied the active minds of that day wherever they might be found, whether in the assemblies of the elders, or in the austere labors of the Puritan pulpit, or in the town-meetings, or in the institutions of learning, the common schools, the academies, the colleges. Every village had its Samuel Adams. Every town record had its Declaration of Independence. From many a meeting-house went forth the announcement of faith in human equality as the foundation of the state long before the national utterance at Independence Hall. It was American citizenship which constituted the first great object of American education. In all the practical affairs of life the fathers exercised their best powers, and became good merchants, good mechanics, good farmers, good legal advisers, strong and influential parish ministers; and for this service they stored their minds with the best knowledge to be derived from experience and books. But they knew well that the great civil problem committed to their hands required intelligent thought and needed the support of cultivated minds as well as defiant hearts and strong arms; and while they had great confidence in the correctness of the popular impulse of their day, they had still greater confidence in the enlightened consciences and educated instincts of a people who believed in mental culture and made provision to obtain it. And to-day, as in the former days, surrounded as we are by the most perplexing questions of state and society, called upon to strike as well as to bear, laden with the trials of war and the highest responsibilities of peace, compelled to be ruthless now, and now generous and placable and forgiving, we must recognize the value of the intelligence and thoughtfulness which are the natural fruits of education, and we should preserve and cherish with pious care every monument erected by our fathers to the cause of good learning, every institution founded by them for its cultivation and advancement. Time and war may destroy the monuments of our material grandeur, but I trust and believe that the American people, united now in a common civilization, bound together by common interests, will join hands in the higher service of restoring and developing every institution which has given us the undying power which belongs to a cultivated people.

I say, sir, the undying power which belongs to a cultivated people, because I have learned, and I desire to impress it upon the minds of gentlemen here who are engaged in guiding the councils of this people, that it is the thoughtful products of the schools, the principles declared by cultivated men, the fruits of profound mental exertion, which have alone been preserved and handed down to us, while all external grandeur has perished and material power and distinction have passed away. Of the great nations of antiquity which have disappeared and whose languages are now unspoken how true this is! For their great battle-fields the curious traveler now searches in vain. Their imposing halls are now silent. Their porticoes and arches and galleries are deserted. The greatness which they themselves admired is forgotten; while the genius of their scholars and poets and orators and philosophers shines still with unfaded luster. Through the darkness which envelopes the early history of England, it is the great principles of government contained in Magna Charta and the doctrines announced by Milton and the Puritans which shine still with supernal luster; and it is a prudent and sagacious obedience to these principles and doctrines which has given the English nation its vitality and permanency. So is it with our own country. How we linger around the first declarations of freedom and popular right made by the bold and true-hearted all along our pathway from the earliest settlement of the colonies. The forms and modes of government have changed and are forgotten. Of but small value to us now are the terms of charter granted to the colonies of Plymouth and Massachusetts Bay; the privileges bestowed upon Lord Baltimore and Oglethorpe, or the grants conferred upon the settlers of Virginia and the Carolinas. But we do remember that the fathers of New England, by a solemn instrument, in the words of Hutchinson, "formed themselves into a proper democracy." We do remember the glowing words of Warren: "I am convinced that the true spirit of liberty was never so universally diffused among all ranks and orders of men on the face of the earth as it is now through all North America." How do our minds pass on from the early struggles of the Revolution and the details of government in the several colonies to those grand assertions which roused and guided the popular mind and gave us the fundamental principles of a free commonwealth. The rivalries and strifes and cabals are all forgotten; but not the great conceptions of John Adams with regard to the future of his country; nor the abiding faith of Samuel Adams in "the sovereignty of the people;" nor the thunders of Patrick Henry calling the people to war; nor the fiery appeals of James Otis; nor the philanthropic thought of Jefferson presenting a great truth to the earnest and struggling multitude, for which they might fight and upon which we have at last learned to administer our Government. And do we weary ourselves now with the political controversies of the confederate and early constitutional history, the charges of corruption by which Washington was aggrieved, the rivalry between Jefferson and Hamilton, the passage of political power from Massachusetts to Virginia? Not at all. But we do dwell upon the early declarations of those fundamental doctrines upon which our Constitution is founded; we do dwell upon the profound wisdom of Jefferson as he laid down the rules which should guide his administration, and we dwell upon these thoughts and precepts because whatever else may have perished these still remain unbroken and undecayed. For the temporary trials which arise and threaten our Government from time to time the fathers left no guidance, relying as they did upon the devotion and wisdom of their sons upon whom the trials might fall. But they did fix and confirm in our history those sentiments of humanity and justice which have triumphed over all obstacles; they carried into the practical service of civil life those political doctrines which occupied the thoughts of the most patient students of their day, and they sent forth from the halls of their colleges those great social and civil truths which are so familiar to us that they seem to have sprung spontaneously from man's uncultivated instinct. At Bunker Hill and Yorktown they wrought out their material greatness; at Harvard and at William and Mary they received their immortal power.

Mr. Chairman, I have endeavored to give William and Mary College the place to which I think it is entitled in our history, and to appeal for its restoration not on the ground of abstract justice alone but on the higher ground of national pride and affection. I doubt not I shall be called upon to sit in judgment here on many a demand growing out of the destruction of war and the necessities of the peace which follows,—for the foundation of a system of popular education which shall be open to that race which the war emancipated and left in the hands of impoverished States,—for the reconstruction of those great works which the war destroyed, and without which the value of a broad and fertile territory is nearly ruined,—for the relief in many ways of the wide-spread and necessary and at the same time distressing destruction of property during the war to which I have already alluded, and I shall endeavor to consider them, I trust, conscientiously, without prejudice, and with due regard to the obligations imposed upon me by the amended constitution and the laws of war, and with the thorough conviction that the time for presenting all claims of this nature should be limited either by statute or constitutional amendment, and that their growing magnitude may be summarily ended. No man can desire to add to the horrors of war even the appearance of injustice in times of peace. The remarkable experiment of government in which we are engaged rests, it is true, on "equal and exact justice;" but as conducted by ourselves it rests also on magnanimity and forbearance, which may encourage patriotic devotion, and on the broadest principles of equity, which may inspire confidence and disarm fraud and dishonesty. And so we may step beyond the bounds of mere legal obligation and repair even the semblance of a wrong in our devotion to those institutions which have given character to our people and which lie at the foundation of our national power and greatness. Had my own Alma Mater, had Harvard College fallen before the storm of war which burst over our land, I should be here appealing to this Government for her restoration, to this Congress for its bounty. In the same spirit I come for William and Mary, ready to forget her errors, grateful for her gifts to my country, proud of that record which she secured when, standing by her great sister in Massachusetts, she nourished and cherished all the noble attributes of American nationality and connected her name with that imperishable work of which every American is proud and which can never be forgotten while correct forms of human government shall endure. From the heroic age of our country the name of William and Mary College can never be obliterated. And I cannot believe that those who come after us will be compelled by our economy, or iron justice, or sense of retribution, to remember as they gaze upon her walls that she owes nothing to our generosity and that she endures in spite of our neglect.

In advocating this bill, Mr. Chairman, I have discharged what I consider a plain and imperative duty, in view of our debt of gratitude to the past and the inevitable national harmony which the future will bring as the result of a policy inaugurated by ourselves. Whatever we may do here and now, the time is coming when the losses of this college will be repaid, in obedience to a natural sentiment which must and will animate the mind and heart of the American people in those years of peace and concord and mutual understanding and sacred regard for the rights of all men which I trust in God are not far distant. As the violence of the conflicts which have surrounded us becomes softened, and the wounds are all healed and the antagonism dies away, that affection which a powerful nation always feels for its ancestry will surely move some future Congress to relieve these burdens, should we ourselves fail to perform the honorable service. At this very hour this sentiment moves within us. As we contemplate the memory of those whose heroism and devotion laid the foundations of our national greatness, we even now forget our controversies and join in a spontaneous tribute to their worth as a common inheritance. On every anniversary of their illustrious deeds in field and in council, we assemble like brethren of one family and rejoice together in the work they performed for us and ours. Cemented as we now are by the radiance of the past, we cannot, I am sure, allow one of its most cherished possessions to be destroyed from the face of the earth. The very trials through which we have passed, the discord and conflict and sorrow, have given a keener and a brighter charm to the popular privileges for which we have suffered so much and to those spots in which they found their early home. The battle-field and the heroes, the halls where rang the great debate, the leaders in council, the tribunes of the people, the schools and colleges in which the devoted youth were trained, have now more than ever before a national significance and have become indeed a national possession. We preserve the mansion at Mount Vernon from the destroying tooth of time, and in its holy shades our differences are forgotten. We summon a grateful people to pay their tribute to the memory of Warren and his earnest and devoted comrades who fell at Bunker Hill, and the controversy is hushed, men but just now arrayed against each other join in a common joy, the strife is forgotten, and Massachusetts and South Carolina, New England and Virginia, stand shoulder to shoulder on the hallowed spot where the bones of a common ancestry repose, and the monument which is pointing to their heavenly home becomes a national monument forever. The place where Warren fell belongs not now to Massachusetts alone; the halls in which Jefferson and Marshall trained their minds for the high service of their country, the cloisters where the two Adamases, duo geminos fulmina belli—"the twin thunderbolts of war"—learned their great lessons of patriotic defiance, are the cherished possession of the people whom they delivered from bondage. It is not for the property of Virginia but for a national monument that I speak; and when I ask that a structure whose name belongs to this illustrious roll shall be preserved by a national bounty, I am engaged in advocating no war claim for damages; I am occupied in considering no precedent; I am only calling on Congress to preserve the ancient land marks of our national greatness and to restore the monuments around which our brightest memories cluster and at whose feet we renew our vows as citizens of a common country and heirs and defenders of a common inheritance of social equality and of civil and religious freedom.

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman, while I join as heartily as any man upon this floor in congratulations to the eloquent orator who has addressed us for the last hour and while I appreciate as fully as any other man the graces with which he has surrounded this subject, yet I confess I have listened to him with a feeling of sincere regret. While any man who was concerned in the late rebellion, any man who still lives in the South, surrounded and overmastered by local feeling or by the similarity of the cases which he himself has in hand to the one which is now presented to the House, may be in some measure excusable for advocating a proposition of this nature and character, yet I am entirely satisfied that in a future not distant the eloquent gentleman from Massachusetts himself will join with me in regret that he had aided and supported a bill which, if it passes, will in its far-reaching consequences be of more transcendent importance to this Government than any bill which is before Congress at this session.

Of course this is a fair-seeming claim. It presents itself to our consideration with a modesty of demeanor which almost disarms resentment. It does not come as a claim upon which this House is called to adjudicate. It is studiously denied that any claim is proposed to be paid. It does not come before us with the stern and rugged aspect of a demand founded upon law and appealing to the reluctant justice of men. That expedient was tried years ago, for this is by no manner of means the first time this claim has been presented for the consideration of an American Congress. Time after time it was before the Committee of Claims, and time after time it was rejected. Its friends found it necessary then to seek some other coigne of vantage. Hence it comes before us to-day disguised as a charity.

To-day it may be a charity linked to our sentimental souls by the hallowed memories of Washington and of Jefferson, and even of Milton and of Sir Harry Vane. But if you once pass it, to-morrow it will stare you in the face as a bill of rights for the whole list of southern war claims. It is always in this way that matters are presented. Always the rugged sense of right is covered up. Always the knife is placed under garlands. It never happened that a claim like this was not advocated by most eloquent men. It never happens that claims like this are not disguised by classical allusions and by references to history, English and ancient. I must say that it seemed to me strange when Washington and Jefferson and Sir Christopher Wren were brought in to decide the question whether we should pay $65,000 for a burned building; but when it came to the introduction of Milton, and for aught I know to Luther and Locke, I confess I was astounded. [Applause and laughter.] We heard of Sir Harry Vane and Cromwell. Why, said Cromwell, "The Lord deliver me from Sir Harry Vane," and I say, upon a question of this kind, the Lord deliver the Congress of the United States from Sir Harry Vane and Cromwell too. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to call this assembly back to questions not of oratory, but of statesmanship. I desire this American Congress to consider this question in the light of reason, not in the light of rhetoric.

I cannot promise that I shall be as interesting as the gentleman who preceded me, for that would transcend my utmost powers; but I do promise that if you will listen to me I will give you sound reasons, which will appeal to each side of the House, why such a claim as this should be rejected now and forever. The greatest barrier in this world is use and wont. To say that a thing has never yet been done among men is to erect a barrier stronger than reason, stronger than discussion. Such a wall only pluck, perseverance, and, in most cases, only right can beat down. To say we did the same thing yesterday is to strengthen the thing we want to do to-day. It appeals to our sense of fairness, reason, and justice. We say that if this was proper yesterday why not do it to-day, and the evil, of course, increases as you go on.

It is with profound knowledge of this weakness of human nature that this matter is presented for the consideration of the House now. It is not merely to obtain $65,000 for William and Mary College, it is to establish a precedent. "Oh," they say, "this is not to establish a precedent; there can be nothing like it again on the face of the earth." Of course not, for there was no other institution that ever graduated Washington; there was no other building in this country that Sir Christopher Wren ever built; there is no other institution in which Jefferson was educated, and certainly there is none around which the shades of Milton and Sir Harry Vane and Cromwell cluster to this late date. But all these matters are immaterial; they are the ornamental fringing; they are not the real solid facts of this case.

Now, I desire to ask the attention of this House to this very question of precedent. What is a precedent? Is it a thing which is just what we are considering? I venture to say to this audience, composed, as it is, almost entirely of lawyers, that in all your searches for precedents in your business you never found in all the thousands of volumes of law reports a case precisely like the one that you were considering. But every one of those cases in all those reports, no matter how insignificant it was, established some principle which had a tendency to affect all cases in all future time. Now I ask what principle this case will establish. Let me briefly call your attention to the facts. In the first place this college was occupied by our troops; our troops were dislodged from it and then retook the building and according to statements before the committee a drunken straggler belonging to our forces fired the building. That is all there is of it. I believe the statement that our people destroyed it is not true. I believe that letters can be produced showing that it was not so, but I prefer to argue the case on the facts as they are stated by the committee, and no others. I therefore leave that question to future investigation.

If you pass this bill what precedent do you establish upon these facts? You establish a precedent that the Government of the United States proposes to pay for the loss and unauthorized destruction of those objects deemed sacred by the laws of war. If you pass this bill you establish that principle, nothing more, nothing less.

I will not undertake to say that you will establish the principle that all the incidental damages of the war are to be paid for, although I think that is involved. But I wish to be candid and make my statement no broader than the example. Now, if you establish this principle you establish a principle that no other nation ever had the inconceivable folly and imbecility to establish since the beginning of time. I know that Louis of France chose, as matter of policy to please an ally, to repair in some slight manner this college. I know that General Washington gave fifty guineas as compensation for an accident which occurred at Princeton, but does any man argue this question on a flimsy basis like that? Why the whole world has been searched through and through for the like of it in vain. The graceful learning of Massachusetts has twined itself with the rugged and interesting persistence of Virginia in its search for a parallel, but to no purpose whatsoever. You may bring together Bunker Hill and Yorktown, Massachusetts and Virginia, and tie them together with all the flowers of rhetoric that ever bloomed since the Garden of Eden, but you cannot change the plain, historic fact that no nation on earth ever was so imbecile and idiotic as to establish a principle that would more nearly bankrupt its treasury after victory than after defeat.

Now, if you are going to establish a new principle of this kind have you any peculiar reason for it? Was the war carried on so cruelly, was the destruction of property so malicious as to call for exceptional action upon our part? Why, sir, the very man who brings this petition here, President Ewell, declares that no war of equal magnitude was ever conducted with equal mildness, and he is corroborated in that statement by General Joseph E. Johnston, whose authority I know will be accepted on both sides of this House.

Now, then, we purpose to establish this principle, and to establish it contrary to the custom of all nations. Worse than that, we intend to establish it contrary to our own precedents, because this thing has not failed of discussion in the long years since the war.

Now let me mention to you a few instances in which Congress has been actuated by motives similar to those which are suggested here—motives arising out of the sympathies and not out of the judgment of mankind. In the first place, I will refer to the case of Dr. J. Milton Best, who owned a house of the value of $25,000 which was destroyed during the war. It was within the line of certain forts which the Government purposed to erect at Paducah, I think. The property had been appraised, its value had been estimated; but before the proper proceedings were completed to pay Dr. Best his money the enemy appeared and attacked the fort. That brave man stood in the cupola of his dwelling signaling the officers of our Army, exhibiting the utmost loyalty in the face of the enemy. The house was attacked and captured by the enemy, was somewhat injured by them, and after their disappearance was razed to the ground by our troops. Dr. Best applied to Congress for relief.

Now, I ask you whether this was not a case of more merit than any that is presented here. Here was property not burned by a straggler but taken by the United States authorities for a beneficial purpose—taken for our own advantage and taken from a patriotic man who showed his valor and his loyalty on the very field where he lost his property.

Here is another case. In the town of Manchester, Kentucky, in a loyal region of the country, salt works owned by loyal men, to the value of $22,000, were destroyed to prevent them from falling into the hands of the enemy. There the Government of the United States received a positive advantage. The property was taken by order of its officers. If there ever was a case in which the Government was liable on the score of agency that was the case.

But perhaps you may say that that was not the case of an institution of learning, and therefore is not a parallel to this. Fortunately there is a case directly in point—the case of the East Tennessee University, situated at Knoxville, Tennessee. It was not destroyed by any drunken stragglers, but while in the occupation of our officers it was injured to the extent of $18,500. In the second session of the Forty-second Congress a report was made in favor of granting compensation for that injury. I ask the Clerk to read a paragraph from that report.

Mr. EDEN. Who made that report?

Mr. REED. I will tell the gentleman in a moment. It was Mr. Wilson.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate Report.—Forty-second Congress, second session.—Report No. 17.

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill for the relief of the East Tennessee University, have had the same under consideration and submit the following report:

It appears that the seven university buildings and the grounds adjacent thereto came into the occupation of the United States military authorities in good condition in September, 1863, and were occupied by them for military purposes until June 13, 1865; that during this occupation one of the buildings was totally demolished, and the others were so materially damaged as to render them wholly unfit for use; that the library, scientific apparatus, mineralogical and geological cabinets, were destroyed; that the fences, trees, shrubbery, &c., were nearly all removed and burned, and that the grounds were mutilated and greatly injured by earthworks, a fort and rifle-pits being thereupon.

The East Tennessee University is believed to be particularly deserving of the favorable consideration of Congress. It is the only educational institution of known loyalty, in management and influence, in any of the seceding States during the war. It is situated at Knoxville, in the center of East Tennessee, and is surrounded by a population known for their loyalty and sacrifices to the cause of the Union.

The committee recommend the payment to the university of the sum of $18,500.

Mr. REED. Now, here is a case which certainly appeals to the sympathy of men. Here was an institution of learning. It was ruined while under the control of our officers. No drunken soldier, in the frenzy and hurry of recent conflict, wreaked on it his private vengeance. It was situated in a loyal country. Out of its halls had gone no officers to swell the ranks of its country's foes. From the chairs of its professors the doctrines of secession had never been preached; the surrounding population had never been tainted by it. It was in the midst of a people whose loyalty surpassed anything that we in the North could exhibit. Our soldiers risked their lives; their soldiers risked not only their lives but their altars and their hearthstones. Our soldiers' families slept in their quiet homes; theirs listened with beating hearts to the gallop of marauding bands and the tramp of marching armies. They experienced in their homes and families all the horrors of war, and yet were steadfast. It is not here and now that I would undertake to speak the eulogium of those patriotic men; but when the passions of the present day have subsided the historian will tell of their devotion and sacrifices with a pen as eager as that with which he has recorded the deeds of the embattled farmers at Lexington or of the brave men who fought with Greene in the Carolinas. To this institution, thus the nursery of patriotic men in the past and the future instructor of the children of the loyalists of East Tennessee, the first loyal soldier of the war refused the very boon that you ask for William and Mary. For one, I cannot deem it good policy or wise statesmanship to give to those who were wrong what we have wisely refused to those who were right. Bills of relief in all these cases which have been enumerated were passed through the Congress of the United States under the influence of sympathetic feeling; but all of them were vetoed by the President of the United States with thorough reluctance but with far-seeing and comprehensive statesmanship; and those cases have slept the sleep of death ever since. The sober second thought of the Congress invoked by the President under the Constitution ratified his wisdom.

Now, I have another precedent; a precedent that cannot fail to be satisfactory to our friends on the other side, because it is tainted by no memories of the war. It is an act performed by that blessed generation of statesmen that preceded 1860. When I came to examine this case of William and Mary I found that the original petition was for payment of losses in the revolutionary war and in the late civil war. Now, the circumstance I am going to mention escaped the notice of the author of the eloquent report which was presented by the Committee on Education and Labor. It appears nowhere in the documents before the House, although it does appear in the documents before the committee.

It seems that in 1776 the buildings connected with this college were seriously injured by our revolutionary forefathers, and for seventy years the trustees persistently urged their claim for compensation upon the same revolutionary fathers who did the injury, and upon the statesmen who followed them, including I have no doubt Washington and Jefferson and Monroe, the thirty judges of Virginia, the twenty-four admirals, and other persons who have graduated from William and Mary. But they were sternly denied. The statesmen of that period had too much wisdom to permit this Government to be connected with any principle so absurd as would be established by this bill. Now I submit to you who listen to me that here is a proposition which has met with universal refusal from all civilized nations since the world began; which has met with direct refusal from the United States; which has been refused in the instance of this very supplicant by our revolutionary forefathers, and by the democratic statesmen who preceded the war, and which you are asked, under the influence of conciliatory feeling, to pass; which, if you do pass, will establish a precedent fraught with vast and dreadful menace to this country.

But you say this is no precedent, for there is no other case. No; nothing ever establishes a precedent until it is passed, and nobody ever found the advocate of a measure like this ready to shoulder the responsibility of its consequences while he was urging its passage. But let us see what there is before this House on this very subject. You can tell men's minds better by noticing what they are doing than by what they are saying. [Laughter.] Here is a bill (H. R. No. 2804) to pay the sum of $4,000 to the trustees of Stewart College, Clarksville, State of Tennessee, "in full compensation for property taken from them for the use of and used by the United States Army." Here is a bill (H. R. No. 1036) to pay the sum of $20,614.90 to Shelby Medical College, in Tennessee, "for rent of said college building during the years 1863, 1864, and 1865, and for property taken from said building for the use of the United States Army." Then here is a bill (H. R. No. 2420) to pay Randolph County, in the State of West Virginia, the sum of $10,000 "for damage done the court-house, public jail, and clerks' offices of said county during its occupation and possession by the Federal troops during the late war between the States." And then here is a bill (H. R. No. 2053) to indemnify Prairie County, Arkansas, in "the sum of $30,000, for the occupation, use, and destruction of the court-house, jail, and other public buildings belonging to Prairie County, Arkansas, by the Federal Army during the late war." Here is a bill (H. R. No. 2021) appropriating $175,000 to aid the State of Louisiana in rebuilding the state-house at Baton Rouge, said building having been partially destroyed by fire while under the control and in the custody of the United States military authorities and while being occupied by Federal troops during the late war between the United States and the so-called Confederate States of America. And here are half a dozen other bills.

A MEMBER. Read them all.

Mr. REED. They are for small sums; they are for Masonic halls and churches. Here you are at the very outset of this matter confronted by over $300,000 of these claims. Yet we are but in the green tree now. Three hundred thousand dollars, and this is no precedent! Well, now I want to go one step further, because these things are all close together. There is but a step between paying for institutions of learning and county buildings and paying for the humble firesides of the poor, and for my own part I would rather pay the latter than the former.

I am somewhat gratified to find that my views of the proximity of these various kinds of claims to each other is sustained by the counsel for private claimants, who has been so kind as to lay on my desks to-day the pamphlet I hold in my hand. The counsel is Hon. T. W. Bartley, somewhat famous in these parts for the invention of the triple presidential arrangement (I am not sure that I get the exact technical language) about which our friend from Ohio [Mr. SOUTHARD] has had so much trouble with the newspapers. [Laughter.] I must say that Mr. Bartley gives good sentimental and rhetorical reasons for the payment of the private claims of which I am about to speak. Says Mr. Bartley:

The rejection of a man's claim to be compensated for his property—

Think of all this, in the sonorous voice of some gentleman from Massachusetts, advocating this measure, just think of it! [Laughter and applause.]

The rejection of a man's claim to be compensated for his property taken and used by the Government is a virtual confiscation of his property and a punishment for disloyalty! And for the monstrosity of this punishment after pardon this commission claims special credit. To pardon a man first and then punish him afterward is a mockery of the constitutional rights for the security of which government was instituted.

Think of all these claimants translated into that magnificent upper air in which Massachusetts and Virginia and possibly South Carolina alone can live! [Laughter and applause.] Just think of them in that blue empyrean, surrounded by Washington and Jefferson and dead heroes, and Milton and Sir Harry Vane and Sir Christopher Wren and the whole of our English literature, and my friend from Massachusetts here below emblazoning it all in gorgeous language! I ask you how you could meet that.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. You must not forget that only a small part of Massachusetts favors this bill.

Mr. REED. I beg pardon of gentlemen from Massachusetts. I know that and am glad to give them full credit for it.

Now let us see what our southern friends and some of our northern ones think of these claims. I have taken the trouble to look over the matter, aided by the exploration made by the very intelligent correspondent of the Cincinnati Commercial, (and I should not feel it was right to speak of this without giving him due acknowledgment,) and I have found, notwithstanding the fact there had been an unprecedented number of bills introduced in this Congress; notwithstanding the fact every man here had presented at least two bills for the coinage of the silver dollar of 412½ grains, [laughter,] and that every man had presented a bill for the restoration of the finances, or to lend men going out West $2,000 and to issue $400,000,000 of currency, or some such thing, [laughter;] notwithstanding the great pressure of public business on the House here; notwithstanding the fact there have been thirty-five hundred bills presented up to March 4 of this session against twenty-three hundred and sixty in the Forty-third Congress, I found over 10 per cent. of the bills presented to be passed upon by this House were southern claims arising from incidental damage during the war—damage to private property by the Federal armies.

Three hundred and ninety-eight of those bills are pending before Congress to-day and they amount in the aggregate to the sum of $4,369,000.

Now, you know, every one of you, that this is only a trifle compared with what is behind. You all of you know that the law offices of the South, republican and democratic, are stuffed with these things. It is a matter which you talk about now by the hundreds of thousands; by and by you will talk about it by the millions and perhaps by the hundreds of millions.

Now, these things are here in spite of the adverse decisions on the part of Congress. They are here in spite of the general sentiment of the American people. And the worse thing I find about it is that some of our republican members of Congress in the past Congresses, if not in the present, have been somewhat disposed to vote for them. And why? It reveals to me a worse state of things than the mere presentation of these bills, because it shows that there exists in the South a persistent southern sentiment which not only justifies but urges on men to present these claims. You see they have every motive not to present them now. They have a congressional election before them. They want peace, quietness, harmony, conciliation, a general state of salubrity such as we have often heard spoken of in this House. They want everything quiet and peaceful. And yet the public sentiment is such that one-tenth of the public business presented for the consideration of this House consists of southern claims.

Now, just here, it seems to me that we have got one plain path of duty before us if we wish to protect the Treasury and the people of the United States. I do not speak now of these large claims. I do not talk of the claims of $83,000,000 for the cotton tax. I do not talk about the $7,000,000 a year for the Mexican war veterans, presented by the very men who are demanding economy and who are seeking to cut off a few thousand dollars from the pay of clerks here in Washington.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Will the gentleman allow me—

Mr. REED. I decline to be interrupted.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Then I will have another opportunity.

Mr. REED. I have no doubt you will. Your world is very wide. I am pursuing a certain line of argument, my time is very limited, and, if I yield to the gentleman from California, I shall have no time for myself.

Neither do I speak of the Texas Pacific Railroad nor the claims for the Mississippi levees. The people of the South have a right to demand some of those things if they choose and take their chance of getting them. But I do speak of these small claims which are presented so insidiously. If this bill once passes, the precedent it establishes you will find will extend entirely beyond it. Talk of precedents! The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GOODE] says this will be no precedent for anything, and then himself, in the very next paragraph, insists that the payment to the Kentucky University, which was under a contract for rent and which expressly excluded payment for burned buildings, is a precedent for this claim. That incident in his speech will illustrate how innocent cases once got through Congress can be twisted into precedents.

In other words, people may coax you into this thing by all sorts of argument. But when they once get it through you find it is the decision they look to, and not the argument. The arguments will be all printed. They will make a part of that great monumental pile of eloquence which Congress is rearing at the rate of ten volumes every year; but nobody will read them; while the decisions will be sought for by every claim agent who loved the lost cause and a good many that did not.

Now I want to say one word about this whole subject. I know that it is unkind to make any allusions to anything connected with the last war. I listened with a great deal of interest to the very eloquent remarks that were made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] the other day, and to some parts of them I gave my very hearty approval. I do believe that after the magnificent contest which shook this entire continent, after millions of men had been in the field and fought each other face to face, it would have been a pitiful and miserable close to have had half a dozen struggling wretches kicking out their lives on the gallows. I had a strong sympathy with what the gentleman said as to that. But the rest of his remarks I protest against. He said we on this side were always bringing up this question of confederate claims and of confederates. Now, so far as mere words are concerned, that may be so. But if the docket of this House is not full of provocations to this kind of discussion, placed there by southern men, I do not know such things when I see them.

Here is the William and Mary College bill. How can you discuss it without mentioning the confederacy? Then there is the bill in reference to soldiers of 1812 with its clause rendering it unnecessary to prove loyalty. In all probability that clause did not help a hundred men, and yet it was pushed in here and obliged to be made the subject of discussion or of the gag-law of suspension of the rules. And I say that the list of bills read to-day is full of provocation to this identical discussion. Now I ask gentlemen on the other side if under all the circumstances it is too unreasonable to expect them to cease this constant, persistent attack on the United States Treasury and on the laws which grew out of the war. They want peace. Then why do they not cease to provoke controversy?

Now are not all the losses and destruction that may have happened, under the laws of war and of good sense, fairly resting where they ought to rest? When a man undertakes to enter a rebellion it may be well enough to say that his goodness depends upon his convictions of right, and when he comes to the day of judgment I have no doubt that he will be judged upon that basis; but no nation can afford to judge on any such principles. The gentlemen opposite did not do it themselves. When they came to report the bill in relation to payments for postal services rendered in the South prior to the war, they put in that bill an exclusion of those who had not been loyal to the confederacy, and they did rightly enough, and we are doing rightly enough now.

You gentlemen upon the other side began a war which resulted in the destruction of fifty thousand killed on the field of battle on our side and as many more upon yours; and hundreds of thousands of others are now dragging out a miserable existence from the effects of that war.

Now, whatever may be the question of right or wrong for any individual, the only justification of rebellion is success. The consequences are too fearful for men to be allowed to make it the escape of their passions. It involves death to men and destruction to property. You do not need to be told its miseries, for you have suffered them. Any set of men who purpose to plunge their people into these horrors are bound to be successful or take the consequences. You were beaten and yet you want us to take the consequences.

You gentlemen opposite come forward and insist that the victorious country shall pay for the damages inflicted by it upon its enemies. I ask you if this is reasonable and sensible? I ask you whether in the present condition of the country it is wise? Gentlemen, the business interests of the country will not allow you to succeed in this attempt; and you owe a great deal of your liberties to the business men of the country. Why will you not on your part show a disposition to let by-gones be by-gones and let us have rest and peace and returning prosperity?

Mr. CUMMINGS. I trust the gentleman from Maine, before he takes his seat, will allow me to correct a statement which he made. He puts the proportion of war claims at one-tenth. I have just looked at the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and find that the total number of bills introduced into this House up to and including yesterday is forty-two hundred and eighty-two. Up to and including yesterday, and since Congress convened in October last, twelve hundred and twenty-five bills have been referred to the Committee on War Claims. These bills all grow out of the war and are almost entirely for the relief of persons in the Southern States. Besides these, there are bills pending before several other committees. The Committee of Claims, of which I am a member, has before it one single bill which proposes to give to North Carolina $43,000 for cotton seized. Instead of the number of these claims being but one-tenth of the bills introduced into this House, they are really more than one-fourth—that is, those before the War Claims Committee alone are more than one-fourth. This you observe does not include the cotton bills, the bills for the improvement of southern rivers, for captured and abandoned property, and others of a like nature; in all it will perhaps reach one-third.

Mr. REED. I confined my remarks to the results merely of my personal observation. There are a great many other claims of the same class which have been referred to the committees from the file-room from other Congresses of which I meant to have spoken. I thank the gentleman for his supplementary statement because such figures are calculated to call the attention of the House and of the country to this matter. To say that it is alarming is to use very mild language.

I now yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TOWNSEND.]

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. How much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has sixteen minutes.

Mr. EDEN. Will the gentleman allow me one moment?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I will do so, provided that my own time shall not be limited.

Mr. EDEN. In reply to what has been stated by the gentleman from Iowa in reference to the number of claims pending before the Committee on War Claims, I wish to state that in the Forty-third Congress there were reported by that committee private claims to the amount of $397,891.63; for the Quartermaster-General, Commissary-General of Subsistence, and commissioner of claims, $1,561,711.76; making the total amount reported, $1,959,603.39. That was a Congress in which our republican friends had control, and there was a larger number of claims before the Committee on War Claims than there was in the Forty-fourth Congress when the democrats had control. I will state further that in the Forty-fourth Congress the amount of private claims reported amounted to $188,015.30, and the Quartermaster and Commissary-Generals and commissioner of claims $943,713, the total amount reported being $1,131,828.30. The war claims reported favorably by the republican committee of the Forty-third Congress exceeds the amount reported by the democratic committee of the Forty-fourth Congress over $800,000!

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I came to this House with the desire, before taking my oath of office, to do equal and exact justice to all parts of this Union. We had been divided. We had come together. We had a common country, and whatever men may think, in my day dreams and in my night dreams Virginia and the Carolinas and Georgia are a part of my country, and no man can take away my interest in them. My comrades and brethren have shed their blood for my right to this, and when I am called upon to act in regard to the interests of Virginia I am acting for my country, and I will do for Virginia all I would do for New York or all I would do for my earlier home, a part of which is represented by the gentleman who has spoken this afternoon on the affirmative of this question. Beyond all this my oath as a Representative in Congress placed an additional obligation upon me. I swore to faithfully discharge my duty as a Representative in Congress, and that duty, as I interpret my oath, can only be discharged by looking after the interests of every portion of our extended country.

Now, let us look this matter of repaying the losses of William and Mary College in the face. My friends who know me here know that I shall call things by their right names. I am not to be told by any Virginia gentleman here, though I greet him as my peer upon this floor—Virginia is well represented here—I am not to be told that I may not talk about matters of the past. How comes William and Mary College here? She comes here to ask pay for losses which she sustained, because she went into rebellion. True, she graduated Washington. It is an honor to her. She graduated many other great men. I, too, had the benefit of a collegiate education; but my college has not taken an inventory. [Laughter.] I came originally from Massachusetts, a proud State; but she has not an inventory. She does not come here to the National Congress or before the world, claiming anything upon her inventory. My friend from New York here, [Mr. CHITTENDEN,] in his commercial business, always took an inventory once a year; and from what I have heard here in regard to this William and Mary College, I should think that the commercial interests—I mean the congressional interests which seem to be strongly the commercial interests of Virginia, take an inventory, as my friend from New York did, once a year or perhaps oftener. We do not talk so much about our great men; but I shall not stand in the presence of the National Congress and admit that Virginia has anything to boast of in her great men over the land that produced the Adamases and the Winthrops and the land that produced George Clinton, William H. Seward, Silas Wright, and Martin Van Buren. [A Voice: "And Webster."] I am going to talk about Webster in another part of what I have to say. He will appear in an entirely different connection. [Laughter.]

Now this college has produced great men; she has great and dear traditions; but why did she not follow the traditions of her great men? Did William and Mary, when she sent thirty-two out of her thirty-five teachers and all her pupils into the rebel army, follow the doctrines of Washington in his farewell address? Did she in teaching secession and rebellion for thirty years before the war, by which the Hotspurs of the South were stirred up to drag the common people into four years of bloodshed and war and destruction and misery—did she in all this follow the teachings of Washington or Jefferson or any others of her great men of the early times whose names are presented here to-day? Did Mason, when he went to carry the message of the Confederate States to Great Britain, think that he was following in the footsteps of that other Mason, his kinsman, who talked of the abolition of slavery on his way to the national convention to look after the early interests of the colonies? It is because this college forgot her great men that she comes here to-day suppliant, cringing, begging for money at the hands of those whose sons she has caused to lie down in bloody graves by the side of her own sons that she hounded on to death and destruction.

"Ah! but Virginia is proud of this institution!" Well she may be. I will say nothing against it. But William and Mary College counted the cost. She taught rebellion; she went into rebellion. She sent her sons into rebellion. Why should she not take the consequences? My northern friends, why should she not take the consequences?

It is said that there is no precedent for this thing. There is a precedent, quoted by Benjamin Franklin in the struggle with Great Britain. One day, said Franklin, a man was peaceably walking in the streets of London when a Frenchman ran out with a heated poker in his hand and wanted to apply it to the man's body. The man kicked him out of his way. Then the Frenchman said, "Monsieur will not let me do zat zing, but he will not be so unjust and mean as to refuse to pay me for heating ze pokaire." [Laughter.] Here is a case on all fours with the case made by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GOODE.] Virginia did not destroy the Union. Oh, no! William and Mary College did not destroy the Union! She and her admirals and her judges and her Presidents did not destroy the Union. No; those Presidents and those admirals and those other great men were in their graves; they were under ground; they were where a man's last year's potatoes are. The best of the potato was under the ground. I will not be unkind enough to say that Virginia keeps the tops to-day above ground; but these excellent potatoes were all under ground when the rebellion broke out. And the Union was not destroyed and Old Virginia is confident that we will not refuse to pay William and Mary College for her thirty years' labor in heating the poker.

But we are told that we must go into this thing because Virginia loves Massachusetts! How warm this affection is for Massachusetts! Massachusetts every once in a while sends out a man that has an aptness for being caressed. [Laughter.] Virginia talked to Webster; she told him she would make him President; that he was bound to glory. I am not certain but that he had the smiles of beauty shining on him, as they are given on some other occasions, to coax him from the path of his education, the path where his conscience and his God told him to go. But when the spider had got the Massachusetts fly into his parlor and into his net, what good did it do him? No Virginian remembered Webster at the presidential convention. No, no; I say to your Massachusetts Websters, I say to your Massachusetts Loring's, I say to your Massachusetts Hoars, when Virginia has used you she will cast you off as an unworthy thing. [Laughter and applause.] "Oh, but," says my learned and eloquent friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. LORING,] "we have had a Centennial!" Yes, sir; I was here, and I remember when an appropriation of $1,500,000 was asked as a loan from the Government upon good security, security that would return us and did return us every dollar, for the celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of American Independence, I find that on that occasion Virginia, for whom we are to have a new Centennial Fourth of July, gave to the negative side these votes: Mr. CABELL, Mr. DOUGLAS, Mr. GOODE, Mr. Terry, and Mr. WALKER. Virginia gave but one vote in favor of the Fourth of July of the one hundredth year of our existence; and that vote was given by a "carpet-bagger" by the name of Stowell; a man whom I heard a gentleman from Virginia bearing the name of JOHN GOODE taunt in this House with being a native of Vermont, addressing him as "the gentleman from Vermont." My Northern friends, democratic and republican, lay not the unction to your souls. If you are fooled, you are fooled with your eyes open.

Now my friend from Maine [Mr. REED] has taken the bread out of my mouth. [Laughter.] He said about all I could say, except these very few illustrations which I have presented. [Laughter.]

I do not stand in the way of Virginia. I will aid her in anything and everything which I may properly do to enhance her prosperity. If Virginia will build a cotton-factory to-morrow somewhere up the valleys of her hundred beautiful rivers I will vote for a tariff to protect the products. [Laughter.] If God in His providence should lead Virginia to build a ship, I will vote for a subsidy for that ship. [Laughter.] Not that I shall vote for any other; but if Virginia will do anything in order to promote the welfare and happiness of her people except talk democratic politics, [laughter,] I am with them.

Oh, but Virginia loves Massachusetts. [Laughter.] I had almost forgotten how much she loved her. Massachusetts had great men; Massachusetts had Sir Harry Vane, and certain other great men. But, sir, within two weeks—

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. Will the gentleman vote to take off the tax on Virginia's tobacco which now oppresses her?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. No. The man who is not willing to pay for the tobacco he chews does not deserve to have any. [Long-continued applause and laughter.] The man who is not willing to pay the duty on the beautiful peach brandy they distill down in North Carolina is not worthy to drink it. When he wants peach brandy, if it is half as delicious as represented, he can afford to pay the duty on it, and not in a mean and niggardly spirit take the duty off tobacco and whisky and brandy and put it on the women's drink, tea and coffee. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I am speaking in my own hour. I have not a great deal further to say, but I have the floor; I am talking good honest truth. [Laughter and applause, and cries of "Go on!"] I want to show how fraternal I am, and, above all, to the old North State. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will suspend his remarks, as his time has expired.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I am speaking in my own time. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has occupied the time yielded to him by the gentleman from Maine—sixteen minutes.

Several MEMBERS moved to extend the time.

Mr. BRIGHT. How much time do you want?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. About twenty minutes.

Mr. BRIGHT. I move the gentleman from New York be allowed to proceed for twenty minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. In this fraternal feeling which exists, of course there is no objection. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and the gentleman will proceed.

Mr. STEELE. I move the gentleman from New York have leave to proceed as long as he pleases.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I only want twenty minutes.

Mr. STEELE. As long as his wind holds out.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I will not be as hard on the House as that. I have nothing but feelings of kindness toward the old North State. I want to set her up before the country as she really stands in the galaxy. She has set herself at work; if she can foster manufactures at home she is doing it; if a black man wants to work there she lets him work; if a carpet-bagger wants to work there she lets him work; if a southern man wants to work and he is naturally a little better than a northern man, she lets him work. [Great laughter.] God bless the old North State! I wish the whole South were on the same footing.

I have very little more to say. I was proceeding, when interrupted, to speak of the love Virginia felt for Massachusetts and her great men. Sir, the blood of Massachusetts at home, the blood of Massachusetts which settled all over the North and West, the blood of Massachusetts represented on the other side of the House and on this side of the House, had a specimen within two weeks of how much Virginia loved Massachusetts. I never shall forget how the wind blew, and the thunder roared, and the storm came, and how the rain beat upon this House when the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HARRIS,] who sits before me, blew the horn, the party horn, and told them they must turn out from the seat to which he was legally elected a man from Massachusetts equal in education, equal in capacity, equal in social position and refinement to any man Massachusetts ever raised, or any man Virginia ever raised since the landing of the first pilgrim on Plymouth rock, when my ancestors came over, and every Virginian walked up like a little man [laughter] and showed his love for Massachusetts. And let me tell my friend up there from Massachusetts you will never find yourself in such a position but you will find Virginia just as magnanimous. [Laughter.]

Individually, I have no quarrel with the gentlemen from Virginia. They are most able Representatives and most agreeable and excellent gentlemen; but they are trained in the Old Virginia school of politics, and that is a complete perversion of the Assembly's catechism. The catechism that has been taught for the last hundred years in Virginia is: "What is the chief end of man? The chief end of man is to promote the success of the democratic party." [Laughter.] That is about the end that Virginia has attained in the last hundred years. I will not find fault with Virginia further than I am obliged to; but I say to you that Virginia, after a hundred years with a single industry, is found backing up her little wagon to the rest of the world to ask if they will not load a little of their surplus into the State that devotes all her energies to politics; a State that started ahead of all the rest in natural advantages for pecuniary prosperity. She had more highly-educated men than any State except Massachusetts; she had more wealth and more power and influence than any other State.

Look at New Jersey—my friends from New Jersey must pardon me, I feel that I must vindicate the truth of history—New Jersey, that God made the last of all that was made. [Laughter.] We have veritable statistics to show that when God had done the work of creation he had a load of sand over and dumped it down on the shore of the Atlantic, and called it New Jersey. [Great laughter.] But New Jersey was not settled with cavaliers. New Jersey was settled with mudsills, and New Jersey went to work while Virginia went into politics. And now the wealth of New Jersey is immense simply because New Jersey went to work. The Yankee notions produced by Newark every year will buy out, body and breeches, any thoroughly democratic State in the Union. [Laughter.] It is because they were mudsills and because they work. I do not wish to play the demagogue. There is nothing in my history and nothing in my blood that would induce me to do so. I am an old man and it is too late for me to set up for popularity. I am not like one gentleman in this House—not afraid of being called a demagogue. I am too old for that. Some may succeed in it but I cannot. It will not do. I am talking what is God's truth as affecting the prosperity of this country.

Mr. WRIGHT. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Yes, sir.

Mr. WRIGHT. Am I correct in understanding the gentleman to say he was not afraid to be called a demagogue?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I said I was too old for that, and should hate to be called a demagogue.

Mr. WRIGHT. Then he is not afraid to be called a demagogue.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I said I was. There is nothing in my history and nothing in my associations to lead me to believe that a man without property is better or worse than a man with it. But I do believe that a man in any walk of life that labors diligently in any calling, whether with property or without property, is worth a hundred politicians that simply work with their brains.

Now, the other day—and I want to speak kindly to him—I listened with profound admiration to my friend from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT,] of the Committee on Appropriations. And I agreed with him in very much that he said about the impropriety of putting another burden upon the backs of the overburdened people of this country. And I have heard also from the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WRIGHT,] who has just honored me with his beautiful countenance that always cheers but never inebriates, [laughter,] about keeping the burdens off the people. What is proposed here? It is proposed to cut the throat of the laboring people of this country with a silver knife having a jeweled handle, perhaps presented to us from the hand of beauty. Cut away, gentlemen, but you will not have my throat cut. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. CONGER rose.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. CONGER. I will give way for that motion, if it is understood that I am recognized as having the floor.

The motion that the committee rise was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. KNAPP reported that the Committee of the Whole House had had under consideration the private Calendar, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 189) to reimburse the College of William and Mary, in Virginia, for property destroyed during the late war, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill

(H. R. No. 3102) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to employ temporary clerks, and making an appropriation for the same; also making appropriations for detecting trespass on the public lands and for bringing into market public lands in certain States, and for other purposes; had further insisted on its amendments numbered 7 and 8, disagreed to by the House of Representatives; asked a further conference with the House upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on said amendments, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. WINDOM, Mr. DORSEY, and Mr. BECK.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House was requested, the bill (H. R. No. 3740) to provide for deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. FOSTER, by unanimous consent, the bill (H. R. No. 3740) to provide for deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, and for prior years, and for other purposes, with amendments by the Senate, was taken from the Speaker's table and the amendments of the Senate were non-concurred in.

Mr. FOSTER moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments of the Senate were non-concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. SINGLETON, by unanimous consent, the bill (H. R. No. 3864) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes, with amendments by the Senate, was taken from the Speaker's table.

Mr. SINGLETON. I move that the House insist on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate and agree to the request of the Senate for a committee of conference.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SINGLETON moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER announced as the conferees on the part of the House Mr. SINGLETON, Mr. SPARKS, and Mr. HALE.

MONUMENT OVER JEFFERSON'S GRAVE.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I ask unanimous consent to offer the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That inasmuch as to-morrow, Saturday, is Thomas Jefferson's birthday, said day be set apart for the consideration of the bill introduced by Mr. Cox in reference to a monument over his grave.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution?

Mr. DUNNELL and others objected.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Who objected?

The SPEAKER. Several gentlemen did. The resolution is not before the House.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. SPARKS, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported back the petition of 400 workmen of Pittsburgh, for an appropriation to enable them to proceed to and occupy the public lands as cultivators, and sundry other petitions of a similar import, and moved that the same be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. DUNNELL. This petition belongs to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. But the Committee on Appropriations ask to be discharged from the further consideration of this subject.

Mr. DUNNELL. These petitioners ask for an appropriation, and that is all they do ask for.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is a left-handed move on the part of the Committee on Appropriations to say that they do not propose to give them any such appropriation.

The motion of Mr. SPARKS was agreed to.

ARMY REGULATIONS.

On motion of Mr. BANNING, by unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 868) to provide for a code of Army regulations was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

GEORGE A. ARMES.

Mr. MAISH. By an inadvertence a clerical error crept into the bill restoring the name of George A. Armes to the rank of captain in the Army; the word "and" was inserted improperly. I ask that that error be corrected in the enrollment of the bill.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

WILLIAM LONDON.

On motion of Mr. HASKELL, by unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 712) granting a pension to William London was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. FOSTER. I move that the House do now adjourn.
Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Pending the motion to adjourn, I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope not; I hope we shall have a session to-morrow for the consideration of an appropriation bill.

Mr. CONGER. I understand that to-morrow is the day assigned for the announcement of the death of the late J. Edwards Leonard, a member from the State of Louisiana.

The SPEAKER. To-morrow at two o'clock it is understood that the Louisiana delegation will announce the death of Mr. J. E. Leonard, and that time is assigned for the memorial addresses in relation to Mr. Leonard.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I did not understand that.

Mr. SPARKS. Then withdraw your motion.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I desire to withdraw the motion I just made.

The question was taken on Mr. FOSTER's motion, and it was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By the SPEAKER: The petition of Mary Shen, widowed mother of Miles Shea, late of Company H, Seventh Connecticut Infantry, that the charge of desertion against her son be removed to enable her to obtain a pension refused on that ground—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. CLAFIN: The petition of 76 citizens of Boston, Massachusetts, against the revival of the income tax—to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina: The petition of citizens of North Carolina, for the application of the proceeds of sales of public lands for purposes of popular education—to the Committee on Education and Labor.

By Mr. HERBERT: The petition of Elder G. W. Lee, Elder N. Bransford, and others of Butler County, Alabama, for the grant of a certain lot of land for church and educational purposes—to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. HOUSE: The petition of professors of Vanderbilt University, that microscopical slides and lenses be transmitted through the mails—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. JONES, of Ohio: The petitions of J. B. Breckenridge and others, and of J. M. Fisk and others, of Morrow County, Ohio, against the reduction of the tariff on wools and woolens—to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. LANDERS: The petition of C. S. Mason and 22 others of Farmington, Connecticut, for the amendment of the pension laws—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. MCKENZIE: Papers relating to the pension claim of Hetty Dunning, of Christian County, Kentucky—to the same committee.

By Mr. MCMAHON: The petition of John Gallaher, for a pension—to the same committee.

By Mr. O'NEILL: The petition of W. S. Russell, president of the Philadelphia (Pennsylvania) Cotton Exchange, and others, for mail compensation for sea-going American steamers with competition for mail service—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. PHILLIPS: The petition of the colored colony of Nicodemus, Graham County, Kansas, emigrants from Kentucky, Tennessee, and other States, by their president, M. H. Smith, and secretary, S. P. Rountree, for relief—to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. REED: The petition of the Ocean Insurance Company of Portland, Maine, and others, insurers and ship-owners, for an appropriation to enable the Light-House Board to purchase and place at such points on the coast as such board may deem necessary the Courteney automatic buoy—to the same committee.

By Mr. RICE, of Ohio: The petition of Abraham Forrey, for an increase of pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. ROBERTS: The petition of Washington Booth, S. M. Shoemaker, Shaw Brothers, John Merryman & Co., and 104 others, merchants, shippers, ship-owners, ship-builders, and ship-masters of Baltimore, Maryland, against the transfer of the life-saving service to the Navy Department—to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, the petition of Alexander M. Templeton, for compensation for a horse lost during the late war—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. TUCKER: The petition of Baker Brothers and others, of Staunton, Virginia, that the duty on sugar be at so much per pound without regard to color or quantity—to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Also, the petition of citizens of Virginia, against the establishment of tobacco export warehouses—to the same committee.

Also, preamble and resolutions adopted at a public meeting of citizens of Lynchburg, Virginia, approving the bill for the construction of the Texas Pacific Railroad, reported to the House of Representatives, and for its passage by Congress—to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

By Mr. TURNER: Papers relating to the establishment of a post-route from Frenchburg to Young's Springs, Kentucky—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. WHITTHORNE: Papers relating to the claim of Rear-Admiral Stembel, United States Navy—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. WILLIS, of New York: The petition of merchants, bankers, and other citizens of New York, against the reimposition of the income tax—to the Committee of Ways and Means.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, April 13, 1878.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

INDEXING REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. BICKNELL. I am instructed by the Committee on the Revision of the Laws of the United States to ask unanimous consent that Senate bill No. 1014, requiring the commissioner for preparing and publishing a new edition of the Revised Statutes of the United States to revise and perfect the index of the first volume of the same, be taken from the Speaker's table for consideration and passage at this time.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objection.

The bill provides that it shall be the duty of the commissioner appointed under the act of Congress entitled "An act to provide for the preparation and publication of a new edition of the Revised Statutes of the United States," approved March 2, 1877, to revise and perfect the index of the new edition of volume 1 of the Revised Statutes therein mentioned, under the direction of the Secretary of State; and that the necessary expenses therefor, including such reasonable additional compensation as shall be allowed by the Secretary of State, shall be paid out of the Treasury, and a sum of money sufficient therefor is hereby appropriated.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table and read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be read a third time.

Mr. BICKNELL. The object of this bill is to provide a better index for the first volume of the Revised Statutes. The present index is extremely defective; a better one is absolutely necessary. The present reviser is not authorized to make a better index; all that he is required to do is to incorporate in the present index references to his own additions to the volume. The Committee on the Revision of the Laws have instructed me to make the request I have made; they are unanimously in favor of the passage of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BICKNELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DEATH OF HON. JOHN EDWARDS LEONARD.

Mr. ELAM. I have received a letter from my colleague, [Mr. ELLIS,] in which he states that it is not his purpose to call up to-day the resolutions he introduced some time since in relation to the death of Judge Leonard, of Louisiana. The reason is that several gentlemen who wish to deliver memorial addresses are not now here. My colleague through me asks consent of the House for permission to take up those resolutions on Thursday next at two o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The House will take notice of the intimation which has been made by the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. ELAM.]

GRAVE OF THOMAS JEFFERSON.

Mr. COX, of New York. I ask the attention of the House for one moment. This is the anniversary of Jefferson's birthday, the 13th of April. I am directed by the Joint Committee on the Library to report back, with an amendment, a joint resolution which was referred to that committee making a small appropriation for the repair of the monument to the memory of Thomas Jefferson, the appropriation to be expended under the control of the State Department. I will not take up the time of the House in further explaining the matter, for the joint resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk will explain itself.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read, after which objections will be in order.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 141) for the erection of a monument over the grave of Thomas Jefferson provides that there shall be appropriated the sum of $2,500, or so much thereof as is necessary, for the erection of a suitable monument over the grave of Thomas Jefferson at Monticello, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State.

The amendment was to add to the joint resolution the following:

Provided, That the owners of the estate upon which said grave is situated shall first quitclaim to the United States all right of property to two rods square of the land surrounding and including the grave, and grant to the public the free right of access thereto.

Mr. REAGAN. Will this prevent the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. It has no connection whatever with the morning hour.

Mr. COX, of New York. I ask unanimous consent—

Mr. FOSTER. I dislike to object.

Mr. COX, of New York. Allow me to make a statement beforehand.

Mr. FOSTER. What I would be willing to agree to would be to appropriate a sum of money to fittingly commemorate here in the city of Washington the memory of Thomas Jefferson. It seems to me that it is a disgrace to the State of Virginia to allow Jefferson's monument to get into such a state of decay as it now is in. Let us appropriate a sufficient sum of money to properly commemorate here in Washington the memory of Thomas Jefferson.

Mr. COX, of New York. I hope that the gentleman, having made his argument, will withdraw his objection.

Mr. FOSTER. I think I must object.

Mr. COX, of New York. I hope the gentleman will hear me after making his statement.

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly I will.

Mr. COX, of New York. I think it is very ungracious to make an objection, especially to-day. Jefferson did not belong to Virginia, but to the whole country. If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] could know what I know and what is known by some of our own members who have recently visited the resting-place of Thomas Jefferson, he would not object to the appropriation of this small sum—almost a pittance—or so much thereof as may be necessary for so honorable and patriotic a purpose. I hope we will give some distinguishing honor to this natal day of Jefferson by passing this joint resolution. Surely my friend from Ohio will not persist in his objection.

Mr. FOSTER. I would not object to appropriate $50,000, to be expended for that purpose here in Washington.

Mr. COX, of New York. We cannot, that I am aware, bring the remains of Jefferson here to Washington. I wish we could. We can at any other time make other provision for monumental honors to him at this capital.

Mr. FOSTER. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. DUNNELL. I would like to ask one question of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.] Is this $2,500 to be expended in the erection of a monument?

Mr. COX, of New York. No, sir. I will say to my friend from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] that after Jefferson's death there were found in his escritoire some memoranda in regard to his grave, providing for a shaft of granite, with the inscription which he desired to be placed on that monument. That monument is now broken, and the other graves and property around it in similar shameful neglect and decay. This is beyond expression mortifying to those who know the origin of our Independence or love the intellectual heroes of our elder day.

The inscription cannot be found. It is all effaced. The monument is in a scandalous condition. It will be shameful to the American people if, when their Representatives know the truth, they do not apply the remedy. Every year during the summer pilgrims go to Monticello as to a sacred shrine, to see the place where the author of the Declaration of Independence lived and where he is buried. I do hope that we may do something at least to put that simple grave in repair, and hereafter, if the American Congress should choose to erect in this city a suitable monument to the great fame of the third President of the United States, I shall be among the first to welcome any such movement.

Mr. DUNNELL. I do not raise any objection to the passage of this resolution, but I was in hopes that there might have been provision also for honoring the grave of another President of the United States—Zachary Taylor.

Mr. COX, of New York. I hope that will be done.

Mr. DUNNELL. I understand that his grave is without even a monument to mark the spot where he rests.

Mr. COX, of New York. I should not object to supporting a measure for that purpose at any proper time.

Mr. HANNA. I wish to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] whether the title of the ground on which this monument is to be erected is in such a shape that the Government will have the possession of the monument hereafter?

Mr. COX, of New York. We leave it to the Secretary of State to make proper provision for that purpose. We provide for obtaining title and securing access for the Government and the public as a condition precedent to spending any money by the Government.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. Speaker, I revere the memory of Mr. Jefferson above that of almost any other man, especially because he was the earnest, constant friend of the common schools. He drafted the article in the constitution of Maine relating to education, under the influence of which my State stands to-day pre-eminent for the general intelligence of her people. If Virginia had listened to the counsels of this eminent man and participated in his love for the common schools his grave would not now have been a neglected, desolate spot; the Congress of the United States would not have been called upon for an appropriation for the restoration of his monument. But, sir, I do not wish to visit upon Mr. Jefferson the sins of his State, and I heartily support the proposition of the Library Committee.

Mr. COX, of New York. I do not wish to engage in any acrimonious discussion; we had enough of that yesterday. Mr. Jefferson was a great lover of the cause of education. In fact, the climax of the inscription which he desired placed over his grave was:

Here was Buried
Thomas Jefferson Author of the Declaration of American Independence, of
The Statute of Virginia, for Religious Freedom, and Father of the University of Virginia.

He even omits from this inscription the fact that he was a President of the United States. The world would know that, for it is a part of dryest history. We all know, too, that he was our great philosophic teacher, the overshadowing intellect of his time and country. We know that he assisted largely in laying the foundations of our greatness "broad based upon the people's will." This is his distinguishing quality and the acme of his fame. Therefore, sir, upon this day of all others we should with alacrity and spontaneity pass a measure so honorable to his memory and which will reflect some honor upon the American Congress.

The gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. HARDENBERGH,] who lately visited Monticello desires to say a few words, and I shall yield to him. I fail to see my gallant and accomplished friend from Mississippi, [Mr. MANNING,] to whose visit to and observation of this neglected grave I am indebted for the original suggestion of the joint resolution which I trust will pass. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. HARDENBERGH.]

Mr. HARDENBERGH. Mr. Speaker, during a visit last week to Monticello and the grave of Jefferson, I met there his great-grandson, the son of Thomas Jefferson Randolph. He informed me of a fact I never knew before, that the original monument to Thomas Jefferson had been all chipped away; that a second one had also been chipped away; and a third is now undergoing the same process—an unsightly structure. Last night a week ago during a heavy gale the lower part of the brick wall surrounding the tomb was blown down; but it is about to be restored by the family of Dr. Randolph, who now have the matter in charge. The inscription is gone; not a trace remains. An obelisk stands over the tomb, but the whole site bears the evidence of a nation's neglect.

It does seem to me that no more fitting time than now could occur for passing a measure of this kind. It is fitting that on the anniversary of Jefferson's birthday the nation should at last do justice even in so small a way to his memory. The title to Monticello has been in litigation for a number of years, and I think a judicial decree has been made for its sale; but that does not affect the grave-yard, which is reserved to the family. Desolation and ruin mark everything around the place. I went through the house in which Jefferson lived. There is scarcely a whole shingle upon it, except what have been placed there within the last few years. The windows are broken; everything is left to the mercy of the pitiless storm. The room in which Jefferson died is darkened; all around it are the evidences of desolation and decay—a standing monument to the ingratitude of a great Republic. Let it no longer be said that the framer of our Declaration of Independence lies there mouldering with no fitting tomb over his remains to commemorate a nation's gratitude and a nation's pride in those principles which he announced in behalf of human freedom and happiness throughout the world.

Sir, on this day, the anniversary of his birth one hundred and thirty-five years ago, let us pause in our deliberations and pay this feeble tribute to the name and fame of Jefferson.

Such graves as his are pilgrim-shrines
Shrines to no code or creed confined—
The Delphian vales, the Palestines,
The Meccas of the mind.

Mr. COX, of New York. I am requested by gentlemen all around me to amend the resolution so as to make the appropriation "$5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary in the opinion of the Secretary of State."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to modifying the joint resolution as indicated by the gentleman from New York? The Chair hears none.

The joint resolution, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COX, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FREIGHT RATES.

Mr. BACON, by unanimous consent, presented the following preamble and resolutions of the Legislature of the State of New York; which were read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

Whereas there are now before Congress several bills seeking to provide for equity in rates of freights on property transported by common carriers in this country: Therefore,

Resolved, (if the senate concur,) That our Senators and Members of the House of Representatives in Congress assembled be, and they are hereby, requested to use their influence to secure the enactment of any wise and equitable law having for its object the prevention of violent and injurious fluctuations and unjust discrimination in rates of freight imposed by common carriers upon property transported by them in this country.

Resolved, That the clerk of the Assembly be directed to transmit a copy of the foregoing preamble and resolution to each Senator and Member of the House of Representatives from the State of New York.

By order.

EDW. M. JOHNSON, Clerk.

In senate, April 5, 1878, concurred in.

By order.

JOHN W. VROOMAN, Clerk.

TRANSFER OF LIFE-SAVING SERVICE.

Mr. BACON also, by unanimous consent, presented the following resolution of the Legislature of the State of New York; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

Resolved, (if the senate concur,) That the people of the State of New York, speaking through their representatives in the Legislature, do hereby protest to the honorable Congress of the United States against the passage of the bill introduced by Senator SARGENT, whereby it is proposed to transfer the control of the life-saving service on the seaboard and the lake coasts from the Treasury to the Navy Department, believing such transfer to be unjust to the officials who have brought said service to its present stage of efficiency, unwise by reason of its necessarily disorganizing effect upon the crews, and inexpedient as substituting inexperienced and perhaps incompetent persons in the places of those who by occupation and local experience have become qualified to man the surf-boats and efficiently discharge the other duties of the service. We therefore request our representatives in Senate and Congress to oppose the transfer.

By order.

EDW. M. JOHNSON, Clerk.

In senate, April 4, 1878, concurred in.

By order.

JOHN W. VROOMAN, Clerk.

COMPARATIVE STATEMENT OF TARIFF DUTIES.

Mr. KELLEY. I offer the following resolution calling for information from the Treasury. It may be proper to say the information has been already prepared. I desire to get it for the whole House instead of for a few members.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to furnish this House with a detailed statement of the articles enumerated in the "bill to impose duties upon foreign imports," &c. (H. R. No. 4106) showing in parallel columns the rates of duty proposed therein and the present rates of duty, the quantities and values of imported commodities which entered into consumption in the United States during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1877, and the amount of duties computed thereon at the rates named in said bill.

Mr. CONGER. On the 3d of this month, on the motion of the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. BALLOU,] the Committee of Ways and Means was directed by this House to have prepared and published for the use of the House a comparative statement of the duties under the present tariff and under the change of duties proposed in the new tariff bill. From that day to this, notwithstanding the instructions of the House, notwithstanding the desire of the House, I am informed that committee have made no preparation for the publication of that statement. I have sent to the document-room repeatedly for it. I very much desire, before the committee introduce any new proposition of that kind, to have fulfilled the peremptory order of the House by the publication of that statement.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to say, on receiving the resolution of the House, the Committee of Ways and Means transmitted it to the Treasury Department, and that, on my inquiry from time to time of the matter, I learned it had been sent to the House. On my last inquiry, some three days ago, I was informed it had gone to the printer the day before and would be ready for distribution as soon as it came from the Printing Office. This resolution contemplates not only that information, but a detailed statement of the items and amounts received. It has been already prepared. I have examined it. There is, I am informed, a copy of it in the hands of a member of this House, and not a member of the Committee of Ways and Means. And it is very desirable such information should be before every member when we come to discuss the pending tariff bill in detail. I presume the paper called for by the resolution of the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. BALLOU] and referred to by the gentleman from Michigan is now in the hands of the proper officer of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that he has made inquiry about this paper this morning, and learned it was in the hands of the printer and would be soon published.

Mr. CONGER. I received a telegram from the Public Printer yesterday or the day before that no such paper had been sent to his office, and I intended to-day to take the opportunity to call the attention of the House to the fact that such an important document as that, for some reason or other, was not yet prepared by the Committee of Ways and Means and not yet sent to the House.

Mr. KELLEY. I have been informed since I last addressed the Speaker that the messenger of the Committee of Ways and Means has carried that statement to the printer. I was informed three or four days ago by the Clerk that it had been sent. I suppose some misunderstanding or accident prevented its early carriage, but the messenger tells me he delivered it this morning to the printer.

Mr. CONGER. The reason I speak of it is this: although I am not complaining too much that the remarks of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means and my own remarks are suppressed in the RECORD, I did suppose a peremptory order of the House would receive some attention from the committee.

Mr. KELLEY. I am myself, as a member of the committee, as anxious to get that paper as the gentleman from Michigan can be.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say he has made inquiry from time to time as to this and he believes there has been no neglect in regard to it.

Mr. BALLOU. I would like to ask the gentleman if the items that are made free in the new bill will appear in the statement.

Mr. MORRISON. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if he will so amend his resolution of inquiry as that we should be informed what articles are to be put on the free list which are now on the dutiable list, and vice versa.

Mr. KELLEY. I have no objection to the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Illinois. But I will say to the gentleman that it is impossible for any statistician to answer those questions, as they can only be determined as the bill now stands when points shall be adjudicated by the Supreme Court of the United States. There can only be given a reasonable guess as to what are to be on the free list and what articles are to be transferred to the dutiable list.

Mr. MORRISON. I would like to have the gentleman so amend his resolution as to give us even the guesses of the Department.

Mr. KELLEY. I am quite willing to accept the modification suggested.

Mr. BURCHARD. I wish to say one word as to this. To my personal knowledge the clerk of the Committee of Ways and Means immediately proceeded to execute the order of the House. It was a labor that required a good deal of care to prepare those tables if they were to be accurate; and, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania has remarked, it required information from the Treasury Department. I do not think there has been any delay on the part of the committee or the clerk of the committee. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOL,] the chairman of the committee, is absent or he would probably be able to give the gentleman from Michigan precise information as to the matter. But I know personally that the clerk has been at work upon it, and that he went immediately at work on the tables which the House directed to be prepared.

Mr. CONGER. I could not understand how the committee could work several months on those changes of the tariff which they have been considering without having these facts before them.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks this debate is not in order. Is there objection to the introduction of the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The resolution, as modified, was adopted.

EVENING SESSION FOR DEBATE ON TARIFF.

Mr. KELLEY. Before I leave the floor I desire, at the request of a number of gentlemen, to ask that an evening session may be held on Monday, for debate only, when a number of gentlemen who have speeches prepared on the tariff bill and who are likely to be compelled to leave the city for a few days desire to speak.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks that the House direct an evening session to be held on Monday at half past seven o'clock, no business to be transacted and to be confined to speeches on the subject of the tariff.

Mr. MILLS. I desire to add as an amendment to the gentleman's proposition that there be evening sessions on Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday, for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar reported by the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Texas to make that motion immediately after action is taken on the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Is there objection to assigning the session of Monday evening at half past seven o'clock to debate on the tariff, no business to be transacted?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

EVENING SESSIONS FOR CONSIDERATION OF PENSION BILLS.

Mr. MILLS. I now move that there be evening sessions of the House on Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday, of next week, at half past seven o'clock, for the consideration exclusively of bills on the Private Calendar from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. EDEN. Nothing else to be in order except the pension bills!

Mr. CONGER. I suggest that the order should also embrace reports from the Pension Committee.

Mr. RAINEY. I was about, as a member of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to make that request.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I hope there will be no objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Texas. If the Private Calendar is not considered in some such way there will be a denial of relief to a great many worthy applicants.

Mr. BURCHARD. Why not proceed with the business on the Private Calendar in its order as on objection day?

Mr. BRIGHT. I think that would be the proper way.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the proposition of the gentleman from Texas provides much the most expedient way. It is customary to do this every session of Congress. It takes off the Private Calendar all the revolutionary pension bills, and all the invalid pension bills arising out of the late war, and gives immediate relief in such cases as have been passed upon. It gives also to the Senate time before the adjournment of this session of Congress to consider these bills and pass them. The Chair hopes unanimous consent will be given.

Mr. RAINEY. I wish to say this: that the Committee on Invalid Pensions have not had for some time an opportunity to report bills, and I think it is desirable that that should be included in the business assigned for the evening sessions.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will include that. The gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. RAINEY,] a member of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, desires that the gentleman from Texas shall include in his proposition that the committee may be allowed to report upon matters of the same character as those which are to be considered in Committee of the Whole, so that the proposition will be in this shape: that these evening sessions be set apart for reports of the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and Committee on Invalid Pensions, and for consideration of the bills of that committee as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MILLS. And as objection day.

Mr. DURHAM. I ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] to defer this matter for one week longer for this reason, that we expect to get up the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill next Monday, after the morning hour, and I will state that one of my colleagues on the committee [Mr. FOSTER] will be obliged to leave this city at the latter part of next week, and we want, therefore, if we can, to dispose of that bill next week.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the Committee on Appropriations can have all the day sessions of next week.

Mr. DURHAM. I merely stated the reason why I made the request of the gentleman from Texas.

The SPEAKER. The Chair's experience is that it is a bad time to consider appropriation bills at night.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. May I inquire if at these evening sessions bills that have been objected to on the Private Calendar will be considered.

The SPEAKER. If pension bills they will be considered.

Mr. FRYE. Is it distinctly understood that this does not include any general pension bills which may be pending before the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the motion relates only to revolutionary-pension bills and invalid-pension bills. The other bills to which the gentleman from Maine refers are probably upon the public Calendar, and the object of this motion is to strip the Private Calendar of a vast amount of business so that it will not only be doing justice to those applicants for pensions whose claims have been passed upon favorably, but also to the other bills which would not otherwise be reached in consequence of the Calendar being so full. If there be no objection, the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] will be considered as agreed to. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. CONGER. I withdraw my suggestion.

Mr. KEIFER. There is a misunderstanding about this matter. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] desired that the evening sessions should be considered as objection days, and now I understand him to withdraw that suggestion.

Mr. BURCHARD. It was the gentleman from Texas who made that proposition.

Mr. MILLS. My proposition was that the bills be considered as on objection day.

Mr. KEIFER. We want to know which way it is.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, then, wants to correct the statement which he made a few moments since. The Chair thought that that was not embraced in the original proposition, but was suggested by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] and when the gentleman from Michigan withdrew his proposition in that respect the Chair supposed that all pension appropriation bills within the class mentioned would come up for consideration, and it would not be within the power of a single member to object, but the gentleman from Texas now states that his original proposition included that the bills should be as on objection day. The House must understand, then, that this unanimous consent was given for the consideration of the bills referred to on the evenings named, as on objection day.

Mr. MILLS. When the bills are first called in their order on the Calendar one objection can pass them over, and when they are called a second time it takes five objections.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of considering the post-office appropriation bill.

Mr. MILLS. Will we have no morning hour?

The SPEAKER. That is for the House to determine.

The question was taken on Mr. BLOUNT's motion; and on a division there were—ayes 110, noes 55.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLOUNT. Before the House goes into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, I ask that the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations be allowed upon the floor during the consideration of this bill.

No objection was made, and the leave was granted.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Cox, of New York, in the chair,) and proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 4246) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes.

Mr. BLOUNT. I did not make a motion to close the general debate upon this bill in the House, and unless the committee desires otherwise, I shall ask that such time be allowed for general debate as will enable me to make such general statements as may be necessary to present the main features of the bill to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state that general debate has not been limited on this bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. I am aware of that, but I ask unanimous consent that debate be limited to such time as may be necessary for me to make a general statement of the main features of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his proposition more definitely.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask that such time may be allowed for general debate as will be needed to enable me to present to the House the main features of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. BLOUNT. Not exceeding an hour, and I have no idea that I will occupy that time.

Mr. BEEBE. Can the Committee of the Whole limit the time for general debate?

The CHAIRMAN. Only by unanimous consent.

Mr. BEEBE. Then I object to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] will proceed.

Mr. LUTTRELL. There are many members here who are upon committees which have important bills to consider, and we would like to know of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] when he proposes to proceed to consider this bill by paragraphs for amendment.

Mr. BLOUNT. I shall take some time to state what the Committee on Appropriations have done in regard to this bill. When I have finished that statement, I will then move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing general debate and enabling the committee to proceed with the consideration of the bill by paragraphs under the five-minute rule.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Does the gentleman propose to commence the five-minute debate upon this bill to-day?

Mr. BLOUNT. I do.

Mr. LUTTRELL. The gentleman understands that another matter has been set down for two o'clock to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. That matter has been postponed until Thursday next at two o'clock.

Mr. BLOUNT. The Committee on Appropriations have presented to the House a bill making appropriations for the postal service for the next fiscal year of the sum of $33,090,373. The appropriations which were made for the current fiscal year for this purpose amounted to $34,078,143. The estimates for the coming fiscal year were $36,427,771. The difference between the appropriations for the current fiscal year and those contained in the bill now under consideration for the next fiscal year is $987,770 in favor of the bill now under consideration.

It is a well-known fact that the postal service of the United States is continually growing, growing with the population, growing with the increase of the public business. I have before me a table, which will be found upon page 134 of the report of the Postmaster-General, made at the beginning of this session of Congress, from which I will read a few figures illustrative of the rapid growth of this service. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866, the cost for the railway service was $3,391,592; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1872, it was $6,502,771; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, it was $9,543,134, and for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, it was $9,053,936.

The star service in the mean time has been always increasing, both in the annual cost of transportation and in the number of miles of routes. The cost of the steamboat service is varied; it is now less than it was in 1870. There have been variations, some years an increase and some years a decrease.

On page 145 of the report of the Postmaster-General will be found a statement, including, among other items, the increase per cent. in the growth of the railway mail service in this country. It will be noticed that that rate of increase has kept pace in its retrograde movement with the repression of the business of the country. In 1871 the increase per cent. was 13.96; in 1872, 16.21; in 1873, 9.40; in 1874, 6.74; in 1875, 3.47; in 1876, 3.23; and in 1877, 3.04. This shows that during the last fiscal year the increase in the railway service has been less than for any other period since the war. Nevertheless there is, it will be observed, a slight increase.

The question then arises, how has it been possible for the Committee on Appropriations to bring forward a postal-service bill reducing the expenditures of the Post-Office Department? This is mainly attributable to three items. In the first place we have determined to change the method of compensating fourth-class postmasters. Under the present system the basis for adjusting their compensation is the amount of stamps sold by them; at least, that is the principal item. This bill proposes to return to the old plan of the cancellation of stamps. The Committee on Appropriations have taken as their method of accomplishing this purpose the fourth section of the bill reported from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads by the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. WADELL,] the chairman of that committee. They feel assured of the correctness of that plan from their confidence in the ability of the members composing that committee, and because of its recommendation by the Postmaster-General, and the general assent to it by every person connected with the postal service. The Postmaster-General, on pages XXII and XXIII of his report, uses this language:

I desire especially to call attention to a matter which has been earnestly dwelt upon by my two immediate predecessors, and to insist, as they did, upon the urgent necessity for a change in the method of adjusting the salaries of postmasters at fourth-class offices. In this class are embraced all offices to which appointment is not presidential, or more than 96 per cent. of the whole number, so that it must be evident that any evil and mischievous influence affecting the management of fourth-class offices must be potent and far-reaching in their effects. Under existing law, postmasters in charge of this class of offices derive their salaries almost entirely from a very large percentage on their sales of postage-stamps, while the salaries of presidential offices, having once been adjusted according to law, remain unchanged until a new adjustment is ordered. Postmasters of the first three classes appointed by the President, receiving fixed salaries of from one thousand to four thousand dollars, (except the postmaster at New York, whose salary is $4,000,) must account for all stamps sold by them at their face value, and their salaries would not be increased by the sale of an immense number of stamps nor diminished by the failure to sell any. Whether the sales of stamps at presidential offices amount to ten thousand or one hundred dollars, the Government receives the entire amount. But with offices of the fourth class the opposite is the case. A postmaster at a fourth-class office receives 60 per cent. of the amount of stamps sold by him in each quarter up to $100; on all over one hundred and not over three hundred dollars per quarter, 50 per cent., and on all over $300 per quarter, 40 per cent., until the amount reaches $1,000 or over, when the office becomes presidential and has a fixed salary under the method of adjustment prescribed by law. If a postmaster of the fourth class sells quarterly one hundred dollars' worth of stamps, or $400 annually, he receives of the proceeds $240 and the Government $160. If he sells three hundred dollars' worth quarterly, or twelve hundred dollars' worth a year, the postmaster would receive $640 and the Government $360. He may go further, and, in addition to the amount stated, may sell annually stamps to the value of $395, of which his share will be $338 and that of the Government $557. That is, under existing law, twenty-five out of every twenty-six postmasters may sell annually, in quarterly installments, postage-stamps to the amount of $2,095, of which each will receive $998, and the Government $1,097, while in only one office out of every twenty-five do the entire proceeds from the sales of stamps accrue to the benefit of the Government.

It thus plainly appears that the law now in force has created a direct antagonism between the interest of the Government and that of 96 per cent. of the postmasters. The postmasters of the fourth class are interested in selling as many stamps as possible, but the larger their sales become the smaller in proportion are the revenues of the Department; and, on the contrary, the greater the sales by presidential offices, the greater the revenues of the Department, for the country can only use a certain amount of stamps, and an increase of sales at fourth-class offices necessarily causes a decrease of the receipts from presidential offices.

If gentlemen will turn to pages 167 and 168 of the report of the Postmaster-General they will find the subject discussed there by the Third Assistant Postmaster-General, as follows:

To put the matter differently, during the three years these little offices increased their ratio of the total sales, from the standard of the preceding three years, just 5.34 per cent., or $3,841,587 73, at the expense of the presidential offices. It is fair to presume that the rate of commissions allowed on this sum did not average less than 50 per cent., at which rate the amount of commissions lost to the Government would be $1,920,793.86.

According to the calculations here made there is a loss per annum of at least $700,000 paid to postmasters that ought not to be paid to them, and will not be paid to them if the service is administered as it should be.

The next important subject is that of inland transportation, and first that of railway postal service. If gentlemen will refer to the report of the Committee on Appropriations accompanying this bill they will find in it the laws which have been passed upon the subject of compensating railroads for postal services. It will be seen by that report that up to 1873 the highest rate of compensation to railroads, even to those carrying postal cars, was $375 per mile per annum.

By examining the report it will be found that quite a number of roads are being paid at this time over $1,000 per mile per annum. Now, during the last Congress a bill reported by the Committee on Appropriations was passed providing for a reduction of 10 per cent. upon rates as they then stood under the law. But notwithstanding this reduction rates of $1,000 per mile per annum still obtain. The committee, on examination of this subject, comparing the freight charges of 1873 with those of the present period, found that there had been a large reduction in rates as charged to everybody besides the Government. On pages 23, 24, and 25 of the report of the committee will be found a statement compiled by the Bureau of Statistics in regard to this subject. I quote from the report:

The impression has generally prevailed that, owing to the cessation of hostilities between the various through lines, the rates on through business during the past season have been higher and firmer than for some time previous. This has certainly been the case as respects some of the principal staples. At the same time it would appear from the returns for this year that through freights on the average ruled even lower than the low rates to which attention was called in the last annual report of this board, (page 8.) This is made apparent from the following table, which shows the average rate per ton per mile charged in the years specified on merchandise received from or delivered to other roads:

Railroads.	1875.	1876.	1877.
Boston and Albany.....	Cents. 1.17	Cents. 0.96	Cents. 0.85

Pittsburgh.....	2.61	1.39	1.13
Cheshire.....	1.81	1.01	1.08

The rapid reduction which has been going on in railroad freight charges during recent years is not generally appreciated. It will, however, be apparent on examination of the following table, showing the rate received per ton per mile by the Boston and Albany road through a period of thirteen years since the close of the war of the rebellion. It will be noticed that the rate for 1877 is but 34 per cent. of that for 1865:

Years.	Rate.	Years.	Rate.

I call attention likewise to a statement on this same subject from the Railroad Gazette of January, 1876:

Below we give the rates per one hundred pounds from New York to Chicago and from Chicago to New York that have been fixed during the four years ending with 1875:

1875.....	1 50	1 10	85	50	45	70

The large reduction to be observed here is in the heavy freight which constitutes the great bulk of freight carried over the roads. The writer continues:

On the great bulk of east-bound freight, we may say, in the four years from 1872 to 1875 the rates fell from fifty to thirty cents, or 40 per cent. in summer, and from sixty-five to forty-five cents, or 31 per cent. in winter.

Now, sir, in view of this most remarkable reduction in rates of freight, in view of the reduction in the cost of iron at least 100 per cent., of coal the same, of labor 50 per cent., we did feel it proper to consider the question whether the charges for transporting the mails of this Government should not respond to declination in prices in connection with every other interest in the country.

But, sir, lest there should be some alarm the committee determined to make the small reduction of about 5 per cent. With this statement of facts, I apprehend that no gentleman on the floor will hesitate to admit that the Government was entitled to at least this reduction.

In this connection I desire to call attention to a table on page 11 of the report:

Present cost of star and steamboat	6,386,751 80
New letting steamboat service	$684,803 24
Cost of new service	4,456,603 45
Difference	5,141,406 69
	1,245,345 11

By this table it will be seen that under the new letting for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, there is a total reduction of $1,245,345.11 in the cost of steamboat and star service as compared with the cost for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878. It will also be seen by a note appended to this table that there is a total of $219,912.48 hereafter to have its favorable chance of reduction under new contracts.

While freights have been thus reduced, while there has been a general reduction of values, and while we have been making a saving of at least 25 per cent. in the star and steamboat service, we felt that we should fail in our duty if we did not insist upon some reduction of the railroad charges for carrying the mails of the country.

We have on page 8 of this report a statement showing the amount of reduction accomplished under the 10 per cent. rule established by the last Congress. It appears that the 10 per cent. reduction would have resulted, if the law had gone immediately into effect, in an aggregate reduction of $935,527. There were a number of railroads then under contract. If gentlemen desire to be accurate, they will find in the report those upon which this law did not operate. There was something like $700,000 reduction. During this fiscal year the 10 per cent. reduction will apply to $1,000,000. In the next fiscal year there will be a further reduction of 10 per cent. on $100,000. The railroads generally are not recontracting, so that during the next fiscal year we shall not only have in operation these in addition to what we have had under the 10 per cent. rule, but we shall have in operation this 5 per cent. reduction throughout the entire railway service. We have therefore been able, as I will show by the figures when we reach the five-minute debate, to reduce this amount to the sum of $9,100,000.

Before passing away from the subject of inland transportation I desire to call the attention of the House to the tables on pages 13 and 21 of this report. They have been separated by the printer, but should have been published together. I desire to call the attention of the House to them because they are in reference to a subject in regard to which there was a good deal of discussion in the House when a successful effort was made to add $500,000 to the appropriation for the present fiscal year for the star mail service in the States and Territories. In this comparative table will be found a statement of the receipts and expenditures for the year 1860 and in 1877. It will be seen that in the State of Maine the star service in 1860 was 28 trips per week and railroad 8 per week, while the same service in 1877 was star service 4.4, steamboat 3, and railroad 9.4; New Hampshire, 1860, star 2.6, steamboat 3, and railroad 8.3; 1877, star 4.7, steamboat 2.9, and railroad 13.2. Massachusetts, in 1860, star, 3.9, steamboat 5, and railroad 10.3; 1877, star 6.5, steamboat 3.3, and railroad 14.5. Rhode Island, 1860, star 3.7, steamboat 6, and railroad 10.9; 1877, star 4.9, steamboat 6.6, and railroad 17.

I come now to the same service in some of the Southern States. In North Carolina in 1860, star 1.8, steamboat 3.5, and railroad 8; 1877, star 1.7, steamboat 2.7, and railroad 8.6, showing an actual decrease. South Carolina, 1860, star service 1.5, steamboat 1.5, and railroad 10.7; 1877, star 1.3, steamboat 1.9, and railroad 9.8. Georgia in 1860, star 2, steamboat 2, and railroad 8.3; 1877, star 1.5, steamboat 2, and railroad 9. Florida, 1860, star 2, steamboat 1.4, and railroad 6.9; in 1877, star 1.4, steamboat 1.4, and railroad 9. Alabama, 1860, star 2, steamboat 7, and railroad 8; 1877, star 1.7, and railroad 9.8. Mississippi, 1860, star 2.4, steamboat 2, and railroad 7.4; 1877, star 1.5, steamboat 1.4, and railroad 7. Tennessee, 1860, star 2, steamboat 6, and railroad 8; 1877, star 1.8, steamboat 3, and railroad 10.

It will thus be seen that while the star service in the other sections of the country has been almost doubled there has been a decrease in the Southern States.

And while on this subject I desire to call the attention of the House to the disposition of the large increase of the star service which we had in 1877. I thought as did a great many other gentlemen there had been a large increase of the star service in the several States under that large appropriation, but it will be found, if gentlemen will take the trouble to look into the subject, that in a large majority of the States there has been an actual decrease in the cost of the star service and that the large increase in the star service and the large increase in the expenditures for that service have been mainly in the Territories. In Nevada it has been $50,000; in Dakota, $53,989; in Wyoming, $112,809. So that, from some cause not patent to us and which it is necessary for us to investigate, while the star service has been stripped from other sections it has been carried into the Territories, with their very thin population, and a number of them get that service four times a week.

I have taken the trouble to call the attention of the House to this, because I believe it is an error in administration which ought to be corrected. In this connection permit me to say the Committee on Appropriations with unanimity have thought proper to abolish one of the superintendents of the railway transportation service, as now authorized by law, under the recommendation of the Postmaster-General and other officers connected with the Department, and to create instead a superintendent of steamboat and star-route service, believing the service could be better performed and at a cheaper rate if there were at its head some one who understood the condition of the service in all its branches, and could abolish useless routes and make the service generally conform to the new exigencies imposed upon it by the railroad service.

On page 49 of the committee's report there is a comparative statement of the population of the States and Territories in 1860 and 1870, which it would be instructive to contemplate in connection with this service; but I do not care to take up the time of the House with it. In the office of the Third Assistant Postmaster-General the committee have been able to make a reduction.

Mr. DUNNELL. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question? Mr. BLOUNT. As soon as I have finished this statement. The committee have been able to make a reduction of about $300,000 in the office of the Third Assistant Postmaster-General, with his assent on every item except one of about $10,000, which I may refer to in the discussion under the five-minute rule. This has grown out of their ability to make better contracts in relation to postage stamps, stamped envelopes, newspaper wrappers, locks and seals, and the various other items which that Department is compelled to purchase in the ordinary running of the Department. I will now hear the question of the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. DUNNELL. I desire to ask the gentleman if he argues that mail facilities should be furnished according to population or according to territorial limits? If I understood the gentleman correctly, he would be understood as saying that a territory sparsely populated should have mail facilities just in proportion to its population? For instance, if a county has twenty thousand inhabitants and another county has ten thousand inhabitants that the county which has the larger population should have correspondingly larger mail facilities. Am I correct in understanding the gentleman so to argue?

Mr. BLOUNT. If the gentleman so understood me I did not intend to be so understood. I simply brought forward these facts in a general way, believing that there were many elements to be considered, among them the population. I think the character of the employment of the people is another element. A community actively engaged in commerce requires a much more frequent service than one engaged in agriculture. I brought forward these general facts to show that upon no basis, whether you take territory, population, wealth, or the nature of the business, can the present organization of the service be justified.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes, sir.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I understood the specific increases of which the gentleman complained were those made last year, particularly in the Territory of Dakota. That was the largest.

Mr. BLOUNT. I said that was one of the largest increases.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Well, Mr. Chairman, I would like to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that that increase of service was made necessary by the discovery of gold in the Black Hills and the organization of the post-office and mail-routes to the city of Deadwood, in a mining district which is now shipping over half a million dollars a month. And I venture to say that small as it is, having probably not more than ten thousand or twelve thousand inhabitants, it does more mail business than any town of fifty thousand inhabitants east of the Mississippi River, and that it was certainly right to give such a community a mail service.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not maintain that that community is not entitled to the mail service, but I maintain that other communities are entitled to a share with the Territories, with their small population, in the like facilities.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Certainly.

Mr. BLOUNT. And it is only to this that what I stated went. But as the gentleman has referred to it, it may be right for me to make another statement. It is well known, sir, that in the last Congress there came in through various avenues from the Post-Office Department an appeal to gentlemen on this floor to increase the star service, with the statement that they did not have the money. The money was voted and the service in most of the States was decreased and the money went to the large contracts in the Territories.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Not to mine.

Mr. BLOUNT. If the gentleman will look at the table he will find his Territory has been pretty well helped. The great bulk of it went to these Territories. I undertake to say, sir, that I can select twelve of the States that have not got the mail service that they had before the war, and that the increase in a single Territory exceeded the increase in all of those States, notwithstanding the inducement sought to be offered to members of the House to increase the service beyond the amount appropriated.

Mr. HOOKER. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. BLOUNT. Certainly.

Mr. HOOKER. I would like to know why it was that the appropriation which was made by the Forty-fourth Congress for the purpose of increasing the star service was not used for the purpose for which it was appropriated; and if the star service was not increased as the bill directed it should be, what was the increase in the postal service by railroads and steamboats in comparison with the increase on the star routes?

Mr. BLOUNT. If the gentleman from Mississippi will turn to the tables on pages 144 and 145 he will find a full statement. But I will state to him generally that a comparison shows that the railroad service has been especially cultivated; I do not say improperly. The committee in getting up this bill have not sought to injure the postal service of this country in any branch of it. The reductions we have been making have been made on reasons which we thought were sufficient; and while that service has increased far beyond the other by reason of the attention given to it, or from other causes, perhaps, which it is not necessary for me to discuss at this time—

Mr. WADDELL. I would remind the gentleman from Georgia, in answer to the question of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. HOOKER,] that one reason, and the chief one assigned by the Department for having that $750,000 surplus, was that the act of Congress passed at too late a day for them to advertise and let out contracts for this service.

Mr. BLOUNT. Ah! but if the gentleman will turn to the table he will find that the money went into the Territories by hundreds of thousands.

Mr. WADDELL. I stated the reason why the surplus existed.

Mr. BLOUNT. But the money was spent.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Not all of it.

Mr. BLOUNT. No, not all.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Only about $700,000.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman is correct, no doubt, for the House will recognize him as always well informed in relation to the postal service.

I have deemed it but proper to make these statements in regard to several branches of the service all over the country, because it is well known that I attempted to thwart this side of the House in making an appropriation of $500,000 here in addition to the appropriation for this fiscal year. I did it because I thought that whenever we increase this service we should do it on information that would commend the confidence of the whole country.

I was not willing to vote one dollar unless I was satisfied that it was right. I think, therefore, in view of the facts in relation to the star service, we have rightly given the amount estimated for in the report of the Postmaster-General, less $1,000,000 which grows out of a reduction in the new contracts. Substantially, therefore, there is no reduction in the estimates. I have, I believe, presented to the House all that is necessary to a general understanding of the bill. As to its details, when we reach the five-minute debate I shall take pleasure in giving any further information that the House may desire.

Mr. WADDELL. Before the gentleman from Georgia takes his seat I wish to ask him what is his desire in regard to the general debate upon this bill?

Mr. BLOUNT. If the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads desire to discuss this bill I think the House is entitled to hear them. If they do not, I shall ask that the committee rise for the purpose of closing general debate.

Mr. WADDELL. There are a good many gentlemen who, to my personal knowledge, desire to discuss this bill, but there was an understanding that a special order, that in relation to the death of Judge Leonard, would be taken up at two o'clock, and therefore many gentlemen are absent; and I call the attention of the gentleman from Georgia to the fact that it is very doubtful if we have a quorum here. This bill ought to be discussed in a full House. We have amendments which we propose to offer at the proper time.

Mr. BEEBE. I desire to have the attention of the committee for a few moments upon this bill. If I cannot obtain it now I shall have to occupy the same length of time, under the five-minute rule. I have no disposition, however, to delay action on this bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. If it be satisfactory to the committee I will ask unanimous consent that the general debate be extended for one hour.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Allow me to say one word. I should have no objection to extending the time for general debate one hour or for the whole day, but I should object to the consideration of the bill to-day under the five-minute rule, for the reason that it was stated yesterday and generally understood that at two o'clock to-day a special order, the Leonard eulogies, would come up and a great many gentlemen are not here, this being Saturday, and I do not think the bill ought to be considered under the five-minute rule to-day.

Mr. BLOUNT. I am very anxious to go on with this bill. Gentlemen make suggestions which seem very reasonable to themselves and I will not say that they are not. The Committee on Appropriations, by reason of the sickness of its chairman, have not occupied the floor as much as the House has thought they ought to have occupied it. It is a general feeling and it is a right feeling that the business of the House should be proceeded with. If it should turn out that there is not a quorum here then of course the business will stop, but as a member of the Committee on Appropriations I do not propose to delay the consideration of this or any other appropriation bill.

Mr. BEEBE. I do not know whether the gentleman from Georgia proposes to press the consideration of this bill under the five-minute rule or not, but this bill involves an expenditure of $34,000,000 or thereabouts, and I think it would rather be a reproach than a matter of commendation if the committee should insist upon pressing the bill to a vote upon the same day on which it is first called to the attention of the House.

I maintain, and I think I can prove, that this very Department of the public service has been more neglected by Congress than any other Department. We talk here by the day and by the week about the Army and the Navy, neither of which branches of the service involves the expenditure of as much money as does the postal service of this country. I think the Committee on Appropriations might do itself and the country the justice of allowing this bill to be considered a little further before it is pressed to final action.

Do I understand, Mr. Chairman, that I am entitled to the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. Has the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] yielded the floor?

Mr. BLOUNT. I want to say this in reply to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BEEBE.]

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I desire merely to say that I have read this bill with care, and I will say to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] that I think his bill in the main is a very excellent one and in the right direction. But my point is this: to-day should be devoted to general debate upon this bill. It was the understanding that at two o'clock to-day a special order was to be taken up; that order having been postponed, in the absence of a great many gentlemen who are interested in this bill it is not fair now to proceed to consider this bill under the five-minute rule. I think it would be well to let general debate continue all day, if we choose. I think the gentleman would make better headway with his bill by allowing general debate to continue to-day, and then let the bill be considered under the five-minute rule the next time we go into Committee of the Whole upon it. I have no desire to antagonize this bill; in the main I heartily concur with it.

Mr. BLOUNT. If gentlemen desire to debate this bill one or two hours longer, I am willing.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I am not particular at all about debating the bill; but I want it understood that it is not to be considered to-day under the five-minute rule, because of the absence of so many gentlemen who had the right to believe that it would not be so considered to-day.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BEEBE] complains that it is wrong that a bill of this importance should be brought before the House and acted upon in detail under the five-minute rule on the first day of its consideration. If that is wrong, then our general practice is wrong. In the last Congress the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, which was considered for two months, was not discussed in general debate by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations for more than ten minutes I believe.

I think there is nothing wrong about this; we are simply acting as we have always acted. We have just passed the naval appropriation bill, every item of it, in one single day. Nothing is more common, and therefore it is not correct to pass such a judgment on what I have proposed. This bill has been reported for several days, and gentlemen have had full opportunity to examine it. For the present, however, I will not press the motion that the committee rise to close debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BEEBE] is entitled to the floor for one hour.

Mr. BEEBE. I have no disposition, Mr. Chairman, to delay the consideration of this bill, or to impede the progress of legislation in any manner whatever. I believe with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HANNA] that the Committee on Appropriations as well as the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads are entitled to credit for the degree of intelligent labor they have devoted to the investigation of this subject.

It has been a matter of public complaint for some time that while we have addressed ourselves to the work of reducing the expenditures of the Government in other Departments, we have not given to this postal service that consideration which has enabled us to satisfy the country either that the present rate of expenditure was proper and right or that it could not be reduced without detriment to the service.

By reference to the report of the Postmaster General for 1860, we find that the expenditure for the postal service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1860, was $14,574,772. There was a greater sum expended in that year, but the report clearly shows that a large portion of the total expenditure of $19,000,000 was on account of the indebtedness charged to this Department for the preceding fiscal year.

Starting out, then, with the proposition that the expenditure for the postal service for 1860 was but little more than $14,000,000, there is something startling in the contrast when we find that for the last fiscal year that service cost the Government nearly $34,000,000. I am aware that the country has increased in population, has increased in material wealth, and has increased also in its business demand; but I do not believe there has been any such increase as warrants this vast increase in expense.

I have given to this subject some little attention. In 1860 the number of mail-routes was 8,502; in 1877 the number was 9,234, an increase of but 732. In 1860 the total length of the mail-routes was 240,594 miles; in 1877 it was 292,820, being an increase of but 52,226 miles. The annual transportation in 1860 was 74,724,776 miles; in 1872 it was 147,353,251.

Here we see that while the number of routes is comparatively but little greater in 1877 than in 1860, and while the number of miles of those routes is comparatively but little greater, yet by reason of increased mail service the total transportation upon those routes is nearly twice as great in 1877 as it was in 1860.

In 1860 the total cost of this transportation was $8,808,710; in 1877 it was $18,529,238, showing an increase in the annual cost of transportation of over $9,000,000. Now, I maintain that where the transportation is doubled the expenditures for such transportation ought not to be doubled; but it has more than doubled.

In 1860 the length of railroad routes was 27,129 miles; in 1877 it was 74,546 miles.

The annual railroad transportation in 1860 was 27,653,749 miles; in 1877, 85,358,710 miles. Thus the railroad transportation in 1870 was three times as great as in 1860.

With reference to all this I make no complaint. I do not believe that the increased expenditure lies especially in this direction; and I do not wish to have the committee or the country understand that I would abridge in any particular the service which the needs of the country may demand. But wherever there is an unnecessary expenditure I take it that this committee will meet the demand of the country for economy, and, if the expenditure can be proved needless, will address to the correction of the evil the proper remedy.

The cost of railroad transportation per mile in 1877 was less than in 1860. Now, if we need this increased railroad transportation, there is certainly something encouraging in the fact that the cost for transportation is less per mile now than it was in 1860. But when we reflect that the present increase in miles of transportation is largely attributable to increased service over the same routes, by mail delivery oftener per day than formerly, we may well doubt whether even at the reduced cost per mile the expense is not still too great.

The length of the steamboat routes in 1860 is given at 14,976 miles; in 1877, 17,685 miles. The annual steamboat transportation in 1860 amounted to 3,951,268 miles; in 1877, 4,038,238 miles. The cost of steamboat transportation in 1877 was sixteen and five-tenths cents per mile, while in 1860 it was twenty cents per mile and over. Thus we see that both railroad and steamboat transportation cost less in 1877 than it did in 1860.

Mr. REAGAN. On what basis does the gentleman ascertain that the railroad mail transportation costs less per mile now than in 1860?

Mr. BEEBE. I make the statement upon the authority of the report of the Postmaster-General for 1860, and the report of the same officer for the current year.

Mr. REAGAN. If the gentleman will allow me, I will say that the maximum rate paid to railroads in 1860 was $300 per mile, and from that as low as $50 per mile; but there are now railroads receiving $700 per mile. It may be that the difference in the calculation results from taking into consideration the number of miles run daily. For instance, there may be a dozen trips daily between New York and Philadelphia, and the estimate may be upon the whole number of miles traveled; but I apprehend it will be found that over most of the railroads the cost of mail service is greatly increased beyond what it was in 1860. There may not be an increase in the rate per mile, if you take into consideration the increased number of daily trips, but the aggregate cost of the railroad mail service is greatly increased over 1860.

Mr. BLOUNT. Let me say that on some routes at this time over $1,000 per mile per annum is paid.

Mr. BEEBE. I am dividing the total cost by the total number of miles of transportation, and as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] suggests, the decreased charge per mile is doubtless because of the increased number of trips. Bear in mind I am not speaking of the rate per ton paid now and in 1860. The comparison in that regard is as the gentleman from Texas has indicated. The annual transportation on all other than railroad or steamboat routes (so-called star routes) in 1877 was 200,589 miles, and in 1860 198,000 miles. The annual transportation on these routes in 1860 was 43,119,751 miles; in 1877, 57,956,303. The cost for this service in 1860 was $4,385,193; in 1877 it was $5,663,970. The whole number of post-offices in 1860 was 28,552; in 1877, 37,345.

Now, I leave it to the gentleman from Texas and the gentleman from Georgia to show any disparity in the cost for 1877 as compared with that for 1860 in the rate of railroad charges per mile per ton of mail matter carried. I have not gone into this subject as fully as I should have done had I had the time. I felt that this matter would be carefully and fully taken care of by the committee.

But the point I am coming to is this: while we have seen that the transportation to meet the increased business demands of the country has not increased in cost per mile for the total number of miles traveled, we find that the salary account has been trebled, and I submit that there could be a reduction of several millions of dollars in this direction. I find that in 1860 the appropriation for postmasters' salaries was $2,552,868 and for clerks in post-offices $936,639, and that therefore the cost for postmasters and post-office clerks of all classes was $3,519,507. In 1877 the salaries of postmasters was $7,250,000, and for clerks in post-offices $3,340,000, making a total in 1877 for postmasters and post-office clerks of $10,590,000. Here is an increase of $7,070,493, or about 300 per cent. for these two items in 1877 over the amount paid in 1860.

Now, to understand whether this is a proper and legitimate increase it is necessary for us to compare not an office to-day with the same office in 1860, (that would be manifestly unfair,) but an office in 1860 with an office where the same amount of business is done in 1877. I concede that by this comparison it would not be singular if we should find in 1877 an increased cost; but should the increase be as great as we find? For instance, in 1860 in the city represented in part by the gentleman immediately before me, [Mr. CHITTENDEN], a city having then two hundred and sixty-six thousand inhabitants the postmaster's salary was $2,000 and there was then for clerk hire in that post-office $3,368.86, making the total cost for postmaster's salary and clerk hire in the Brooklyn post-office in 1860, meeting the requirements of a population of two hundred and sixty-six thousand, $5,368.86.

Now let us take, for instance, the city of Peoria, Illinois, with about twenty thousand inhabitants. We find that the postmaster's salary at that city last year was $3,000 and the pay of clerks $5,200, making the total expense $8,200 for a city of twenty thousand inhabitants in 1877 as against a total expense of $5,368 for a city of two hundred and sixty-six thousand inhabitants in 1860. I say that no increase of business, no legitimate increase of living expenses in 1877 as compared with 1860, warrants this great increase in cost. It is to be borne in mind that this is but one instance among hundreds and hundreds of offices throughout the country; and gentlemen may well be surprised at this great disparity in the expenditure for this feature of the service. Take the city of Poughkeepsie, in my own State. In 1877 the postmaster's salary was $3,000, the cost of clerk hire $4,315, making a total cost for postmaster and clerks in a city of about eighteen thousand inhabitants in 1877 of $7,315, as against a total cost for the same purposes of $5,368 in 1860 for a city of two hundred and sixty-six thousand inhabitants.

This fearful increase of expenditure in this branch of the service runs through this whole class of offices. At Portsmouth, New Hampshire, for instance, with nine thousand inhabitants, we find the total cost for postmaster's salary and clerk hire $4,600. Thus a place of nine thousand inhabitants costs to-day for these local expenditures of the post-office nearly as much as a city of a quarter of a million of inhabitants did in 1860. Portland, Maine, shows the same condition of affairs, and perhaps in an exaggerated degree. The salary of the postmaster in 1877 was $3,000, clerk hire $18,375, making a total expenditure for this local service in Portland of $21,375 per annum. In the city of Bangor we find that in 1860 this service cost $4,000, while it now costs $8,800. When I speak of local service I mean the service rendered by the postmaster and his clerks at his office.

Mr. COVERT. Has my colleague included in the estimates which he has presented the payments made to letter-carriers?

Mr. BEEBE. Not at all. I am speaking, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, of the salaries of postmasters and clerk hire in post-offices, and nothing else. You will find in this bill the first item is for the compensation to postmasters, $7,250,000. In 1860 the compensation of postmasters was $2,252,000. I have been endeavoring to show that while the cost for clerk hire in post-offices and for postmasters' salaries was in 1860 but $3,519,000, in 1870 these two items aggregated a cost of $10,590,000. I say there is nothing in the increased facilities given, nothing in the increase of population, nothing in the increase of the service to warrant this increase of nearly threefold in these two items.

But, sir, I do not purpose to claim the attention of the committee much longer. I only desire to refer to one other matter. Those offices where the postmasters are appointed by the Postmaster-General the salaries at which do not amount to $1,000, compromise 96 per cent. of the entire number of offices. It would be profitable for this committee and for the country to consider for a short time the increase in this branch of the service. Let me refer for a moment to the percentage given now and the percentage given in 1860, by way of compensation to postmasters at these offices. For the first $100 receipts per quarter there is now given 60 per cent., while in 1860 it was but 40 per cent. On and over $100 and not over $300, at the present time 50 per cent. is given, while in 1860 it was but 33 per cent. On and over $300 and not over $700 per quarter, 40 per cent. is now given against 30 in 1860.

So we find the same heavy increase when we reach this class of postmasters, and I claim that the service could be just as profitably rendered, the requirements of the public just as fully met if we should go back to the percentage given in 1860. By instituting reforms in these two directions we could save, without crippling the benefit the service yields to the country, at least eight if not ten million dollars per year. As I said a few moments ago, we found at the present time, as compared with 1860, the increase in the War Department had been great, and the increase in the naval service had been great, and we addressed ourselves zealously to the work of retrenchment and reform in those directions, but we have not given to this matter of the postal service the attention it demands. I am not here to urge that it should be curtailed in its benefits to the country at all. We need it. I am not here to urge, as was urged by the first Postmaster-General of the United States, that the service should be self-sustaining. I say the wants of the community and the requirements of the public should be fully met, but because this is a great and beneficial service to the public we ought not to lose sight of our duty to make it as efficient as possible, and at the same time guard it from extravagance in its administration.

There is another direction in which there could be a wholesome reform instituted. I have not the time now to go into it fully, but if any gentleman will turn to his own congressional district and institute an inquiry as to the rentals paid for post-offices in the larger places of his district he will find they are simply enormous. I have in my mind one place where the rental paid is $1,550 per year merely for office-room, and I undertake to say I can rent as ample room and as centrally located in the same city for less than half that sum per annum. I have in my mind another place where there is a contract with the postmaster for a room in his own building, running for some ten years, at $700 a year, and I can furnish equal accommodations, just as centrally located, for less than half that amount. Now, if we should address an inquiry to the Postmaster-General for a statement of the rental paid by the Government of the United States for post-offices we would find there was an abuse in this feature of the service which might well be rectified without any detriment to the public interest, and which would insure to the country an annual saving of perhaps hundreds of thousands of dollars more. Not only in the items of the service to which I have referred but in many others, I believe there might be an intelligent economy instituted that, while it would in no wise impair its efficiency, would save millions in the annual cost of its administration. If twenty-eight thousand postmasters cost but $2,500,000 in 1860, I see no good reason why thirty-seven thousand should cost $7,250,000 in 1877. Nor can I see anything in the increase of business to justify an annual expenditure for clerks in post-offices at the present time of $3,519,507 as against $966,639 in 1860. Where the Government has occasion to rent a room for a post-office I see no reason why it should pay from twice to four times as much as private parties are required to pay for the same accommodations.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, while I assisted as one of the subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee in the preparation of the bill reported to the House I do not know that I should have felt called upon to say anything upon the subject of the bill had it not been for the remarks that have just fallen from the lips of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BEEBE.] The gentleman from New York complains that while the last and the present Congresses have been urgent in cutting down the public expenditures in every other Department of the Government they have not been equally vigilant in making reductions in this branch of the public service. The gentleman from New York further complains that, instituting a comparison between the expenditures in the year 1860 and the proposed expenditures for the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1879, as recommended by this bill, a degree of extravagance is shown that ought not to be sanctioned by the favorable consideration by this committee and by the House of the bill that has been reported.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that if this bill that we have reported to the House errs in being extravagant, it is an error that has arisen not from a disposition to make the expenditures of this Department a dollar larger than the actual wants of the service require, but from inability on the part of the subcommittee and of the committee to ascertain what the real necessities of this service were. And I must say, speaking with reference to the chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT,] who has this bill in charge, that the diligence, zeal, and fidelity with which he has investigated every detail of this bill is a matter within my own personal knowledge, and which it affords me very great pleasure to speak of here in this presence. I have nothing to say with reference to the services of others who served on that subcommittee with him.

I will say now to the committee that, with two or three exceptions that I shall name during the few moments that I propose to occupy the floor, every proposition that is recommended in this bill commends itself to my judgment, and I can conscientiously recommend it to the adoption of those on the other side of the Chamber who agree with me in sentiment.

Mr. POUND. Which is the other side? [Laughter.]

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana, (who was speaking from the democratic side of the House.) I mean by the other side, the side to which I ordinarily belong.

Mr. BEEBE. The gentleman from Indiana is for retrenchment now, and is on our side.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I am very glad that my friend from New York [Mr. BEEBE] has instituted a comparison between the year 1876, which is the commencement of democratic supremacy in this House, with the last decaying years of democratic supremacy before the war. It calls the memory of the country back to a period that is freighted with memories calculated to send a thrill into the breast of every man throughout the country. I cannot say a thrill of patriotic pride at the performances of that administration, either in respect of the Post-Office Department or in respect of its administration of any other branch of the service of this nation.

The gentleman from New York complains that there was a larger amount expended for the compensation of postmasters in the year 1876 than there was in 1860. He complains that there was a larger amount expended for railway postal service in the year 1876 than there was in 1860. I want to say now with reference to this general matter that in the year 1860 the expenses of the administration of the Post-Office Department of the Government were in proportion to the extent of service greater than now. In 1860 the actual expenses of the Post-Office Department were $14,874,772.89. The receipts from that service—I refer to the ordinary receipts—were only $3,515,067.40; thus leaving a deficiency to be made up by an appropriation from the public Treasury of $6,356,705.49; and at the rate of deficiency on the business of the year 1860, instead of having something like $4,000,000 this year to appropriate out of the Treasury of the people, the same sort of economy now that was exhibited in 1860 in this Department would require that we should appropriate, instead of $4,000,000, at least $10,000,000 to cover this deficiency.

Mr. BEEBE. Will the gentleman allow me a question right there?

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. BEEBE. Does the gentleman mean to argue to the committee that because we now receive so much more from our postal service the expenditures and the deficits should be so much greater?

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I shall speak to that presently. I will say, however, in answer to the question the gentleman from New York has put, that it ordinarily costs, not only in public business but in private pursuits, to carry on any business a sum of money proportioned to the amount of business that is done; and the only manner in which we are able to form a judgment as to the amount of postal service rendered in the year 1860 is by seeing the amount of revenue realized from that service; and comparing it with the last year—on that basis, the basis of business and the basis of cost for carrying on that business—I say the democratic extravagance in 1860 if applied to-day would create a necessity for appropriating $10,000,000 out of the public Treasury instead of about the $4,000,000 that we recommend.

In 1877 the expenses of the Post-Office Department of the Government were $32,323,504.24. The revenue received from the business of that Department was $27,531,585.26, leaving a deficiency for the last year of $4,791,918.98, against a deficiency, as estimated this year, of only about $4,000,000.

Let us examine for a moment another item, for the purpose of seeing whether or not the charge is true that the committee is asking this House to pass an appropriation bill that, compared with the appropriations of 1860, is extravagant. I say that there has been a constant increase in the efficiency of the service of the Post-Office Department in all its branches, under its present and under its late administration, as compared with 1860, as regards its celerity, as regards its certainty, as regards its cheapness; and I propose to show it.

In the year 1860 there were 27,653,749 miles of mail carriage on railroads at a cost of $3,349,662, amounting to thirteen cents and one mill per mile. In the year 1877 (I quote the figures from the report of the Postmaster-General for 1877 and 1878 in that branch of the service) there was an aggregate length of 74,546 miles, on which these 85,358,710 miles of railroad service was performed at an annual cost of $9,053,936, being ten cents and five mills per mile, as against thirteen cents and one mill in 1860.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the Post-Office Department is more economically run now than it was during the last three or four years?

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I was referring to the year 1860. I will state to the gentleman, however, that my investigations satisfy me that there has been since the close of the war and the comparative settlement of the late insurgent States, the opening up of business there and the establishment of business relations there, an increase in the efficiency and the cheapness of the service.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I understood the gentleman to say that the service performed now is much cheaper than two or three years ago, that there was an improvement.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. No, not cheaper than two or three years ago. I have no question but that it is much cheaper comparatively than in 1860.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I want to say that it is a democratic Postmaster-General who has made that reform.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. The gentleman will find when he alludes to a democratic Postmaster-General that that democratic Postmaster-General, as he calls him, is following in the steps of his predecessor, the present First Assistant Postmaster-General, a distinguished citizen from my own State. If he will follow zealously and faithfully the example of honest government set for him by his republican predecessors, we may well hope that he will make a record that will contrast favorably with the record made by those predecessors, being as he is under republican influences that did not exist in that Department in 1860. Democracy in 1860 and republicanism now make the whole difference. Democracy always means extravagance.

But I desire to go on with what I was saying. There is an equally noticeable improvement as proposed in the present bill and as shown by the service during the last year in reference to steamboat mail service.

In the year 1860 this service was carried on at an expense of $1,075,852; being twenty cents and seven mills for each mile in that sort of service. During the last fiscal year the length of steamboat routes was 17,685 miles. The total annual transportation by steamboat and other service was 4,038,288 miles, at an annual cost of $666,939, being sixteen cents and five mills per mile as against twenty cents and seven mills per mile in 1860.

Take the star service in 1860. There were 18,651,161 miles of the service, at a cost of $2,550,365; being thirteen cents and seven mills for each mile of the service. In the year 1877 the length of the routes were 200,549 miles, the entire service during the year being 57,956,303 miles, at an annual cost of $5,663,970, or about nine cents and seven mills as against thirteen cents and seven mills in 1860. Now if gentlemen want to return to the extravagance of that period I say that instead of an appropriation of $33,000,000, as recommended in this bill, it would involve an expenditure of at least $40,000,000.

Mr. BEEBE. Do I understand the gentleman to say that there has been such an increase in the general mail service that would make that rate of expenditure in 1860, if followed here, cost $43,000,000?

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. No, sir; I said $40,000,000.

Mr. BEEBE. Will the gentleman state what he understands to be the general increase of mail service to-day over what it was in 1860?

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I reached the conclusions which I have stated by the table laid before us by the Postmaster-General. I have not the time to refer to those tables now, but they are in the report, which the gentleman can examine for himself at his leisure. I reached the conclusion that upon the basis of expenditure in 1860 it would cost $40,000,000 for this year. I reach this by computing the increased percentage for the service at the ratio shown in the report of 1860 as compared with that of 1877.

I have said now all that I desire to say in that direction. I want to say a word or two further with reference to this bill. I have said that it afforded me pleasure to bear cheerful testimony to the general features of this bill. With three or four exceptions, I am satisfied that the bill will meet the entire wants of the service, and at the same time reduce the expenditure to as low a point as any man who will intelligently and understandingly investigate the subject will feel that the service can be brought down to.

On the first page of the bill will be found an item with reference to special agents. Last year there was appropriated for that service $135,000. For the coming fiscal year the Post-Office Department estimated for that service $150,000. This bill recommends the appropriation of $100,000. Under the provisions of section 4017 of the Revised Statutes, in addition to an annual compensation of $1,500 the special agents received a per diem compensation of $5 for their traveling expenses. That amount was fixed at a time when all forms of service were much higher than now, and when the purchasing power of money was very much lower than it is now.

I concur with the committee in the belief that the time has come when that could be reduced to $3 per day. While I agree to that, I am free to say that I believe that instead of the amount recommended by this bill there ought to be $25,000 added to that item. Before this bill becomes a law I hope to see that item increased by the amount of $25,000. With that increase, from the information which I possess, I believe that this service will be sufficiently provided for to make it efficient for the purpose for which it was created.

I do not propose to speak of those features of the bill that I approve of. On page 5 of the bill there is an item recommending the appropriation of $9,100,000 for the transportation of mails by railroads; $125,000 of which sum may be used by the Postmaster-General to obtain proper facilities from the great trunk-lines of railroads for the railway post-office service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879. I should have been glad to have seen that increased to $150,000. I believe it would add to the efficiency and the popularity of the service to make that increase.

I come now to the post-office railway clerks, route agents, mail-route messengers, and local agents, on page 7 of the bill. With reference to that it affords me great pleasure to say that in a spirit of liberality the democratic members of the Committee on Appropriations have consented to an increase over last year. I will say that they cheerfully consented to the increase of $95,000 for those four items.

It is only right that I should say here in this public manner that this morning I had occasion to call the attention of the superintendent of railway mail service to these four items, and he said that with $25,000 added to the item for railway post-office clerks and $6,000 added for mail-route messengers, making a total of $31,000, it would be all that he would need for that branch of the service. I shall be glad to see this bill increased in that regard.

With these additions to the bill, amounting to about $46,000 or $50,000, it is the result of the best judgment I can form from a patient examination of the needs of this service that the bill will appropriate all that will be necessary to maintain the service in such a condition as will meet not only the wants of the public, but substantially the desire of those who have this service in charge.

With a bill which is so nearly in accord with the judgment of those who are interested in the expenditure of this money and in furnishing this service, I think it hardly becomes gentlemen on the one hand to claim that there is a disposition on the part of the Committee on Appropriations to cripple and injure the service, or on the other hand to claim that there is a disposition to be extravagant in reference to the expenditures in this branch of the service.

I want to say that on the whole I believe, as the result of my best judgment, that this bill is one that is framed as well in the interest of economical service as in the interest of an efficient service of this Department of the Government.

There is another feature that is new in this bill, and that feature relates to the organization of the steamboat and star service under a superintendent or agent who is to have charge of those services—one agent and six special agents. I approve of that; I believe that is in the interest of economy. I believe the Postmaster-General will be in a position so that under a responsible and intelligent head the wants and needs of this service in the States and Territories that require it most may be thoroughly scrutinized. We will thus be able to put service where it is needed, and avoid the placing of the service at the impertunity of Senators and Representatives where it may not be needed. For that reason I approve of that feature of the bill.

In conclusion, taking the bill as a whole, I feel entirely warranted in asking the Committee of the Whole to stand by the bill with perhaps the two or three additions of a few thousand dollars which I have mentioned.

Mr. DUNNELL. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DUNNELL. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana a question. I see that the estimate of the Department for this service as given on page 10 is in round numbers $36,000,000. The amount of appropriation recommended by the committee is $33,000,000. Now, I would like to ask how the amount proposed to be appropriated in this bill for star service corresponds with the amount appropriated for the present year?

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. If I recollect aright the amount which we propose to appropriate for the star service is just the amount recommended by the Department for that service—not the amount recommended in the original Book of Estimates, but the amount recommended after the new lettings which effected a reduction in the cost of transportation in that branch of the service of something over $1,000,000.

Mr. DUNNELL. Is the column of estimated amounts on page 10 taken from the original Book of Estimates or from the revised estimates?

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. In the third column the item of $7,086,673 for inland mail transportation is taken from the original Book of Estimates. That was reduced, however, in consequence of the recent lettings having been made at such advantageous rates.

Mr. DUNNELL. I might have found an answer to my question by reference to the page itself. I see that there is a reduction of about $1,000,000 on inland and steamboat mail service.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. The gentleman will find a division of the estimate; in other words, for inland mail transportation by star and steamboat routes the amount is $5,390,673, and then there is another item of $700,000, making the amount of the appropriation which we recommend $6,090,000 in round numbers.

Mr. DUNNELL. But the aggregate is a million dollars less than is asked for by the Department?

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. No, sir; it is just the amount asked for in the revised estimates. I will add that in reference to the star and steamboat service there is no diminution in this bill from the amount estimated for in the revised estimates submitted after the recent lettings.

Mr. CLYMER. On page 11 of the report accompanying this bill the gentleman from Minnesota will see a statement which will answer his question. He will see that in the recent lettings there was a reduction of one million and a quarter of dollars upon the rates previously paid.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. Mr. Chairman, I had intended to examine this question with care for the purpose of throwing some light upon it during the general discussion; but as it has come up unexpectedly to me I will merely make a few general remarks, with an object in view which, when realized, will reveal to Congress and to the country that there is the same field for reform and for reduction of expenditures in the Post-Office Department that has been worked successfully with respect to the Navy and the Army and other Departments of the public service.

I ventured to say here three years ago, and I repeat it now, that whenever a thorough investigation of this question is made the Post-Office Department of this Government will be placed upon a self-supporting basis, as that of the Government of Great Britain now is. I have no more doubt of this than I have that we are an assembly of Representatives of the American people.

What are the generalities of this case? The enormous increase of expense which has arisen since 1860 grew up in the midst of war and after the war, and is due to inflation of the currency and all sorts of extravagance. The Post-Office Department employs a great many more men than any other Department of the public service. How is it possible that there should not have crept into it all the abuses which are common to the other Departments? The question answers itself at once to every intelligent mind.

The suggestions of my colleague [Mr. BEEBE] in comparing the expenses of this Department with those of 1860 have covered the ground; but when the details of this post-office business are investigated, investigated as no committee of this House can investigate them, investigated as no Postmaster-General can investigate them, it will be found that there are more abuses connected with it than with any other Department; chiefly, I believe, in transportation. I believe that we pay some railroads at least double what they ought to receive. I have no doubt that in the star service and in other directions it will be found that we are wrong in the aggregate more than the excess of expenditures over the income.

In opening this report of the committee in my hand my eye fell upon one feature, and I suggest it for the examination of members. I notice that in 1874 the compensation paid postmasters was $5,818,000 in round numbers. One year later, in 1875, it was $7,848,000, a difference of $1,530,000 in one year. This was not the year when post-offices were re-established at the South after the war; it was ten years later. Can anybody tell me why the compensation to postmasters increased one million and a half of dollars from 1874 to 1875, and why that compensation has not gone up since? If I mistake not the appropriation in the present bill for this purpose is even less than the amount expended for 1875—about $7,200,000.

Mr. BLOUNT. The amount appropriated in this bill is $7,250,000. The committee thought they might have reduced it lower, but they did not do so because the compensation to which postmasters are entitled is fixed under the law; and even if we should appropriate too much, it would only go back into the Treasury.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. Now, Mr. Chairman, my object in these few words—and I have said about all I wish to say—is to ask the committee, in this bill, or if not in this bill in some other way, to propose the appointment of a commission to sit during the coming year to investigate this question and see by what means, without detriment to the mail service, that service might be placed on a compensatory basis. I mean by this that it should be compelled to live within its means. I believe it would be perfectly easy, on proper investigation of this subject, to reduce the expenses of this Department and keep them within its income. The growth of that Department and the increased mail facilities extended throughout the country should correspond substantially with the receipts.

There are cities in this country which have frequent free deliveries; perhaps more frequent than is warranted. If necessary, let them be reduced. I believe, however, in every instance money is made by increase of these deliveries in large cities. In my city the increased deliveries have resulted in increased profits. So in New York, and so in Massachusetts, but as a general thing such may not be the case. Wherever they are not needed and result in increased expenses they ought to be reduced.

Mr. FOSTER. Did you not ask for an increase of the compensation of the postmaster at New York?

Mr. CHITTENDEN. No, sir; I think not. I opposed the decrease of the salary of the postmaster at New York, but never suggested any increase that I recall.

Mr. FOSTER. Is any postmaster in the country better compensated than the postmaster at New York?

Mr. CHITTENDEN. The postmaster at New York has greater responsibilities, four or five times greater, than those of any other postmaster in the country. He practically dispatches the whole mails of the country, both at home and abroad. Any man who will go there and stand by him and see what his responsibilities are and what he has to do will not say that he is paid too much.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think it is exactly the thing for the gentleman to do to charge the committee with want of economy when he opposes it.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I have not charged the committee with a want of economy.

Mr. STEELE. I rise to a point of order that it is against the rules to carry on any private conversation on any subject in this Hall. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken, and gentlemen must address the Chair.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I wish to correct the gentleman from Ohio. If I said a single word in criticism of the Committee on Appropriations I did not mean it. My object was to make a general statement of my convictions on this subject, growing out of the knowledge common to us all that in every other Department of the Government where money has been spent by millions we have found abuses and have found methods of correcting them and reducing expenses. The very first time I came to my feet on this floor in December, 1874, when I had been here but a fortnight, on a proposition to appropriate three or four million dollars in one item in an appropriation bill without any definite statement as to what it was for, I made a remark that I have not yet gotten over. I rose and asked what that three or four million dollars was for, and nobody answered, and then I ventured to say the time had come, or would come, when this Government could not appropriate its money in chunks of three millions without knowing what use was to be made of it. Since that time we have made some advance in finding out what became of money appropriated in these large sums. What I say now is, and it will go in the RECORD and some day or other come back as truth, that on general principles or the principles by which this Congress and preceding Congresses and the present Administration have succeeded in reducing the expenses of the Government, it will be found whenever such a commission as I have asked for shall investigate for one year this Post-Office Department that it can be made to live within its own resources and be more satisfactorily managed in the interest of the people than it ever has been. There is nothing more demoralizing in a family than to teach one of its members to spend whatever one wants to and look to the heads to pay the bills. It is just as demoralizing to a great government. There is no one Department where we spend so much as in this. Every one of our friends who come from the frontier and represent Territories, or who live in the remote States, have argued to their own consciences and to their own people, "The Post-Office Department spends $5,000,000 in excess of its income. Why not fifty?" Why not fifty? It will come to that in the end as sure as we omit to make a faithful effort to limit the expenditures of this great and profitable establishment within its own resources. Sir, have we not stumbled during the last year upon evidence going to show that I am not mistaken in this position? Have we not found that the Appropriation Committee made one item of appropriation last year of five or six hundred thousand dollars which was not needed? Have not the excessive expenses for the year ending 30th of June, 1878, been reduced about $2,000,000 below what they were for the previous year? I have not the figures before me, but believe such is the fact. That is a long step in the right direction.

Mr. HOOKER. When you refer to an appropriation made in the last Congress which was not utilized do you refer to the appropriation specifically made for the star service as contradistinguished from the other service?

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I refer to an appropriation of that amount which was not needed and not used, as stated in a recent debate on the floor of the House.

Mr. WADDELL. I suppose the gentleman refers to an amendment I offered to the appropriation bill at the extra session of Congress.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. Yes, sir. I will not detain the committee longer.

Mr. FOSTER. Did not the gentleman from New York vote for the star service?

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I undoubtedly did; but that is no reason why you or I should refuse to learn wisdom.

Let it be understood that I have made these general remarks with my eyes wide open, knowing that there was not another man on the floor, not even my colleague, who was prepared to take the ground that the post-office service can be and should be and must be made to pay its expenses. I have made them for the purpose of calling the attention of the committee to them. I have not criticised anything the Committee on Appropriations has done or has omitted to do. I have simply tried in a few words to impress upon the committee that we have a field here which can be cultivated to great advantage, and it is immensely better for us to take hold of it than it is to bask ourselves with efforts to cut down the salaries of consuls and clerks and deprive women of their buttered bread.

Mr. DUNNELL. I desire only to occupy a very few minutes and largely in answer to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHITTENDEN,] who has just taken his seat. He has made a comparison of the expenses of the Post-Office Department in the present year and the expenses of that department in 1860. Now, when a comparison is made between 1878 and 1860 the gentleman from New York ought to remember that there has been since 1860 a very large country developed and settled up that perhaps he knows nothing about.

I will allude to the State which in part I have the honor to represent. In 1860 we had one hundred and sixty thousand inhabitants, and we had not a mile of railroad. We have now seven hundred and fifty thousand inhabitants with twenty-three hundred miles of railroad. You will see at once, Mr. Chairman, and the gentleman from New York will see, that the expenses of the Post-Office Department in that State have been more than quadrupled. They have been increased tenfold. And yet very much of that State is still sparsely settled, and consequently the expenses of the Government there in the Post-Office Department must be beyond the receipts.

Now take the States of Minnesota and of Nebraska and of Kansas, the last-named State having probably to-day well nigh a million of people, although she has but three Representatives upon this floor, while my own State has eighty-six thousand square miles of territory. The gentleman from New York would seem to imply, and arguments have been made here in that direction, that the frontier of the country has been more tenderly cared for and generously cared for than the more settled portions of the country. Now, on an average, the people off from the railroads in those States west of the Mississippi get but two and three mails a week. The gentleman from Georgia rather implied that a man thus situated upon the frontier, a little remote from the cities, needed a little less intelligence than the man who resides in the city. I desire to say that he has more intelligence generally and that he desires mail facilities; and my theory is, Mr. Chairman, that the Post-Office Department is for the people and all the people. I would not maintain that a route should be carried through a sparsely settled portion of the country, and that a daily mail should be established; but approximately, the people of the whole country should have corresponding mail facilities.

Take the free-delivery system of Brooklyn and of New York. The gentleman says that this system pays for itself. But if the gentleman goes through the Post-Office Department and attempts to retrench, he will find it very difficult to run the Post-Office Department for a less amount of money than is now provided.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. DUNNELL. Not now. The postmasters of the country are certainly not abundantly paid officers. The men who hold the offices in Brooklyn and New York and in the other cities are reasonably well paid; but the postmaster whose salary is $20, and $50, and $100 is subjected to all the inconveniences of the office with a very small compensation. The postmasters of the United States are more poorly paid than any other office-holders in the country. The town collector, the town coroner, and the town constable in any town in the country are better paid than the Federal postmaster in the country.

Take the star service. It is let under a well-guarded law. If there is a great amount of money in carrying the mail upon the frontier, why does not the gentleman from New York put in his bids and take some of these contracts and carry the mail?

Mr. Chairman, I believe in retrenchment and reform and economy. But the Post-Office Department is run to-day with very great economy, in my judgment. I am denied every week mail facilities in my district where there are men from New York and Pennsylvania and the older States pouring in; and they desire mail facilities. Those coming from New England have been in the habit of having a daily mail and they desire a daily mail as they settle out upon the frontier. But I am denied this by the Department. They tell me they cannot do it because the income of the route will not pay for it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am glad to know that in this bill the Appropriations Committee has met the demands of the star service of the country. It is a service that ought to be well cared for. Intelligence should be encouraged. It should be made easy. It should be brought home to every family. The newspaper is the great power of the country.

I did not intend, Mr. Chairman, to make any lengthened remarks. I simply ask that the gentleman from New York when he talks about comparing 1878 with 1860 shall study western statistics and remember that an empire has grown up west of the Mississippi River. If Brooklyn has not grown during the last eighteen years, the West has.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. She has, and her expenditures have grown in proportion to her increase, and the gentleman knows that.

Mr. CLYMER obtained the floor.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. Will the gentleman allow me one word?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Let me say a word.

Mr. CLYMER. I will yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TOWNSEND] for a moment and will then yield to his colleague, [Mr. CHITTENDEN.]

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I want to say one word. My friend and colleague [Mr. CHITTENDEN] has told us that in a few years we shall bring this mail service on the same footing and pecuniary success that the mail service is brought to in England. Mr. Chairman, we will do it when we reduce the American empire to the dimensions of the British Islands. A Yankee was in England and it was found that he never went out of doors at night. They asked him how this happened and he said he was afraid to go out. He got about the place very well in the day-time, but he never dared to go out of doors in the night for fear he should step off.

Now, if my friend is going to reduce the American empire, to diminish it so that a man will be afraid every night when he goes out of doors that he will step off into one or the other of the oceans, then we can compare our mail service with the mail service of England.

Sir, there is not in all the expenditures of the Government any service where the people of this country can afford to expend the money necessary to be expended so well as in the service of the Post-Office Department. It is the service that distributes knowledge. It is the service that tells one part of this country about the other. It is the service that makes us a homogeneous people; a people with one destiny and one common interest, and, sir, if the Post-Office Department does not quite pay expenses I shall sleep very soundly and my constituents will sleep very soundly if we have adequate mail facilities, and that whether I am at home in New York or happen to be on my western farm where by the beneficence of the country we enjoy mail facilities not quite as often as the gentleman does in Brooklyn, with half a dozen deliveries a day, we are glad to get a mail twice a week.

Mr. CLYMER. I now yield a moment to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHITTENDEN.]

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I wish to hold gentlemen to my point. The gentleman from Minnesota nor the gentleman from New York have touched it. I knew that there was no other man on this floor prepared to take my position. I know the growth of the country, the growth of its wealth, and the growth of its population, and the increased facilities required to carry its mails; but what I say is, that we have not investigated the abuses.

Nobody has told us why we pay railroads now, with their cheap steel and cheap coal, $1,000 a mile, when we paid none of them over $375 a mile in 1860. Let my colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] answer that. I said nothing about his frontiersmen. I would give them as many mails as he would, and I would give the State of Kansas all the mails that it can reasonably ask for, but I say that if you will appoint a commission to find out the height and depth the breadth and length and the whole area of this question, you will certainly discover that the present income of the Post-Office Department is more than enough, yes, more than enough, to do all the work that is now done, and do it better. That is my point.

Mr. WADDELL. Is not the gentleman from New York aware of the fact that a commission of that kind was appointed by act of July 12, 1876, and that it has now submitted its report to the House?

Mr. CLYMER. Mr. Chairman, I am loath to engage in this discussion at all, and although I was on the subcommittee of appropriations having special charge of this bill, I determined, after the very full and satisfactory statement of its main features by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT,] to defer any remarks or explanations of it which I might deem necessary until the debate under the five-minute rule; but it does seem to me that the two gentlemen from New York [Messrs. BEEBE and CHITTENDEN] have made unjust criticisms in regard to this bill and to the post-office service generally.

I am satisfied that no bill has ever come into this House which has received more patient or thorough examination on the part of those having it in charge than has this one.

I do not know that the officers of the Government could have shown greater willingness or alacrity to afford all the information in their power in order that the Committee on Appropriations might arrive at just results. The results we have arrived at are these: we have reduced the amount proposed to be appropriated very much below the estimates—over $3,000,000; we have reduced the amount to be expended in the year for which we are legislating nearly $1,000,000 below the amount which was appropriated for the current fiscal year. Surely in a general way these are gratifying results; surely they are results which should command the confidence of the House because, as I have already remarked, they have been arrived at only after the most careful examination.

This much with reference to the general criticisms on the bill. Now, with reference to the remarks of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHITTENDEN,] who has argued that the Post-Office Department should be made a self-supporting and paying Department; that it should be self-supporting as in England, my friend and his colleague from New York, the gentleman from the Troy district, [Mr. TOWNSEND,] has well stated the insuperable obstacle to any such result as that. If the post-office service was confined to what is known as the New England States, New York, and Pennsylvania, it is apparent from a table which will be found on page 13 of the report accompanying this bill that it will be a self-supporting institution.

In the New England States, excluding the States of Maine and of Vermont, and in Pennsylvania and in New York, the excess of receipts over expenditures during the past fiscal year was $2,268,577.57. That proves conclusively that if we were dealing with a compact territory, with a territory so densely populated as is New England, New York, and Pennsylvania, this institution would be a self-supporting one. But we have to deal with a mighty empire outside of that, extending far to the south and clear to the setting sun. It may not be that we should deprive of this service others outside of this favored belt, where there is population, where there are centers of trade, where everything seems to be gathered together. I am not here, for one, to do any such thing.

Let us for a moment compare the receipts and expenditures in this Department in 1860 with what they are now. On page 14 of the report it will be found that in 1860 the total receipts of the Post-Office Department were but $3,171,201.20, and the expenditures were $12,933,251.33, or an excess of expenditure over receipts of $5,577,845.26. It thus appears that in 1860 the expenditures exceeded the receipts by nearly 50 per cent.

Now, let us turn to the gratifying exhibit presented for the present fiscal year. In 1877 the total receipts were $27,334,917.69; the total expenditures were $31,178,966.91, an excess of expenditures over receipts of only $6,508,691.26.

Mr. CORLETT. Is not the gentleman mistaken about that?

Mr. CLYMER. Not at all.

Mr. CORLETT. In another column will be found $2,000,000 which should be added to that.

Mr. CLYMER. No, my statement is right. In 1877 the excess of expenditures over receipts was but about 20 per cent., while in 1860 it was about 50 per cent. Surely this is gratifying; this is encouraging. This points to the day, not in the very distant future, I trust, when we may approximate to a balancing of receipts and expenditures in this Department. But the fact is, as we all know, that it has never been in the contemplation of those who have made our laws and established our policy that the Post-Office Department should be merely a paying institution.

Mr. BEEBE. That was Franklin's idea.

Mr. CLYMER. The Post-Office Department is the agent of the people, the great convenience of the people; it is that which binds us together of all sections of the country. We have ever found that whenever the postal service did approach to self-supporting, at that moment Congress reduced the rates of postage so as to lessen the burdens of the people for this service, which is a necessity of civilization. So it will be doubtless in the future when we approach that point, as we may soon do if we go on at the same rate as we have done since 1860. There are doubtless here now some of us who are young enough to live to see the day when letters will be carried throughout the length and breadth of our country at one cent each, less even than they are now carried in the kingdom of Great Britain.

Mr. BEEBE. I think that my position has failed to be understood by the gentleman. What I desire to know is this: if, in 1860, 23,552 postmasters cost for pay but $2,552,868, why, in 1877, should 37,345 postmasters, only nine thousand more than in 1860, cost $7,250,000?

Mr. CLYMER. In order to give my friend an accurate and exact answer to his question, I would be obliged to have the tables showing the amount of pieces handled in the Post-Office in 1860 as compared with those handled at the present time.

Mr. BEEBE. But these postmasters have a largely increased force of clerks to help them handle those pieces.

Mr. CLYMER. So I grant you; and so of necessity they should have and must have, if the number of pieces to be handled have increased as I believe I could prove they have increased. I am not now prepared to show the exact number of pieces handled in 1860. But I judge sometimes of things by what is immediately within my own knowledge. Take the city in which I live; it has more than doubled, nearly trebled in population since 1860. I know that since that time her post-office business has increased to a very large extent.

Then we had a postmaster and two clerks; now we have a postmaster and five clerks, and I speak from my own knowledge, and speak advisedly, when I say that if there be in any part of the country an excess of officers to attend to the duties of any post-office, there certainly is not such excess in the office in my own town. I know how assiduously those officers labor; I know how attentive they are to their duties; and, if I may judge of the service elsewhere (possibly it is not far to do so) from these facts within my own knowledge, I know of no men who are more thoroughly taxed every day by the performance of their duties than the officers of the post-office in my own town. I know also that the salaries paid to clerks in that office are certainly not greater than those which are commanded elsewhere in the same town for like services.

I do not question that there may be abuses in a great service like this. They are inseparable from the public service; they must of necessity exist. The most that we can do is to apply a remedy wherever we may discover them. While we here, in the hurry of legislation, may at times do much, yet surely it is not within the province of the Committee on Appropriations or even the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads—if it were within their province it would not be within their power—to sit down and mature a plan which would lead to any very great beneficial results. I quite agree with the gentleman from the Brooklyn district [Mr. CHITTENDEN] that if there were a commission composed of capable men understanding this subject they might, with ample time, devise some methods which would be better than those that are now employed. But I would remind him that there has been and is to-day a commission charged with the examination of this subject—a commission composed of gentlemen who have my confidence, one a very distinguished resident of the metropolitan city of my State, Hon. Daniel M. Fox; another, Mr. Hubbard, of Connecticut; and another, a gentleman whose knowledge of postal affairs in this country, gained by actual service, is very great. What will be the fruit of the labors of this commission I do not know. I only know that we, as a Committee on Appropriations having charge especially of this subject, had to deal with the facts immediately before us, aided by such light as we had and such assistance as we could obtain from the Post-Office Department. This assistance, as I have before said, was readily, freely, and frankly given. We sought to deal with this subject not in a niggardly or ungenerous spirit, and I trust not with any desire to be lavish in expenditure. We sought to effectuate all the just needs of the service without unduly depleting the Treasury. When this bill shall have had fair examination, when in the five-minute debate there shall have been explicit explanations of each item, I cannot but believe that the Committee of the Whole will arrive at the same conclusion on almost every part of the bill as was arrived at by the subcommittee, and unanimously, I believe, by the Committee on Appropriations itself. I therefore commend this bill to the Committee of the Whole with a degree of confidence which I would not be justified in entertaining under other circumstances.

Mr. RYAN. I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] is mistaken when he states that the excess of expenditures over receipts is $6,000,000. I think that the amount is a little less than $4,000,000, because from the $6,000,000 of excess of expenditures over receipts in some of the States must be deducted the excess of receipts over expenses in certain other States.

Mr. CLYMER. I find that I was mistaken; but the correction only makes my position so much the stronger. I thank my friend for calling my attention to it.

Mr. RYAN. I wish to state, in regard to the subject under discussion, that perhaps no State in the Union has experienced greater need for liberality on the part of Congress in providing mail facilities than my own. Like some other Western States, it is increasing in population with great rapidity—so much so that during the last year our increase exceeded perhaps two hundred thousand. Of course this growth of population gives rise to new communities everywhere throughout the State—to a necessity for new postal routes and the establishment of new post-offices; and in some of these communities towns are growing so rapidly as to create a growing demand for increased allowances of clerks and the like.

All these things call for liberality upon the part of Congress in making appropriations, at least for the star service. I myself have been obliged, during my short career in Congress, to go day after day to the Department to obtain additional mail facilities, but in vain, for the simple reason that the Department was not provided with the necessary funds. We have been unable to obtain the necessary force upon our railways to distribute properly the mails between given points, so that the mails are frequently from necessity carried past the place of destination. In my own State the mail going eastward is frequently carried by the capital of the State to Kansas City, where it must lie over until the next day, when it is returned and thrown off. This is because there is not a sufficient force to distribute the mails upon the railway. I am informed at the Post-Office Department that there has been in the aggregate an increase during the last year in mails upon railways to the extent of 15 or 20 per cent., yet because of a lack of funds the Department has had to reduce the force. I do not know that this is the fact generally, but the force has been reduced largely upon railways in the West. Hence we are suffering in this direction.

I might say in addition, Mr. Chairman, that the new railroads which have been constructed in my own State during the last year, some three or four different lines, are now without any service whatever for want of funds.

Mr. BLOUNT. What sort of service does the gentleman mean, clerical force or route agents?

Mr. RYAN. I mean route agents—postal agents.

Mr. BLOUNT. If the gentleman will look at the report of the Postmaster General he will see that they have been taken off and concentrated on postal cars.

Mr. RYAN. I have learned that from the very efficient and honorable chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. I heard him make that statement the other day. But, sir, the fact remains that we are unable to get this sort of service, that we are unable to procure these facilities because there are no funds. There may be some abuses in the Department, there may be some wrong done us in the West, there may have been some discrimination against us; of these things I am uninformed, but nevertheless the naked fact remains that these lines of railroads are there to-day with no service on them whatever for the reason, as alleged by the Department, which I believe to be true, that there are no funds to supply that service.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Mr. Chairman, if I understood the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHITTENDEN] correctly, he said that the Territories had a greatly disproportionate mail service as compared with the receipts of their post-offices, and appealed to Delegates and members representing the western countries not to press for the establishment or increase of service upon routes until the business on such lines should be self-sustaining. Now, sir, we of the far West do not have our mails delivered to us five or six times a day in our homes and offices like our fellow-citizens in the great cities. On the contrary, the borderer is only too glad of an opportunity to ride from twenty to forty miles to a post-office where a mail is delivered once a week from the hurricane deck of a mail-rider's mule. [Laughter.] We do not expect the privileges which can only be afforded to thickly settled communities. We recognize the fact that the mails must bear some proportions to the business transacted through them. Yet we may fairly contend for such a liberal extension of mail facilities as are properly demanded by the settlement and growth of the country, and which will be alike beneficial to the new communities and to the great cities which desire to extend their correspondence and trade to new points of enterprise.

In the latter respect we have equities that have not been shown forth in this debate. From tables read to-day it appears that only in some half dozen States are the receipts of the post-offices in excess of the expenditures. Not only the Territories, but the Southern and Western States are in deficit. Therefore, gentlemen representing the few States named rest in the comfortable assurance that they are bearing the mail burdens of the whole country, and say to the rest of us, "If your constituencies were like ours the service would be self-sustaining." This is not entirely true. By basing the business of post-offices on the receipts and stamps canceled, an unfair showing is made against the West and in favor of the large cities. In these chosen States are New York, Boston, Philadelphia, all the large cities, where newspapers, magazines, and books are printed, and life and fire insurance offices located; the seat of a large number of enterprises which have their offices in these cities, but depend on the whole country for their business. From these points letters, circulars, magazines, papers, books go to all parts of the country. There is not a route running into any of the Territories or western States that does not carry in three times, yes, ten times the mail it carries out. The stamps upon this mail matter are sold and canceled in the great cities. But stamps sold and canceled in great cities do not represent the postal business of these cities only, but they represent the business in that regard of the whole country. The receipts at city offices no more represent exclusively the mail business of those cities than the receipts for customs-dues at the port of New York represent exclusively goods consumed in New York City, but, on the contrary, represent goods consumed in every section of the country.

The Southwestern States and the western Territories and the mining regions are to this Government what the colonies of Great Britain are to her, the springs and sources and tributaries which make up the great rivers of commerce and trade that flow to and from the great cities of the East. As well might you claim that the mouth of the Mississippi was the whole river, ignoring its mountain sources and all its mighty tributaries, as to claim that the mail business of the New York or the Boston post-office was the business of New York or Boston alone. There is not a mail-route in the Western States or Territories that New York and Philadelphia, Boston, Chicago, and Saint Louis have not a mutual interest in with the people living in those sections of the country. I have rarely applied for increase of mail facilities in my Territory without having received petitions from my constituents and also having received letters from New York, Chicago, and Saint Louis merchants, urging strenuously such increase as would give them more frequent communication with their correspondents. Mails are quite as necessary for your merchants who wish to send out their circulars or their due-bills, as for ours to send orders or drafts for payment in reply. The benefit of the mails is mutual.

Sir, the service in all that trans-Missouri region was recently relet, and relet under the wise rules established by the last democratic House of Representatives upon the amendments to former laws reported from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and carried through Congress by Messrs. CLARK, of Missouri, and Mr. WADDELL.

For the first time, sir, in my experience that service was let upon genuine bids. Straw bids were prevented from being put in. And under the wise laws of last session, and the rules and regulations enforced by the Postmaster-General and his assistant, General Brady, there was, for the first time since my attention has been directed to mail matters, a fair and equitable letting of the new contracts. Some of these are taken so low that bidders must fail, but responsible bonds have been secured. The expenses of the mail service on star routes over the western country have been reduced over a million dollars. They might perhaps be reduced still more were it not for the fact that third-class matter is carried on all those lines, and the large merchants of New York, A. T. Stewart & Co. and others, come into competition with our local merchants, and load down the stage-coaches with dry-goods, hardware, and every other kind of merchandise until, in many instances, special service has to be provided for this kind of matter alone. In this your merchants are really more interested than the people of that western country, although it is a benefit to both, but not exclusively to either one. Consequently you must consider this mail service as a whole. To put the receipts of one office or one State or section against another will not do. It is the business of the whole country that swells the receipts of the great cities. Without the country they would not do the business or show the returns they do.

The mail service must be considered as a whole, corresponding with the network of traffic over the land, and as a means of development, of increasing intelligence and diffusing education over the whole country, as the blood is carried from the heart to the extremities.

The gentleman in charge of the bill, [Mr. BLOUNT,] who made such a fair, able, and conscientious speech, to which the House listened with so much attention and benefit, referred, as it seemed to me a little unjustly, to the increase made in the Territories under the last appropriation for star service. I have examined the figures since I heard his remarks upon them, and I find that this increase was almost entirely caused first by the discovery of the gold at the Black Hills. The going in there of a community of such numbers of people that Congress is considering bills to give them a separate government; a community which produces half a million dollars in gold per month; where new mines are being opened, new mills erected, and a vast and active commerce, creates such a mail business as would not be transacted by ten times the number of people in the settled and quiet communities of the East. The next important item of increase charged to the Territories was the extension and increase of mail service from Texas to the Pacific Ocean across the path of the proposed great transcontinental railroad route, which is an undertaking of national importance. Well, now, that increase could not be properly charged to the local wants of New Mexico or Arizona. It was placing necessary mail service on a great national route, important to the people of the whole country, and especially the people of the whole southern tier of States, were interested in having that mail-route opened across the continent, that rapid communication might be had and timely intelligence transmitted along a dangerous border, threatened with invasion from Mexican robbers and hostile Indians.

And certainly the establishment of mail service to the Black Hills was necessary, and ought not to be charged particularly to the people of Wyoming. They had no particularly overshadowing interest in it. It was the Senators and Representatives of the people who had gone into that section from all parts of the country that called upon the Post-Office Department to open communication with their friends and had those new mail-routes opened. As I have said, a new community sprung up as if by magic; large amounts of gold were being shipped out, an immense business was being transacted, great cities were striving for this business, and great States interested in opening rival routes; what could the Department do but open communications with the new El Dorado?

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. MAGINNIS. Certainly.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish the gentleman to understand that I did not object to those Territories having mail service. What I objected to was their having a disproportionately large share of service as compared with the older communities.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Necessarily the service must be more costly, the lines being longer.

Mr. BLOUNT. If the gentleman will allow me, what I refer to is the number of trips per week.

Mr. MAGINNIS. The case is very different in the States which are traversed in all directions by railways carrying the mails every day and twice a day on the great trunk-lines to all important places. The star service supplies comparatively unimportant points. But in those remote countries whose capitals and commercial centers are two and three hundred and, as in my own Territory, over four hundred miles from any railroad, the star service not only supplies the smaller towns, but all the trunk-lines are stage routes. Over these main lines the mails, carried not on lightning trains but on slowly lumbering stage-coaches, certainly should go daily to be distributed by tri-weekly or weekly mails to less important or more remote points. A community must have great commercial resources to sustain itself at such great distance from modern means of transportation. And the mail business largely exceeds that of the same population in older communities where life is not so active and trade so great in proportion to the population. The postmaster in my own town of Helena, with five or six thousand inhabitants, drew up to last year as large a salary as the postmaster at Saint Louis, on account of the great business that is transacted at that point. And this leads me to say that in my opinion the gentleman from New York [Mr. BEEBE,] who has just spoken is in the right line of reform and retrenchment if it is to be made in the Post-Office Department. Reform is not to be aimed at by breaking down the value of the service, or by curtailing the number of routes through the Territories, the number of trips to the different parts of the country, but by cutting down the salaries and expenses of first and second class offices. There is no reason why the salary of a postmaster who may have no special training, who may be appointed to-day and removed to-morrow, should be larger than that of the governor or the surveyor-general of a Territory; or if it should be larger than these, there certainly is no reason why it should be larger than the salaries of the judges of the supreme court of the Territories—men who have, or at least are supposed to have, spent large sums and great labor in acquiring the learning and legal experience which are necessary to fit them to preside over courts and protect the rights of the citizen. Let reform begin here and not with the cutting down of mail service necessary to the business or to the development of the country.

And I must say for the present Postmaster-General and for the Third Assistant Postmaster-General that, since I have been in Congress, I have never known the business of the Department so carefully, conservatively, and conscientiously conducted. For the first time that I know of the last mail letting was a fair one. The men who put in the lowest bids got the contracts, and the lowest bids were not straw-bids either. If they have increased the service in the Territories it has only been where it was imperatively demanded; and I venture to say that the production of all the facts will show that the increase was not only necessary and justifiable but commendable and beneficial. I think it was a somewhat unfair reflection to intimate that they used too much of the appropriation to increase the service in the Territories, where no increase had been made for several previous years. The committee were not responsible for that appropriation. We had to thank the House for it.

Mr. HOOKER. I think you may add, the vigilance of the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. SCHLEICHER,] for obtaining an appropriation specifically for the star service.

Mr. MANNIS. I am very glad to make that addition, in justice to a gentleman who is not only a warm but an able defender of border interests.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire now to move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing general debate on this bill. I shall then move that the House again resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, and as soon as the first paragraph has been read I will yield to a motion that the committee rise for the purpose of adjourning. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Cox, of New York, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 4246) making appropriations for the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4246) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes; and, pending that motion, I move that all general debate on the pending bill be closed in one minute.

The motion closing general debate was agreed to.

Mr. BLOUNT moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. COX, of New York, in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House all general debate is closed upon the bill and the Clerk will read the first paragraph.

The Clerk read the first paragraph, as follows:

That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated for the service of the Post-Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1879, out of any money in the Treasury arising from the revenues of said Department, in conformity to the act of July 2, 1836, as follows:

Office of the Postmaster-General:

For mail depredations and special agents, $100,000; and not exceeding $7,500 of this amount may be expended for fees to United States attorneys, marshals, clerks of courts, and counsel necessarily employed by special agents of the Post-Office Department, subject to approval by the Attorney-General: Provided, That hereafter the per diem pay of all special agents appointed under section 4017 of the Revised Statutes shall be $3 instead of $5, as therein provided.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COX, of New York, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 4246) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

W. I. ALLRED AND OTHERS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting certain information concerning the claim of W. I. Allred and Alonzo A. Noon; and the same was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

BUILDINGS IN MEMPHIS, TENNESSEE.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report relative to the use and occupation of certain buildings in Memphis, Tennessee, during the War; and the same was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

SELF-ACTING TORPEDO.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report on the self-acting torpedo of Mr. Hubbell; and the same was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

OSAGE INDIANS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs inclosing an estimate of appropriation required to pay the Osage tribe of Indians; and the same was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting report of Quartermaster-General giving an approximate estimate of the aggregate pay and allowance of all officers and enlisted men in the Quartermaster-General's Department for a fiscal year; and the same was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SOLDIERS' HOME.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the annual report for 1877 of the board of managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PAY OF EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. GLOVER. I ask unanimous consent to offer a joint resolution for reference to the Committee of Accounts.

Mr. CONGER. Let us hear what it is.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Whereas the clerk and experts of the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department, by an inadvertence, were not sworn into office at the dates of their appointments and dates of service, and for which reason payment is denied:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Clerk of the House be, and hereby is, directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the House said clerk and experts from the date of their respective appointments as though they had been sworn into office at the proper time.

Mr. SAMPSON. I object.

PUBLIC PRINTING AND BINDING.

Mr. SINGLETON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4292) to reduce the expense of the public printing and binding, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Printing, and ordered to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. CABELL, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of Elizabeth Brockett, no adverse report having been made in the case.

Mr. HUBBELL. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at three o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. CARLISLE: A paper relating to the claim of George W. Taylor, of Kentucky—to the Committee of Claims.

By Mr. COX, of Ohio: The petition of scientific men of Dunkirk, New York, for the amendment of the postal laws so as to permit microscopic specimens to be sent by mail—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. GOODE: Memorial of the Cotton Exchange of Norfolk and Portsmouth, Virginia, for an appropriation to enable the Light-House Board to place automatic signal-buoys near Cape Henry and at the entrance to Norfolk Harbor—to the Committee on Appropriations.

Also, memorial of the Cotton Exchange of Norfolk and Portsmouth, Virginia, in favor of the construction of the Texas and Pacific Railroad—to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

Also, memorial of the councils of the city of Norfolk, Virginia, of similar import—to the same committee.

By Mr. HANNA: The petition of citizens of Indianapolis, Indiana, for a specific appropriation for a post-office building in said city—to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. HENKLE: Papers relating to claim of George L. Railey—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. McMAHON: The petition of Charles Ritchie, for a pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SCALES: The petition of petit jurors of United States courts at Greensborough, North Carolina, for the erection of a United States court-house in said city—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. STARIN: The petition of Low, Harriman & Co. and others, of New York City, against the passage of the pending tariff bill—to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. VANCE: The petition of Emma Jean Clark, for a pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. WILLIAMS, of Alabama: The petition of citizens of Loachapoka, Alabama, in behalf of the Texas Pacific Railroad—to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

Also, the petition of Owen W. Breman, for refund of income tax—to the Committee of Ways and Means.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, April 15, 1878.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.
The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday last was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. KERNAN. I present a joint resolution of the General Assembly of New York, in favor of the enactment of a law by Congress to prevent unjust discrimination in the rates of freight imposed by common carriers upon property transported by them. I ask that it may be read.

The joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and read, as follows:

STATE OF NEW YORK.

IN ASSEMBLY, Albany, March 25, 1878.

Whereas there are now before Congress several bills seeking to provide for equity in rates of freights on property transported by common carriers in this country: Therefore,

Resolved, (if the senate concur.) That our Senators and Members of the House of Representatives in Congress assembled be, and they are hereby, requested to use their influence to secure the enactment of any wise and equitable law having for its object the prevention of violent and injurious fluctuations and unjust discrimination in rates of freight imposed by common carriers upon property transported by them in this country.

Resolved, That the clerk of the Assembly be directed to transmit a copy of the foregoing preamble and resolution to each Senator and Member of the House of Representatives from the State of New York.

By order.

EDWARD M. JOHNSON, Clerk.

IN SENATE, April 5, 1878.

Concurred in.

By order.

JOHN W. VROOMAN, Clerk.

Mr. KERNAN presented a resolution of the Legislature of New York against the proposed transfer of the life-saving service from the Treasury to the Navy Department; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the petition of H. G. Gibson and 109 others, of the Associated Veterans of the War with Mexico, residing in the city of New York, praying the passage of the bill pending before Congress to place on the retired list of the Army the name of their comrade, Major-General James Shields; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a resolution of the Buffalo Board of Trade against a change of duties on flour, mill-feed, and wheat imported from Canada; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. KERNAN. I present also resolutions adopted by the board of managers of the New York Produce Exchange as to the most effective method of increasing exports of American products; also resolutions of that board in favor of allowing American citizens to buy or build ships for foreign trade in any part of the world and obtain for them American registers, and against subsidies or payments to particular lines of steamships, except such payments as may be necessary for the carrying of the mails. These resolutions are on several subjects, and I ask the Chair to suggest their proper reference.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks upon the statement that the resolutions should go to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. KERNAN. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. They will be so referred.

Mr. WHYTE presented the petition of Elizabeth Joines, widow of John Joines, late a sail-maker in the United States Navy, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the memorial of John A. Hamilton & Co., Edward Worthington, Ferdinand Latrobe, and others, citizens of Baltimore, Maryland, remonstrating against the passage of any act imposing a tax on incomes; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. EATON. I have here, addressed to me and my colleague, a communication signed by the president of Yale College, by Dr. Woolsey, the late president of Yale College, by the faculty of that institution, and by the mayor and common council of the city of New Haven, and various other citizens, regarding the arrest of a citizen of Connecticut, Mr. Noyes. I beg that this paper may go to the Committee on the Judiciary, although it is a communication directed to me.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so referred.

Mr. WALLACE presented the memorial of L. T. Eddy and others, workmen residing at Milesburgh Iron Works, Centre County, Pennsylvania, engaged in the manufacture of iron, remonstrating against a reduction of the duties on foreign imports and against the reimposition of the war tax on tea and coffee; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. EUSTIS presented resolutions of the New Orleans Cotton Exchange, in favor of an appropriation for the improvement of the Red River; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FERRY presented the memorial of John Higgs and 54 others, pensioners and citizens of Detroit, Michigan; also the memorial of Clinton Spencer and 40 others, pensioners and citizens of Ypsilanti, Michigan, remonstrating against the abolition of pension agencies; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CONKLING. I have received and present a memorial signed by a large number of leading business men in the city of New York largely concerned in the matter to which they refer, which memorial insists that the bankrupt law is an appropriate part of the jurisprudence of every commercial country; that the present bankrupt law in this country ought not to be repealed; and they pray Congress rather to appoint a commission to ascertain whether the principle of equality among creditors in cases of insolvency is applicable to the business system of this country, and if so, "whether it is not competent for your honorable body to so amend the law as to remove its defects and give to the country a judicious and satisfactory bankrupt law." I move that the memorial lie on the table, as report has been made.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COKE presented the petition of Eli Ayres, of Texas, praying for the passage of an act to quiet title to certain land purchased by him in the year 1839 from the Chickasaw Indians; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. INGALLS. I find upon my desk a series of resolutions adopted by the Washington Monument Society, in the sentiments of which I very heartily concur, and which I have great pleasure in presenting to the Senate. They express their wish that work should be resumed on the Washington Monument, and that it should be completed in accordance with the original design.

It will be remembered that two years ago Congress appropriated $200,000 for this object, and that the House of Representatives lately made an auxiliary appropriation of $35,000 for the purpose of strengthening the foundation of the monument, that was considered by some, I believe, to be insecure. This latter bill was sent to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds instead of to the Committee on Appropriations, where I believe it properly belonged. I do not wish to make any criticism upon the delay that has occurred in this matter. It is sufficient to say that there has been time enough since the original appropriation was made to have laid the topmost stone in its place, and to have made the column the loftiest structure that has ever been reared upon the surface of this planet by the hand of man. I think the American people want it finished, and that there is no merely sentimental expenditure which they will so gladly sanction. I hope that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds will report the supplemental bill at an early day. I see the chairman of the committee present and I should be very glad if he would do so this morning, and I believe that the Senate would unanimously approve the measure. I ask that these resolutions be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, I desire merely to say to the Senator from Kansas that he is mistaken in supposing the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds is present this morning. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] is absent, but I understand he will return to-morrow. I may assure the Senator from Kansas that the subject to which he refers has already received some consideration in the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and will undoubtedly be disposed of at their next meeting, to occur this week. So far as I am concerned, I assure him further that he shall have an opportunity, and the earliest possible, to ascertain whether the majority of the Senate are in favor of the measure which he so enthusiastically indorses.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolutions will be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

BUILDING FOR BUREAU OF ENGRAVING AND PRINTING.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to give notice that to-morrow morning immediately after the morning business I shall endeavor to call up the bill (S. No. 875) to provide a fire-proof building for the use of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and the mechanical branches of the Treasury and other Departments. It is very important to have this matter acted upon now.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HARRIS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3690) to relieve the churches of the District of Columbia, and to clear the title of the trustees to such property, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3969) regulating the appointment of justices of the peace, commissioners of deeds, and constables within and for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BURNSIDE, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3859) for the relief of Silas M. Norton, postmaster at Bristol, Connecticut, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BAILEY. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Lydia Dorr, praying to be placed on the pension-rolls, to report it back to the Senate, by the request of Mrs. Dorr, and to move that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the petition, and that the petitioner have leave to withdraw her petition and papers.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print 10,000 copies of Professor Hayden's annual report, to ask to be discharged from its further consideration, as another order to print this report has been adopted.

The report was agreed to.

ARGUMENTS ON WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the following resolution, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to:

Resolved, That 1,000 copies of the arguments before the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the United States Senate in behalf of a sixteenth amendment be given to Sara Andrew Spencer, chairman of the resident congressional committee of the National Woman Suffrage Association.

PASSPORTS TO COLORED CITIZENS.

Mr. WALLACE. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 1050) authorizing the issue of passports free to colored citizens going to Brazil, to report it without amendment. I ask the Senate to indulge me in taking up and passing the bill at this time.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of State to issue passports, free of charges and fees therefor, to any colored citizens of the United States who may wish to go to Brazil to engage in work upon the Madera and Mamore Railway, and suspends to that extent the provisions of section 4075 of the Revised Statutes.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NEW EDITION OF REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 23) providing for the distribution and sale of the new edition of the Revised Statutes of the United States, to report it with amendments. I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Of the 15,000 copies of the new edition of the first volume of the Revised Statutes of the United States required by the fourth section of the "Act to provide for the preparation and publication of a new edition of the Revised Statutes of the United States," approved March 2, 1877, to be printed and bound, the joint resolution provides for the following disposition by the Secretary of State: to the President of the United States 4 copies, one of which shall be for the library of the Executive Mansion, and one copy for the use of the Commissioner of Public Buildings; to the Vice-President of the United States, 2 copies; to each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress, 1 copy; to the Librarian of the Senate, for the use of Senators, 120 copies; to the Librarian of the House, for the use of Representatives and Delegates, 410 copies; to the Senate of the United States, for distribution, 700 copies; to the House of Representatives, for distribution, 2,920 copies; to the Library of Congress, 14 copies, including 4 copies for the law library; to the Department of State, for the use of legations and consulates, 380 copies; to the Treasury Department, including those for the use of officers of customs, 280 copies; to the War Department, including 5 copies for the use of the Military Academy at West Point, 55 copies; to the Navy Department, including 3 copies for the library of the Naval Academy at Annapolis, a copy for the library of each navy-yard in the United States, a copy for the Brooklyn Naval Lyceum, and a copy for the library of the Naval Institute at Charlestown, Massachusetts, 70 copies; to the Department of the Interior, including those for the use of the surveyors-general and registers and receivers of land offices, 255 copies; to the Department of Justice, including those for the use of the Chief and Associate Justices of the Supreme Court, the judges and officers of the United States and territorial courts, 450 copies; to the Department of Agriculture, 5 copies; to the Smithsonian Institution, 2 copies; to the Government Printing Office, 2 copies; and the Secretary of State shall supply deficiencies and offices newly created. The residue of the 15,000 volumes, together with any further number thereafter printed and bound, shall, by the Secretary of State, be sold at the cost of paper, press-work, and binding, with 10 per cent. added thereto.

The first amendment of the Committee on Printing was to insert after the word "Congress," in lines 14 and 15, the words "to the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives;" so as to read:

To each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress, to the Secretary of the Senate, and the Clerk of the House of Representatives, one copy.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add at the end of the joint resolution: The costs of the same to be paid from the general appropriation for printing.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 1167) for the relief of Peter G. Mills;

A bill (H. R. No. 3874) authorizing the Secretary of War to transfer to certain settlers whose lands were included within Fort Hart military reservation such portions as are not needed for military purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 3774) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1879;

A bill (H. R. No. 4242) to authorize the restoration of George A. Armes to the rank of captain; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 158) for the erection of a monument over the grave of Thomas Jefferson.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. No. 484) to authorize the construction of a bridge abutment and approach within the Fort Riley military reservation; and

A bill (S. No. 1014) requiring the commissioner for preparing and publishing a new edition of the Revised Statutes of the United States to revise and perfect the index to the first volume of the same.

The message also announced that the House insisted upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3064) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. O. R. SINGLETON of Mississippi, Mr. W. A. J. SPARKS of Illinois, and Mr. EUGENE HALE of Maine managers at the conference on its part.

The message further announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 374) to provide for deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (H. R. No. 1135) to authorize the issue of a patent of certain lands in the Brothertown reservation, in the State of Wisconsin, to the persons selected by the Brothertown Indians; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1412) to prevent depredations upon property in the District of Columbia.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. JOHNSTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1081) for the relief of David G. Potts; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Accompanying this bill is a letter from the First Assistant Postmaster-General which explains it. I move that the bill and the letter be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McDONALD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1082) to organize the National Railway Company of the United States, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. McDONALD. I desire to state that I introduce this bill by request, and that I am not in favor of it. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Railroads.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HEREFORD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1083) to incorporate the Collateral Loan and Trust Company in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. HEREFORD. I introduce this bill by request. I know nothing of its contents. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HEREFORD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1084) to authorize the construction of railroad bridges across the Big Sandy River and its navigable tributaries; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HEREFORD. I ask leave to introduce a bill, and I object to its reference to any committee this morning. I shall call it up for consideration to-morrow or as soon thereafter as I can secure the attention of the Senate.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 1085) to repeal all that part of the act approved January 14, 1875, known as the resumption act, which authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to dispose of United States bonds and redeem and cancel the greenback currency; which was read twice by its title.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will lie on the table, subject to the call of the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. PLUMB asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1086) to provide for the renewal of certain bonds required by law to be given by Army officers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1087) to provide additional regulations for homestead and pre-emption entries of public lands; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. ROLLINS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1088) to provide for the revision and correction of assessments for special improvements in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BURNSIDE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave

Mr. MORGAN (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1092) to regulate appeals to the Supreme Court of the United States in certain cases; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. JONES, of Florida, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1093) authorizing railroad companies to construct and maintain telegraph lines for commercial purposes, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. SARGENT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1094) for the pardon of certain deserters from the United States Army in 1848; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BURNSIDE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1095) repealing the several sections of the Revised Statutes relating to the tenure of civil offices; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. BECK, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of John B. Davis be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

On motion of Mr. McDONALD, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of D. Rodney King be withdrawn from the files and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

EFFECT OF TARIFF LEGISLATION.

Mr. ROLLINS, from the Committee on Manufactures, reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Whereas the manufacturing industries of this country are largely interested in any changes in the existing tariff regulations: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Manufactures be, and are hereby, authorized and directed to consider and report to the Senate the probable effect of any changes proposed in the tariff laws affecting the manufacturing industries of the country.

PROTECTION OF HARBOR AND WHARVES AT NEW ORLEANS.

Mr. EUSTIS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate the report of the hydrographic commission which was convened in New Orleans "to examine and report upon the means necessary to protect the wharves and harbor from the incursions of the Mississippi River.

CAPTAIN G. BANCROFT GHIRRA DI.

Mr. SARGENT submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to transmit to the Senate the record of proceedings of trial by court-martial of Captain G. Bancroft Ghirradi, of the Navy, on charges of cruelty to seamen, with the proceedings taken thereon; also any subsequent orders for the employment of said Ghirradi and the nature of such employment; also any correspondence between the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting on the subject of such orders and employment.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the General of the Army, recommending that section 1216 of the Revised Statutes be amended so as to include all enlisted men in its provisions and that section 1285 be so modified as to entitle the holder of a certificate of merit to the additional pay of $2 per month while in the military service; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a tabular statement of campaigns, expeditions, and scouts made in the Department of Dakota during the third quarter of the year 1877; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, Mr. MATTHEWS, and Mr. SARGENT submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them, respectively, to the bill (S. No. 802) establishing post-roads in the several States and Territories; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

ARMY RETIRED LIST.

Mr. SARGENT. The bill (H. R. No. 4245) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint James Shields, of Missouri, a brigadier-general in the United States Army on the retired list, passed the House of Representatives and was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate. I offer an amendment to that bill, which I desire to have printed and referred to the same committee. I ask that the amendment be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be reported at length.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert:

That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place upon the retired list of the United States Army the following distinguished officers of the late war, with the full rank held by each, respectively, at the date he resigned or was mustered out of the service, with the pay and emoluments to which officers of such rank upon the retired list are entitled by law: Lieutenant-General Ulysses S. Grant, of Illinois; Major-Generals John A. Dix of New York, George B. McClellan of New Jersey, NATHANIEL P. BANKS of Massachusetts, BENJAMIN F. BUTLER of Massachusetts, AMBROSE E. BURNSIDE of Rhode Island, William S. Rosecrans of Ohio, Franz Sigel of Missouri, John A. Logan of Illinois, Lewis Wallace of Indiana, Stephen A. Hurlbut of Illinois, W. B. Franklin of Pennsylvania, Henry W. Slocum of New York, Cadwallader C. Washburne of Wisconsin, Carl Schurz of Missouri, Alfred Pleasanton of New York, F. Smith of New York, James B. Steedman of Ohio, Granville M. Dodge of Iowa, JACOB D. COX of Ohio, RICHARD J. OGLESBY of Illinois, JAMES A. GARFIELD of Ohio, ROBERT C. SCHENCK of Ohio, John C. Fremont of California, John A. McClernand of Illinois; Brigadier-Generals James Shields of Missouri, ALFRED S. WILLIAMS of Michigan, Charles Devens of Massachusetts, William W. Averill of New York, Clinton B. Fiske of Missouri, William Vandever of Iowa, Ralph P. Buckland of Ohio, John McNeil of Missouri, John M. Thayer of Nebraska, Halbert E. Paine of Wisconsin, THOMAS EWING of Ohio, Alexander Shaler of New York, Judson Kilpatrick of New Jersey, John M. Corse of Illinois, Edward M. McCook of Colorado, John F. Hartman of Pennsylvania, Joshua L. Chamberlain of Maine, Joseph B. Hawley of Connecticut, and Edward F. Noyes of Ohio.

Sec. 2. —

Mr. INGALLS. Before the reading is finished I wish to move as an amendment the addition of the names of Robert B. Mitchell and James G. Blunt, of Kansas.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposition is not in an amendable state.

Mr. SARGENT. It is not amendable. There is another section to my amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 2. All acts and parts of acts inconsistent herewith be, and the same are hereby, repealed so far only as to enable the President to make said appointments.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from California will, I have no doubt, consent to the amendment I have suggested.

Mr. SARGENT. I have examined with considerable care to see that these persons had a record which would entitle them to this distinction. I find that all the officers named are of equal or superior rank to General Shields, whose name I also insert. Several of them distinguished themselves for gallantry both in the Mexican war and in the war of the rebellion, some of them lost limbs in the service, and most of them now bear marks on their person of bullets received in defense of their country. Any others coming within the same category I should not have objection to, provided the example is to be set of enlarging the retired list in this way. I ask that the amendment be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be printed and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CONKLING. Before that is done I beg to ask to have read the names which appear from New York. I was detained in another part of the Chamber a moment and heard only one or two of them.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the names.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

John A. Dix, Henry W. Slocum, William W. Averill, Alexander Shaler, Alfred Pleasanton, William F. Smith.

Mr. SARGENT. I have no doubt that there are many other worthy officers who are entitled to this distinction if the example is set.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator from California stated that he had examined the record of all these gentlemen and found it proper. I do not know how he overlooked B. F. Kelly, of West Virginia, who probably was in the first battle that was fought, and was wounded, and perhaps was in the last. Certainly he ranked among the names that the Senator includes in his amendment. I do not know how the Senator in making up his list could have overlooked that name. It is a mystery to me; and whenever the bill is amendable, if it is to pass at all in any such form, I think Kelly ought to be at the head of it or about the head of it. His might come in after the name of General Grant, perhaps.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment is referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REPEAL OF RESUMPTION ACT.

Mr. HEREFORD. I move that the Senate proceed to consider the resolution which I introduced on the 21st of March, relating to the repeal of the resumption act.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution, as follows:

Whereas House bill No. 805, a bill to repeal all that part of the act approved January 14, 1875, known as the resumption act, which authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to dispose of United States bonds and redeem and cancel the greenback currency, was referred to the Finance Committee of the Senate on November 26, 1877; Therefore,

Be it resolved, That said committee be required to report said bill to the Senate within one week, together with their action thereon, if any shall have been had.

Mr. HEREFORD. Mr. President, it is now three weeks since I introduced the resolution and drew the attention of the Committee on Finance to it. At that time the chairman of the Committee on Finance asked that it should not be forced upon the Senate, for the reason that they had not had time to consider a matter of such great importance.

The bill to which this resolution refers passed the House of Representatives November 26, came to this House, and was referred to that committee. That makes it about five months ago. That committee have had the bill under consideration for five months, and yet we are told by the committee that they want more time, and that it would be improper to hurry up the consideration of it or to call on the Senate for a vote thereon.

I was a little surprised at the reason assigned for it especially when I took into consideration the history of the important measure; the bill for the resumption of specie payments, which this bill seeks to repeal, was introduced into the Senate by Mr. Sherman, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, December 21, 1874, without the bill ever having been previously introduced in this body by any one, a bill not called for by any individual member of the Senate, a bill which the Finance Committee was not directed or requested to report, a bill which was the result, as the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] said, of a caucus of the republican Senators at that time holding their seats here.

Senator Sherman, who was then the chairman of that committee and who introduced that bill as its chairman and who is now Secretary of the Treasury, when he introduced it said:

I give notice that to-morrow, if there shall be no more pressing business, I will ask the Senate to take up this bill with a view to present action.

He was appealed to by many Senators not to hurry the matter in that way, but he declined to listen to the request of each and every one of the Senators who urged that request. This is what he said when he was appealed to by the present Secretary of the Interior for delay:

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator will have ample time. It is a short bill, only three pages long. He will see what there is in it on reading it, and I think in the course of an hour or so he will be able to make up his mind entirely as to whether he will be able to support the bill or not. I think for the interest of business men, for the interest of the whole country, it is important that this Congress should inform them what it purposes to do in regard to this important subject. I think if this bill can be passed to-day promptly, quickly, and sent to the House of Representatives as an indication that Congress will do thus much, if no more, in the direction pointed out by the bill, it would be of great benefit to the country. The Senator I think will agree to that.

The then Senator Sherman said that the Senate had had ample time to consider it in another portion of the discussion, that the whole subject-matter had been amply discussed by the Senate prior to that; and on the 22d day of December, the day after it was introduced, that bill was pressed to a vote, only allowing about twenty-four hours for the members of the Senate to consider it.

The Senator having charge of the bill, as I said a moment ago, then said in the hearing of the Senate that the whole subject-matter had been amply discussed, this whole subject of finance. If it had been amply discussed then to enable Senators to know how to act and how to vote, what are we to say now after the exhaustive discussion that the financial question has had at this session and between that time and this session. So we see, Mr. President, there were but twenty-four hours given the Senate to consider this important subject; and yet this committee has had five months in which to consider the bill to repeal it. That bill passed this House then within twenty-four hours and went to the House of Representatives and was there passed under a suspension of the rules the very day that it arrived there, without any opportunity for an amendment, without anybody having been afforded an opportunity to resist its passage.

There are many reasons why the Senate should act promptly in this matter. In the "interview of the Committee on Finance of the United States Senate with Hon. John Sherman, Secretary of the Treasury, in regard to the repeal of the resumption act," we are told by the Secretary of the Treasury that since the passage of the resumption act the greenback currency has been contracted, in round numbers, $34,000,000; that the national-bank circulation has been contracted $25,000,000, making a sum in the two currencies of $59,000,000, or, in round numbers, about $60,000,000, and that the increase in the reserve of the national banks has been $31,000,000, so that in that length of time the circulating medium of the country has been diminished $91,000,000. Thus, according to his own statement, taking the figures that he has given us and which we find also in the report of the Comptroller of the Currency and the finance report of the Secretary of the Treasury, there are issued and outstanding to-day, greenbacks, about $348,000,000, and national-bank paper $299,000,000, making in the aggregate $647,000,000. The national banks alone have in their vaults as a reserve fund the enormous sum of $220,000,000, a reserve fund drawn from the circulation of the country, which subtracted from the amount of $647,000,000, the aggregate amount of the national-bank paper and the greenback currency, leaves only $427,000,000, and if you subtract from that the $35,000,000, which is about the usual amount of currency that is kept in the national Treasury, you have in circulation to-day only $392,000,000 for all purposes, and if you subtract from that about 10 per cent. that has been lost by fire or otherwise, you will only have in circulation for the use of the people of this country $350,000,000.

Is it any wonder, then, I ask, that we should have the financial paralysis that is now pervading this whole country from one end to the other with only $350,000,000 of greenback and national-bank paper in circulation?

The Secretary of the Treasury tells us, in this same interview, as I said a moment ago, that the national banks had in round numbers $220,000,000 in their vaults in reserve; as a reserve fund for what? Why is it held in reserve? It is to prepare for this great day, the 1st day of January, 1879; and what is more remarkable in that simple statement of his is that this $220,000,000 that is held in reserve is $84,000,000 more than the law requires the banks to hold in reserve. Why, I ask you, Mr. President, are the national banks keeping locked up in their vaults $84,000,000 more than the law requires? Simply for the purpose of getting ready to meet the exigencies of the occasion on the 1st day of January, 1879. I say when we see contraction going on at this rate it is high time that this act should be repealed, and that this sword of Damocles should be held no longer over the heads of the people. If it is to continue, Mr. President, at the same rate that has been going on, the paralysis will continue and bankruptcies will increase throughout the length and breadth of this land.

I will not take the time, Mr. President, to give additional reasons why this act should be repealed, and repealed immediately; but I shall content myself for the present with having given some of the reasons which induced me to introduce this resolution, and I now give notice that I shall, unless the Senate desire to act upon it sooner, ask for a vote upon this resolution to-morrow.

Mr. MORRILL. The Senator from West Virginia seems very anxious that the Committee on Finance shall report the bill for the repeal of the resumption act. I desire to say to him I have no question that the bill will be reported, perhaps with some amendments, to-morrow; but the Senator from West Virginia seems to be in the same position of Mr. Beecher's dog "Noble" which saw the squirrel go into the hole, and pursued it and kept up a furious barking, and after the squirrel had long left, the dog went to the hole every day and kept up barking all summer. Now, the fact is perhaps not known to the Senator from West Virginia that the country generally resumed specie payments on Saturday. There is nothing left to bark at. The price of gold went down to $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. premium in New York, and some of the banks were paying out gold the same as bills, and some of the banks of Cincinnati were doing the same thing, and some of the banks of Chicago, and I have no doubt that before we can get action on the part of the Senate on the bill, which will be reported, the whole country will have resumed specie payments.

Mr. HEREFORD. I simply desire to say to the Senator from Vermont, that the people will keep up a louder barking than that dog did that he refers to, if he does not yield to their demands.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution now goes over.

IMPROVEMENT OF GALVESTON HARBOR.

Mr. MAXEY. I move to take up for present consideration Senate bill No. 134. When it is read, I will explain the necessity for it.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 134) making further appropriations for continuing the improvements of Galveston Harbor, and for continuing the work in Galveston Bay, State of Texas, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment was, in line 3, to strike out "one hundred and fifty" and insert "seventy-five;" so as to read:

That the sum of $75,000 be and the same is hereby appropriated, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 7, 8, 9, and 10, in the following words:

And that the further sum of $150,000, out of any moneys not otherwise appropriated, be, and the same is hereby appropriated for continuing the work in Galveston Bay, in the State of Texas, all of.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 12, after "Secretary of War," to insert "and the appropriation for which is substantially exhausted;" and in line 13 to strike out the word "sums" and insert "sum."

Mr. SARGENT. How does this bill read as amended?

The CHIEF CLERK. If amended as proposed, the bill will read:

That the sum of $75,000 be, and the same is hereby appropriated out of any moneys not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of continuing the improvements of Galveston Harbor, in the State of Texas, which improvements are now being prosecuted under the direction of the Secretary of War, and the appropriation for which is substantially exhausted; and that the said sum be expended under his direction.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MAXEY. The bill was placed before the Committee on Commerce and by that committee reported favorably. The reason is given by the Chief of Engineers that unless this work is continued that which has already been expended by the Government will go to waste, for the reason that during the early spring and late fall and winter months in that climate we are subjected to heavy northerly, heavy winds that destroy the work already done, so that it is economy, says the Chief of Engineers, to continue this work now, thus advancing so much of this appropriation already recommended by the Chief of Engineers and thereby continue the work. The object is simply to advance this amount previous to the general appropriation bill, that the work may now begin and go on until that bill comes before the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, ordinarily, as the Senate knows and approves, the Committee on Commerce reserves all bills and amendments of this sort to be reported when the river and harbor bill is reported. The Senator from Texas who has just taken his seat, with his usual assiduity and care for matters which fall within his action and duty, pressed upon the committee with great force, and presented with great clearness, the facts of this particular case. Whether they made it an exception to all other cases or not, the committee could not shut its eyes to the fact that a case was presented in which time was very important, in which the application of a given sum of money promptly would be far more profitable, judicious, and beneficial, than the same or even a larger sum withheld to a later date could be; and therefore it was the judgment of a majority of the committee that the request of the Senator from Texas, about which he was naturally very urgent, should be complied with, and that this should be made an exception to the general rule, and accordingly the committee reported the bill believing it to be one which would receive the approval of the Senate and be open to no objection except the objection of time, which objection they thought ought not to be made against the urgent facts found in the case.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill making further appropriations for continuing the improvements of Galveston Harbor, State of Texas."

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

A bill (H. R. No. 1167) for the relief of Peter G. Mills; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3974) authorizing the Secretary of War to transfer to certain settlers whose lands were included within Fort Hartsum military reservation such portions as are not needed for military purposes.

The bill (H. R. No. 3974) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1879, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 158) for the erection of a monument over the grave of Thomas Jefferson, was read twice by its title.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not see the chairman of the Committee on the Library here at this moment. I wish to have that joint resolution laid on the table. The Joint Committee on the Library considered it before it was reported to the House, with the exception of the sum, which I presume is not too large. I dare say, therefore, that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] would like to have it taken up and put on its passage.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will lie on the table without a reference.

The bill (H. R. No. 4242) to authorize the restoration of George A. Armes to the rank of captain, was read twice by its title.

Mr. MAXEY. There is a bill pending—

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair was about to direct this bill to be placed on the Calendar without a reference, as there is a Senate bill on the same subject.

Mr. MAXEY. There is a bill pending reported from the Senate Military Committee, and this may as well go on the Calendar at once.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

BANKRUPT LAW REPEAL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 35) to repeal the bankrupt law, the pending question being on the amendment submitted by Mr. MATTHEWS.

Mr. MCCREERY. Mr. President, a friend of the pending bill believes that the vote can be now taken and that further debate is only a useless consumption of time. I shall defer to that opinion so far as to promise to be exceedingly brief. If I were entirely satisfied of its correctness and that there would be no more speaking, I would suspend my remarks at this moment. For this question has been perhaps more thoroughly discussed than any other since the close of the civil war. In a broader and a higher forum than this, all the facts and all the arguments have been calmly considered, and the judgment has been rendered. Our duty will be done, and well done, when we have placed it on the record. No matter whether it does or does not accord with our own opinion, the grand inquest of the people has decided. From that decision there is or should be no appeal. The theory and the structure of our Government make the people the source of power, while the Congress and all other legislative assemblies are their representatives, their agents, or their servants. From the earliest developments of civilization, the responsibilities and duties of agents and servants have been clearly and distinctly understood. At no time during that long period has it been successfully contended that the representative, the agent, or the servant could disregard or override the will of his principal or his superior. Such an assumption carried into general practice would be not only a violation of law, it would be a subversion of civil society. When, therefore, it is admitted (and it will not be denied) that a majority of the American people desire the repeal of the bankrupt law, that is an end of the argument. For more than ten years past a bankrupt certificate has been a legal tender in the discharge of private indebtedness. This method of settlement has sunk lower and lower in public estimation until it is now regarded as worse than no settlement at all. The people have borne the affliction with wonderful patience and fortitude; but so wide-spread is the evil and so contagious the example that they are calling aloud for the only measure which will stop the scourge in its desolating course. Surfeited and gorged with bankrupt certificates, in their stead they seek to restore "the dollar of the fathers" to be used in the payment of debts. By petition, by legislative action, and by every other means in their power they have implored you to remove from the statute-books a law which is simply a license to prey on their substance through a betrayal of their confidence.

They have not asked for modifications or amendments; they have not asked for forty bankrupt laws, as proposed by the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. MATTHEWS] instead of the single one we have at present; they have not asked that the different insolvent debtor acts of the States, separate, distinct, independent, and conflicting as they may be, should be violently transformed into the unity, the harmony, and the symmetry which would be required to bring them within that clause of the Constitution which authorizes Congress to "establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States."

The Senator had an intuitive apprehension of the danger of his position, and entered into an elaborate defense before any assault was made. It has been said that "the wicked flee when no man pursueth," and it might have been added that the really desperate will fight and contend when no man assaileth. No one has a doubt of the skill and address of the Senator from the State of Ohio, and it may have been a strategic movement to place his heaviest artillery at his weakest point; but he will find few beside himself who will stand in the breach. He has taken his position without consultation, without reference to any committee, and without the usual indorsement of a report. The people have not asked for his amendment or for anything of the sort. They have asked for repeal, and the single point presented for deliberation is whether or not they are entitled to a hearing in their own behalf.

The Senator should pause for a moment before it is too late and contemplate the dismay and the consternation which would pervade all minds at the very thought of having forty bankrupt laws in the United States. Captain Simon Sugg when in camp with his forty thieves was the terror of the surrounding country; but who was he, and who were they, when compared with forty bankrupt laws in full blast at the same time? If the Senator shall ever succeed in starting his incongruous, disjointed machinery, the first revolution will blow the bottom out of the credit system, or I am no judge of small matters.

The Senator from Ohio has taken high rank among the strong men of this body, while in his profession he enjoys an eminence rarely attained by the most aspiring. Like all great lawyers he is laborious, critical, and painstaking. But notwithstanding all that has been said in a recent debate about "omniscience," "infallibility," and "jurisprudence," he has still furnished a marked illustration of the fact that he is not entirely free from the common infirmities of our nature. After providing a bankrupt law for every State and for every Territory in the United States, and just such a bankrupt law as would be agreeable to their wishes, their necessities, or even their prejudices, his amendment utterly fails to make any provision whatever for the District of Columbia. This is the more remarkable since the District of Columbia is in a peculiar sense the ward of the Government, under the especial guardianship and protection of Congress. The people here live fast and die hard, I mean financially, and they certainly stand in as much need of a bankrupt law as any other people on the face of the earth. The District itself has a dark cloud in the shape of an enormous debt hanging over it, and unless relieved by the munificence of Congress may be driven into bankruptcy.

The Senator undertook a great work and like other great projectors he has left it incomplete. The highest achievement of the human intellect never reached perfection at a single effort. The amendment of the Senator from Ohio is a very creditable performance, considering that he had no assistance whatever in its preparation. An able and a talented preacher relying confidently upon his own powers, as well as upon Divine co-operation if needed, on a memorable and mournful occasion undertook to pray for the whole world, and was overwhelmed with astonishment and grief when he found that he had forgotten to invoke a special blessing for one particular man. These are instructive precedents to statesmen as well as to theologians, admonishing them to be particular, and to perform their labor in a workman-like manner and to make no omissions.

But whether the amendment is amended or unamended, whether the District of Columbia is included or excluded, the people of the United States are opposed to the existing bankrupt law, and are equally opposed to the series of bankrupt laws proposed by the Senator from Ohio. If their will shall prevail on this occasion, it will do so in the repeal of the one and in the rejection of the many.

One of the greatest misfortunes that can befall a republican government is a disposition on the part of the representative to substitute his own will for the well-known and clearly ascertained wishes of his constituents. He may succeed for a time if he is lucky, and he had better enjoy his temporary triumph, for he is raising a whirlwind which will certainly sweep him from the stage, leaving his place to be filled by another. If this condition of antagonism shall continue, disappointment may inflame the passions of the people until they will lose all rather than submit to an arbitrary domination over their personal rights, their rights of property or their rights of representation. It generally happens, however, that before extremes are reached instruments are found who will proceed far beyond the bounds of the original proposition; so that it is the part of wisdom and patriotism to support the moderate and reasonable demands of the people rather than to wait until their exasperation shall lead to excesses which neither you nor they dreamed of in the beginning.

The Legislature of Kentucky has instructed me to favor the Texas Pacific Railroad bill. In my opinion, our indebtedness, national, State, municipal, and individual, is as much as we can pay. In my own deliberate judgment, the grant of subsidies and donations to corporations is of doubtful propriety and very dangerous tendency. Still if I should go against it, agitation might produce a man who would vote not only a guarantee of the interest on the bonds, but money enough to construct the road. I shall vote for the bill, trusting, if not believing, that there may be one corporation found that will be honest and fair in its dealings with the Government of the United States.

Entertaining these opinions, the point most worthy consideration is to ascertain the popular will, and presuming the people have sense enough to understand their own business, that should be conclusive. I do not know that I can boast of a very large acquaintance or of a very extended correspondence, but the men I have seen and the letters I have received are all hostile to the further existence of the bankrupt law. That hostility is outspoken and decided. No matter how much they may disagree upon some subjects, no matter how indifferent they may be as to others, upon this there is wonderful unanimity. If it could be submitted to a popular vote, the majority against it would be so overwhelming that few men would have the hardihood to stand up for one moment in its defense. This opposition is not the result of prejudice; it is not confined to any section, to any pursuit or profession, nor to any particular class of men; but the sentiment prevails everywhere throughout the length and breadth of our country, and it is the solemn protest of integrity and fair dealing against chicanery and fraud. The American citizen, borne down and oppressed by a load of taxation without example in our history, appeals to our Government to assist him in the collection of his just debts rather than to legalize his spoliation.

One of the common arguments employed in support of bankrupt laws, referred to in the amendment of the Senator from Ohio and adverted to more at length in his remarks, is that after the debtor has made a full and fair surrender of all his property of every description humanity should prompt the creditor to consent to his discharge, or rather that the courts should decree the absolute cancellation of his obligations. There might be something in this reasoning if petitioners were zealous and active in their efforts to make their property go as far as possible toward the liquidation of their honest debts; but melancholy experience establishes the fact that the bankrupt's desire to secure a good provision for himself renders him perfectly indifferent, if not personally hostile, to the rights and the interests in conflict with his own. Those who have stood by him until they have brought desolation upon their own homes and ruin upon their own families are shunned as if the air of heaven was contaminated by their presence. If a dozen of the heaviest sufferers were to send him their likenesses in order that he might gaze upon their trusting and confiding countenances, the pictures might find a resting-place in the garret or in the bottom of the well; but in chamber, hall, or parlor there would be no room for them. Confine him in a gallery of such paintings, and in one week he would be a raving maniac shuddering and shrieking like Belshazzar at the figures on the wall. If you have a troublesome friend, do not attempt to drive him from you by the coldness of your manner or by the rudeness of your speech; he will generously forgive all that; but lend him two dollars and a half on a promise to return it the day after to-morrow, and you will never see him any more. [Laughter.] The gushing sort generally give free vent to their lamentations that such an energetic, active, enterprising, public-spirited, whole-souled citizen should have been unavoidably forced into bankruptcy; but after their own substance has been swept from them by the officers of the law as his secreties, and after the poor, unfortunate bankrupt has opened on a grander scale than ever in some large city, then they wonder where he got the means, and then a dark suspicion steals over them that he is speculating on their money, and not on his own. They conclude finally that he is a fraud; but nevertheless their own bankruptcy has become inevitable under the circumstances. Thus the circle grows larger and larger until neighborhoods and communities are drawn into the vortex.

A man whose profligacy or whose incapacity has brought ruin upon his friends, should content himself in the humbler walks of life.

Bankrupt laws probably had their origin among commercial men, and may have been intended to afford relief against the sudden and unexpected disasters of flood and fire. It could hardly have been contemplated that transactions amounting in the aggregate to $300, a sum which an active man might borrow before breakfast, should have been proper subjects for the exercise of the extraordinary powers lodged in the bankrupt courts. In these minor cases the assets are divided between the officers of the law and the bankrupt, inasmuch that creditors have ceased to prove their claims or to take any part whatever in the proceedings.

To the friends of repeal, I would say let us stand together and close together, and we will achieve a victory in behalf of popular government. I am done; I believe I will quit. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MITCHELL in the chair.) The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. MATTHEWS.]

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, this is confessedly a matter of very grave importance, and affects the fortunes of a great many citizens of this Government. The measure proposed by the Senator from Ohio is one upon which I am not prepared at this time to vote. It is confessedly crude and imperfect, and requires further deliberation before it should be adopted under any circumstances by the Senate. The existing bankrupt law is undoubtedly viewed with disfavor by a great proportion of our people, but it is more in consequence of the wrongs that have been accomplished under it than of the principle upon which it is founded.

My own conviction has been that a great commercial people like ours was ill-adapted to exist without a bankrupt law in some form, and I have hoped that amendments might be submitted to the existing bill that would enable the Senate to support it. Unless it can be amended, I shall favor its absolute repeal; but I should very much prefer to see it amended in some of its objectionable particulars than to have it at the present time totally repealed. Of course, as the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] stated the other day, if a majority of the Senate is absolutely in favor of the abrogation of the law, it would be useless to suggest any amendment. I understood him to say a certain member of the committee believed that alterations could be made which would render the law agreeable or acceptable to a large proportion of our people; and in the hope that something may be done to avoid the difficulties that will attend the entire repeal of the law and the remission of all creditors to the conflicting conditions and requirements of State insolvency laws, and to ascertain what the sense of the Senate is upon the subject, I move that the pending bill, with the amendment, be committed to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to report such amendments as may seem just to them at an early day.

Mr. KERNAN. I hope that motion will not prevail. I am quite willing, if it is thought we can perfect a new system based upon the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, to have that referred to the committee and considered and reported upon, but the existing bankrupt law I think we should repeal now. More than two years since the other House passed by a very unanimous vote a bill to repeal the bankrupt act. It was not acted upon by this body, and that Congress expired. There have been a great number of petitions presented praying for the repeal of the bankrupt law, and I think it is the opinion of a very large majority of the business men, both of what are known as the creditor class and the debtor class, those who buy on credit and sell on credit, that this law is not beneficial to the business of the country, and that it will be a great advantage to business and business men, both those who wish to buy on credit and those who sell on credit, that it should be repealed.

I trust we shall not, at this stage of the session, send this bill, which is simply to repeal the present bankrupt law, back to the committee with a view to keep the present law in existence until some other system shall be perfected. I think we should now pass this bill with the amendments of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary and thus repeal the old law; and I shall then be quite willing to vote to refer the proposition of the Senator from Ohio, which is based on a different idea, to a committee, that they may report a system of that kind if they find it proper to recommend its adoption.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, I hope that the motion of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] may not be adopted by the Senate. In the first place, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. MATTHEWS] in my judgment does not rise to the dignity of being considered a bankrupt act or an amendment to the present bankrupt act. On the contrary, it proceeds upon the theory of an absolute repeal of the bankrupt law, just as the proposition coming from the Judiciary Committee does. It is nothing more nor less, as it appears to me, than a proposition for cases of ordinary insolvency, and not cases of bankruptcy at all. It is true that it provides that wherever a man makes an assignment of his property for the benefit of his creditors, thus voluntarily setting in motion the process of winding up the indebtedness and closing his estate, that act shall be considered an act of bankruptcy; but there it stops. The whole theory proceeds upon voluntary insolvency. It is true it is in the interest of the debtor; it is true it makes what was called in olden times a cessio bonorum an evidence upon the part of the debtor of his willingness and his desire to be released from his debts, and it enables him where no fraud is proved to obtain his discharge. That is to say, his own act of assigning his property, in the absence of fraud, is to entitle him to a discharge from his debts.

Now, Mr. President, almost all our States have some system of insolvency; they have some courts into which insolvents can go and through the agency of which insolvents can be discharged. The bankrupt law did not wipe these out; they were only suspended in their operation, and I presume in very few if any of the States were there actual repeals of the laws as they existed when the bankrupt law of 1867 was passed. Consequently there is no need for a provision of this character. Indeed, with great respect for the opinion of the Senator from Ohio, it strikes me that the amendment is not germane to the subject in hand. If he desires after the repeal of the bankrupt law, which his very amendment contemplates, to substitute in lieu of that a system of voluntary insolvency throughout the country, then let his proposition stand upon its own ground, be submitted to the Judiciary Committee, and go through the ordeal of their investigation and their report before it is substituted for the present bankrupt system. It is entirely different in its theory; it proceeds upon different ground; it strikes out the compulsory system of the present bankrupt law and substitutes only for it a voluntary system as I understand. I cannot vote for that proposition, but I can and I will vote for the absolute repeal of the law. As the distinguished Senator from Kentucky [Mr. McCREERY] so eloquently said, it is demanded by the people throughout the land. A number of States, I cannot recall how many, but Kentucky, the great State of New York, New Hampshire, Vermont, have all by resolution of their Assemblies solemnly instructed their Senators upon this floor to vote for the repeal of this bankrupt bill. The table of the Secretary here in the last few months and the table of the Clerk of the other House have been loaded with petitions for its repeal.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me to inquire of him to what action of the State of New York he made reference?

Mr. WHYTE. Yes, sir, I can read the resolution; I think I have it here.

Mr. CONKLING. I will not interrupt the Senator. If he will allow me to take the document, I will find it if it is there.

Mr. WHYTE. I think I can find it; here it is. I will hand the Senator the document. I was about to say when the Senator from New York interrupted me, that the State of New York, containing within its confines the great commercial city from whence radiates so much of the business of the country—that great Empire State had, according to my recollection—and I have handed the resolution to the Senator—instructed its Senators on this floor to urge the repeal of this law. New Hampshire has done the same. Vermont, whose Senator presides as chairman over the deliberations of the Judiciary Committee has in plain and unmistakable terms instructed him and his colleague on this floor to vote for its repeal.

The day has passed for this bankrupt law. It has accomplished its mission; it has done its projected work. After the war had closed, that great convulsion which carried down not only human life but vast wealth that had been accumulated for years past and brought to the verge of bankruptcy hundreds of thousands of our citizens, left us in a condition that business men, young and old, must have relief. Loaded down with a weight of debt they could not bear, bending under a collar which for the balance of their lives would have held them in a merciless bondage, they appealed to the Congress of the United States for that help which our fathers in their wisdom had put as one of the arrows in the quiver of Congress, one which fitted this out for its campaign as a republican Government. They came to the door of these two Houses and asked for relief. Congress passed the bill to give them relief, and they were relieved. They were able in passing through the bankrupt court to wipe out as with a sponge their past indebtedness, and go forth free men to work out for themselves another fortune or to go down struggling to the grave. The act of 1867, amended as it has been, has done its work; its business is accomplished; its mission ought to end, and we ought now to let it follow its illustrious predecessors.

The act of 1800, as you well know, Mr. President, was short-lived in its character. It was repealed in 1803, and from that time to 1841 the people of the United States carried on business, grew in strength, in commercial prosperity, strong and firm in their credit at home, winning honor and reputation among the commercial nations abroad, and when in 1841, if I remember correctly, the State of Mississippi through its Senators appealed to Congress to pass the act of 1841, Silas Wright and James Buchanan and Levi Woodbury and that host of giants who in those days represented the great democratic party, protested against the passage of the bill and resorted to all parliamentary means in their power to prevent its passage; some upon the ground that it was merely in the interest of the debtor, differing from the act of 1800 in this, that the former act was compulsory in its character and seemed to be based solely in the interest of the creditor, to the exclusion of the debtor; while the act of 1841 was passed in the interest of the debtor, to the injury of the creditor. It was not believed by those men to be an act in its nature such as was contemplated by the framers of the Constitution. They looked upon it as nothing more nor less than the importation from England of the act of George IV, which was an insolvent debtor's act and intended to release him from imprisonment and not to wipe out the obligation itself. They looked upon it, therefore, as being a mere insolvent act and not a bankrupt act, and under those circumstances not coming within the purview of the Constitution. That act was opposed by them, but it passed. It was not part of Mr. Clay's scheme of the bank bill and the distribution act. It did not come in the category of bills which he prepared for Captain John Tyler; but it was a bill thrust upon the Senate and upon the House to run along side by side with these bills, and through the parliamentary machinery of the day it was so interwoven with the other two bills that they had to carry it along to get the bank bill and the distribution bill through. It passed, and what a spectacle it was to behold its repeal within little more than one year! In the first place, it did not go into effect immediately; it provided that it was to take effect at a future day. The wise ones in Congress, the shrewd parliamentarians in Congress put that provision in in the hope that before the law became operative they would have a chance to repeal it. But although petitions came in upon Congress, although efforts were made to get the law repealed, it was not repealed until 1843, and then the country beheld the solemn spectacle of a bankrupt law passed by a Congress of the United States repealed by the very same Congress that passed it. The country looked at men sitting in their seats, many of them the identical men who passed the bill against remonstrance and against protest, voting in those same seats to repeal the act itself, thereby denying the paternity of their own child!

That law then was repealed. The act of 1800 lasted two years, and was repealed during the administration of Mr. Jefferson. The act of 1841 lasted less than two years, but that law did not provide for corporations or for copartnerships; it was therefore not as full as it might have been. Then came this act of 1867 providing for the compulsory process, providing for involuntary bankruptcy, providing also for voluntary bankruptcy, providing for the cases of copartnership, for the cases of corporations, and providing also as one of the amendments did for compromises and compositions between the creditors and the debtor—a clause which I never could bring my mind to believe was within the constitutional power of Congress—providing for a compromise whereby a certain number of creditors could release a man upon paying a certain amount of debt, and leaving the minority to take it or not as it might be agreeable to them.

Mr. President, the people clamored for the repeal of that act, and to-day they clamor for the repeal of this act. The people of my own State do not so clamor. I am not moved by any popular current there. I am not instigated to my desire for the repeal of this law by any excitement at home. I am urged only by what seems to me to be a proper sense of right. I am urged to it from a practical experience of the wrongs perpetrated under this act.

Some gentlemen ask us to amend it; I think the distinguished Senator from New York presented a petition this morning asking for amendments to the law rather than for its repeal.

Mr. CONKLING. Asking, if my friend will pardon me, that a commission be appointed to consider what amendments, if any, can be made.

Mr. WHYTE. Precisely, which is equivalent to the same thing. It is continuing the operation of the bankrupt law as it is, with all its imperfections, until a commission can examine and inquire and recommend to Congress what amendments can be made. But, Mr. President, like the man who prayed to have his way mended, so of this bill it would be better to have a new one; its ways are so bad, and its proceedings are so bad, and the administration of it is so obnoxious to the people that it is far better to wipe it out and relegate it back to the Legislatures of our States, and there let the insolvent system be revived and be carried on with such amendments as may be necessary to relieve parties within the confines of their own States. It may operate harshly in some cases, but in the long run the man who goes out of his own State to contract a debt will have to carry with him a first-class bill of credit. It may hurt some non-resident creditors; it may hurt some debtor because he does not get relief from his non-resident creditors; but it will teach them all to deal as much as possible on the cash principle and to make as few contracts out of their own State, if they are not in solvent circumstances, as possible.

I have heard gentlemen say, "Let us have amendments to the bill." Who proposes amendments? Where are the amendments to come in? Are you going to change the mode of appointing the assignee? Are you going to take the assignee's appointment from the creditors and give it to the court? The creditors do not want that; the registers in bankruptcy do not want that; it would break up that stereotyped system of assigneeship which exists in many commercial cities where by some singular regularity, some mysterious and extraordinary circumstance, one man turns up as assignee in all sorts of bankruptcy cases. That is not all. Are you going to amend it so as to have more frequent dividends, to compel the assignee to make a dividend the moment when he gets 5 per cent. in hand? Nobody wants that. That is not the amendment which those who cry out for amendments want. Are you going to abolish the bankrupt court? What are you going to establish in its stead? And if you do not abolish that court, how are you going to cut down the fees of registers and clerks of courts? No, Mr. President, this act has been amended; it was amended in 1874; it was amended then upon the principle, as was supposed, of removing the objections which existed to the continuance of the law throughout the country. What has been the effect of the amendments? Only to make the law more obnoxious than ever. To-day more people are clamoring for its repeal with those amendments upon it than there were against the law as it was passed in 1867. I am opposed to any amendment. The law has done its work. Men have been relieved from their contracts; they have been enabled to start afresh; the time, in my judgment, has arrived for us to take the pruning-knife and lop off this piece of legislation and burn it with the rubbish of the past.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, no error relating to this subject is more common or prevalent than to confound a bankrupt law with an insolvent law. I think I may say the popular impression is that a bankrupt law is an insolvent act. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. WHYTE] has not failed to make the distinction, and all who see it must agree that it exists. The act of 1841 was an insolvent law under the name of a bankrupt law, as I believe the Senator has said; its provisions were voluntary only. The existing bankrupt law is such an act as commercial nations at large, I think now almost without exception, have adopted and maintained. It is compulsory as well as voluntary; and it seeks, in the language of the petition I presented this morning, to establish and give effect to the principle of equality of impartial and meritorious rights among creditors looking for satisfaction to the assets of debtors.

As I have said, all commercial nations in recent times have adopted, and most of them after long investigation, bankrupt acts as wise components of commercial systems. Before the present act was adopted in our country, the committee had brought from England the last report made to the British Parliament on this subject. It was, I remember, a quarto volume of many pages, the product of three years' labor by five of the leading barristers of Great Britain. It sought to import, and Parliament did import, into the existing bankruptcy system of England several changes, more or less radical. The American people alone, as far as I know, among the commercial peoples of the world, have bankrupt laws in spasms and ways; and now if the existing act shall be abrogated, no bankrupt law will exist in the country until commercial disasters, the accumulated fruits of commercial vicissitude, have created a great class needing relief, and then for its voluntary or insolvent opportunities another bankrupt law will come in. I think Senators will fall into an error certainly who suppose, as the Senator from Maryland in some sort suggested, that a repeal of the existing law may occur and a present opportunity remain to try to set up in its place some substituted system. I think we must all vote to-day, if this is the day when the vote shall be taken, with the apprehension that a repeal of the bankrupt law now postpones for a considerable time, perhaps to a far future, the first actual opportunity of making another attempt.

I do not know, Mr. President—perhaps I should not feel warranted in saying but for a consideration which I will refer to in a moment, and which alone would restrain me—that the present bankrupt law, with changes which we might hope for, would be clearly a wise measure of legislation to remain; and yet I am inclined to think that the most serious complaints grow out of conditions wholly unavoidable. For illustration at least, I may say that our geographical difficulties are very great and they cannot be overcome. Men look at the administration of the bankruptcy system in Great Britain, and they compare it with ours, and they wonder with discontent at the comparison, which is against us. They forget that the bankruptcy system in Great Britain operates upon a limited area, amid a very dense population, with a very numerous and effectual judicial staff. England, without the twelve counties of Wales, has a little less than the area of the State of New York. Twenty-four million people inhabit it. Look to the taking of the census for illustration of what I am saying. The British census is taken in one night. It is taken between sun and sun, and after sundown. We take an enumeration here to count all the people scattered throughout all our borders; and weeks and months are exhausted and expenses involved which would seem apocryphal comparing them with the expenses of taking the British census and making no allowance for the disparity of conditions. So, when you come to execute a bankrupt law in the thirty-eight States of the Union, sparsely populated and illy conditioned for transit from place to place as many localities are, without a judicial staff so numerous as to bring justice or the instrumentalities of justice to every man's door, you find great impediments, prolixity, postponement, expense; and accordingly you find, as was stated I think in a petition presented by my colleague perhaps to-day, a percentage of the outcome of assets, and a percentage of that which is swallowed by the proceedings, and of that which accrues at last to the creditor, and say naturally "this is a failure." But, if you look into the causes, I fear you will find that most of them are such that no art in drafting a bill, no reformation in administration, nothing which falls within the province of legislation can encompass and avoid them. And so it may very well be that the best considered argument would acquit the present bankrupt act of much of the guilt laid at its door and attribute its evil consequences, as I have endeavored to show, to conditions beyond the purview of legislation.

But, Mr. President, I feel guided not only, but constrained on this question, by the action of the State of New York, for which I asked the Senator from Maryland, and perhaps it is right that I should explain to him the occasion of my question. I inferred from his allusion to the Legislature of New York that he supposed some recent action had occurred in that State which I did not know, and my colleague did not know. I find by the book which the Senator was kind enough to loan me, that he referred, and very properly of course, to the action of the Legislature of New York which occurred when Congress was not in session, in May last, after the adjournment, and which, for that reason, was not presented here. Of course it is none the less cogent or obligatory upon my colleague or myself, and I have no reason to suppose that the present Legislature, had its attention been called to this subject or had not its predecessor uttered the voice of New York, would have sent here an expression different from that which I have in my hand. Upon such a question, not searching the conscience of any Senator, but being a matter lying within the domain of wisdom and discretion, a question upon which one might vote either way as his judgment of the effect to be produced might lead him, in other words, unembarrassed by constitutional doubts or matters of conscience, I should not feel at liberty for one to disregard the voice of the State which honors me with a seat in the Senate. Therefore, whatever my own convictions might be, if the question is to be put whether the bankrupt act shall stand as it is or shall be repealed, I shall feel bound, as matter of instruction, without going further, to vote for its repeal; and having said this I venture to add one remark which I hope may weigh with Senators who make a suggestion like that made by the honorable Senator from Kansas.

If the question can be taken from the repeal of the law and a majority of the Senate shall say for the time being no, the Judiciary Committee will have that stimulus or opportunity to address itself to the question which will enable it at least to make an earnest effort to bring here amendments in the hope that they may commend themselves to a majority of the Senate. But in the present condition no member of any committee can feel any stimulus, or even warrant, to sit down and investigate the infinitely contradictory and the enormously prolix theories, suggestions, and amendments which come from every point of the compass on this subject. It is so much like labor thrown away that no committee incumbered as the Judiciary Committee is, will undertake to put aside the many things which press upon it and devote itself to a labor likely to be so thankless and so useless as this, while the impression remains that a majority of the two Houses would repeal the act in the presence of any amendments the committee might be able to propose. If, therefore, a majority of the Senate want an intelligent effort made either in the direction indicated by the honorable Senator from Ohio or in any other direction that may be suggested, the true way to reach that is, for the present at least, to reject the bill repealing the act so as to let the committee know that if they are able to report amendments addressing themselves to the favor of the Senate some use will be made of their work and that it will not be a vain and futile experiment to avoid a foregoing conclusion.

As I have said, I shall vote myself, in the presence of the expression made by the Legislature of the State of New York, as I understood my colleague to say he should vote, for the repeal of the act; but I say also that if a majority of the Senate shall postpone that repeal by refusing now to enact it, I shall be very glad, as one member of the committee, and I am sure I can answer for all the others, to address myself most seriously to the effort of abating as far as we can abate the existing objections.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] to recommit the bill, with instructions to the Committee on the Judiciary to propose amendments to the bankrupt law.

The motion was not agreed to.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. MATTHEWS.]

MR. MATTHEWS. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but for a few moments. I certainly have no desire to press unduly upon the attention of the Senate any proposition which I may have to make with respect to this subject. I hesitated before doing so when I drafted and presented the amendment which is now pending before the Senate, for the reason, in the first place, that I feared there was a predetermination on the part of a considerable majority of the Senate to insist upon the absolute and unconditional repeal of the bankrupt act, and in the second place, because I was quite as well aware as any one else could be of the imperfection and immaturity of the proposition which I in fact submitted. Nevertheless I was not willing that the act should be unconditionally repealed without some suggestion to the contrary, without some indication of the direction in which I thought better relief could be afforded, without some earnest effort to do away with the evils complained of without at the same time abrogating the possible good which is involved in my judgment in the continued existence of a wise bankrupt system. I do not think that we have great reason to be proud of our legislative achievements in this direction, as reconneted in the history of the bankrupt act stated by the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. WHYTE.] Our statesmanship in reference to this subject seems to have corresponded precisely with that standard which the Senator from Kentucky who introduced this proposition [Mr. McCREERY] seems to have laid down for the model of his own, and that is, whenever there is a clamor for a bankrupt act to pass it and whenever there is a clamor for its repeal to repeal it.

Now, it seems to me, Mr. President, that in the light of the experience of the country we are in a position by taking suitable measures to avoid the necessity of steering our legislation by opposite popular clamors from time to time, as they may arise. Other nations have been able to maintain a stable system of jurisprudence on this subject, and although the circumstances of this country differ widely from those of England and those of other commercial countries on the continent of Europe, still we can adapt our legislation to the change and variance in those circumstances; and I certainly think it not creditable to the intelligence either of the people of the country or of the Senators on this floor that we should dismiss the subject in this abrupt and unscientific way by simply wiping out the existing statute.

There evidently is a misconception in regard to the nature of the amendment which I have proposed. The Senator from Kentucky has characterized it as a change from a system which contains but one bankruptcy act to a system of as many bankruptcy acts as there are States in the Union, as if the passage of this proposition would establish the various and contradictory systems in each State as that uniform rule in bankruptcy which the Constitution authorizes Congress to establish. The criticism is not correct. The measure has no relation whatever to any existing insolvent laws in any of the States. It does not adopt any of them. On the contrary it establishes a rule in bankruptcy and a rule of its own, and that rule by being single is uniform, and so conforms to the standard of the Constitution. It simply is that whoever shall, being insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency, make a general assignment of all his property for the equal benefit of all his creditors, shall thereby become and be declared to be a bankrupt, and in the event that within two years from the date of the act of bankruptcy, this general assignment, his assets shall have been distributed so as to insure to his creditors payment of 50 per cent. of the amount of their claims, he shall thereby become and be declared to be a discharged bankrupt; and it leaves to the State systems of administration merely the method and the details of distributing the assets among the creditors.

Now, the absolute and unconditional repeal of the bankrupt act does relegate us back to the varying systems prevailing in each State, operating, however, as remarked by the Senator from Maryland, only upon those classes of contracts which come within the purview of State legislation, and which may be dissolved by an act within the State, not having at all the office and the function of a bankrupt act which passed by Congress, whether involuntary or voluntary, operates alike upon all contracts, no matter where made or where to be performed.

With this explanation, which I deem necessary in order to put myself right in regard to the observations made by the Senator from Kentucky in relation to the nature of this amendment, and aware of the prevailing sentiment of the body in respect to the proposition depending as the main one, Mr. President, I withdraw my motion to amend the bill and will allow the vote to be taken distinctly upon the proposition, making now the statement, which I shall have occasion to make when called upon for my vote, that upon the question of the repeal of the act I am paired with my colleague [Mr. THURMAN,] who is absent from his seat in the Senate, until his return from Ohio.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. KERNAN. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill. The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, (when his name was called.) Upon this question I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. THURMAN,] If he were here, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. MATTHEWS, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. THURMAN,] If he were here, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. WINDOM, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. COCKRELL,] If he were present, I should vote "nay" and I presume he would vote "yea."

Mr. JOHNSTON, (when Mr. WITHERS's name was called.) My colleague [Mr. WITHERS] is detained at home by sickness. If he were here, he would vote "yea" on this proposition.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. WHYIE. I desire to say that my colleague [Mr. DENNIS] has been called suddenly away. If he were here, he would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 38, nays 6; as follows:

YEAS—38.

Armstrong,	Davis of West Va.,	Johnston,	Morrill,
Bailey,	Eaton,	Jones of Florida,	Oglesby,

So the bill was passed.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives non-concurring in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3740) to provide for deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

On motion of Mr. WINDOM, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and ask a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Vice President.

Messrs. BLAINE, WINDOM, and BECK were appointed.

DAKOTA SOUTHWESTERN RAILWAY.

Mr. WINDOM. I move to take up Senate bill No. 927 for present consideration. The bill I ask to take up is the one that has been considered twice in the morning hour, and I believe everybody who had any desire to amend it has had the opportunity, and it was only postponed because the morning hour expired. I do not know of any further amendment. I should like to have action on the bill now.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 927) to authorize the construction of a narrow-gauge railroad from Bismarck to the Black Hills.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. McDONALD. I should like to ask the Senator from Minnesota if that is the bill which was under consideration the other day.

Mr. WINDOM. It is.

Mr. McDONALD. An amendment was suggested by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] What has become of it?

Mr. WINDOM. I do not know what the action was on that amendment. I myself agreed to almost any amendment that anybody wanted.

Mr. McDONALD. The Senator from Ohio is now absent. He suggested an amendment in regard to what might be taken into consideration by the appraisers of damages.

Mr. WINDOM. I thought it had been adopted; but if it has not been I am entirely willing to accept it. I agreed to take the amendment of the Senator from Ohio as amended by the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. McDONALD. That in assessing the value of the property actually taken the prospective benefits should not be taken into account.

Mr. WINDOM. That is as the Senator from Indiana proposed to amend it. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. KERNAN. I wish to ask the gentleman having the bill in charge whether there is any provision in this act requiring the stock to be paid for in money except the first 5 per cent., and whether there should not be such a provision. I find the first 5 per cent. on page 3 is required to be paid in. That payment is required to be made. Now if you turn over to page 5, it is said:

Said board of directors may require payment of subscriptions to the capital stock after notice of not less than thirty days.

I suggest that after the word "days" in line 101 there should be inserted:

And which payment shall be in cash.

Otherwise there might be a road with three millions capital and when they get 5 per cent. in in cash the rest might be paid in in anything the directors chose to take. I think serious consequences have happened in States from the omission to require the stock to be paid for in money. I noticed this the other day and I called attention to it.

Mr. WINDOM. What amendment does the Senator suggest?

Mr. KERNAN. I would suggest "and which payment shall be in cash only."

Mr. WINDOM. At what point in the bill?

Mr. KERNAN. Page 5, line 101, after the word "days." I think there should be a provision that the capital stock should be paid in money. Otherwise they will organize on having 5 per cent. of the three millions paid in in money, and then they may go on and never pay in another dollar.

Mr. WINDOM. That is the intention of the bill; but, if it meets the Senator's views better to insert the words he proposes, I have no objection.

Mr. KERNAN. I assume that the Senator is correct as to the purpose; and yet the cash is required to be paid for the 5 per cent., and not for the rest of the stock. The construction might be from that omission that cash was not required except for the 5 per cent. I do not wish to interfere with the bill.

Mr. WINDOM. As the Senator has the words in mind, I prefer that he should suggest them to the Secretary.

Mr. KERNAN. Then, after the word "days," in line 101 of section 1, I move to insert "and which payment shall be made in money and shall be called for and required until the entire stock is paid for."

Mr. WINDOM. Would it not be more agreeable to say "the board of directors may require the payment of the subscriptions to the capital stock in money?"

Mr. KERNAN. That would be too broad. Then they might never require payment in money. There is nothing in this bill, such as we require in our laws in New York, that the directors shall in a certain time require the capital to be paid in.

Mr. WINDOM. I make no objection to the Senator's amendment where he proposes to insert it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. I call the attention of the Senator from Minnesota to the discrepancy between the title of this bill and the language contained in lines 21 and 22 of the first section. The bill in terms is "to authorize the construction of a narrow-gauge railroad from Bismarck to the Black Hills;" but the body of the bill says that it shall be operated "from such eligible point on the line of the Northern Pacific Railroad, west of Bismarck, in the Territory of Dakota, to such point in the Black Hills as shall be determined by the board of directors." There seems to be something illusive about the title of the bill. If it is the intention to operate from Bismarck it should be so expressed; otherwise the title ought to be amended.

Mr. WINDOM. I have no objection.

Mr. INGALLS. What is the purpose?

Mr. WINDOM. The purpose is to connect with the Northern Pacific Railroad at Bismarck.

Mr. INGALLS. At what point?

Mr. WINDOM. At Bismarck I believe; and, if the North Pacific be extended across the river, it would be necessary, I presume, to extend this road also. Perhaps the title might be amended so as to read "to a point at or near Bismarck."

Mr. INGALLS. I will also call the attention of the Senator to the language contained in line 6 of section 3, which authorizes the company "to take, from the public lands adjacent to the line of the road, earth, stone, timber, gravel, and other materials for the construction and maintenance thereof." Is it the intention of the bill to allow this corporation to tie and bridge their road from the timber on the public domain?

Mr. WINDOM. This would authorize it, and I think it ought to be granted, although I think they will find no ties on the line of their road—

Mr. INGALLS. I think they will.

Mr. WINDOM. Until they get into the Black Hills.

Mr. INGALLS. That is exactly what I was going to say. The Black Hills is a very densely timbered region of country. In fact its name is derived, as I understand, from the dense forests of pine that cover the hills in that country. While the Government should be liberal in granting rights of way and any such other material as may be inexpensive and not required for public purposes, I think it would be a very gross wrong to the hardy pioneers and the settlers of that district to allow this corporation to go in there and strip that country of railroad ties and bridge timber necessary to construct this road, as I understand this road will be several hundred miles in length.

Mr. WINDOM. Two hundred miles, about.

Mr. INGALLS. If these corporations were required to purchase the timber necessary to tie and bridge the road, it would cost them hundreds of thousands of dollars. This is therefore asking the United States Government to give to this corporation a very large amount of actual cash in hand for the purpose of tying the road, and that timber will necessarily be taken from a region that can ill afford to lose it. Under the statement made by the Senator from Minnesota, that it is the intention of this bill to allow the company to tie this road from the timber in the Black Hills, I move to strike out the word "timbers," in line 6, of section 3.

Mr. WINDOM. I did not mean to be understood as saying that the road would be tied from the timber in the Black Hills. It would be practically impossible to do that for the reason that they will have to commence upon the north or eastern end and build toward the Black Hills. They will hardly draw the ties in wagons from the other end of the line as the road progresses westward, but will rather take the ties from this end. I think that the Senate ought to allow at least that much advantage to people who are willing to build a road in an uninhabited country, a country that will be developed by this road. I think it is a very small thing to grant. I really think my friend from Kansas is a little too stringent in this matter. If it is to be the judgment of the Senate, however, to strike out the word "timbers," I shall submit, of course.

Mr. INGALLS. If this road were not likely to be a paying operation, if it were not a profitable enterprise in prospective, it is not at all likely that the gentlemen whose names I find on the first page as incorporators would be very apt to meddle with it. They are not intending, as I understand, to build this road to develop the country, nor to build up regions that are now desert and make them blossom like the rose. They intend to connect with the Northern Pacific, with the Black Hills country, for the purpose of obtaining a portion of the commerce that is now being built up in that region. They are going to work here for the purpose of making money, not in search of objects over which their sensibilities can expand or their hearts can weep. It is not philanthropy, it is business, and it appears to me that it is going a great deal too far to ask Congress to donate them several hundred thousand dollars to tie and bridge this road.

Mr. WINDOM. I do not suppose that the gentlemen named in this bill, if they construct the road, will do it from merely philanthropic or patriotic motives. I have no expectation of that kind, nor do I believe that the inducements to build it are so strong that capital will make a rush at it when the bill is passed. I think if we go so far as to deny them all advantages in its construction the road will not be built at all. I think with these slight advantages that we have given here the road will be constructed. I am entirely willing to submit the question to the Senate and to say nothing more on the subject; but I can hardly agree to strike out the provision unless the Senate desire to have it stricken out. I hope it will not be stricken out. I am entirely ready to take the vote of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair suggests that the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole have not yet been concurred in. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas insist on the amendment which he suggested?

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, which will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. Before the word "gravel" in line six of section 3, it is proposed to strike out the word "timbers;" so as to read:

And the right, power, and authority are hereby given to said company to take from the public lands adjacent to the line of the road, earth, stone, gravel, and other materials for the construction and maintenance thereof.

Mr. WINDOM. I desire to say to the Senate before the vote is taken upon the amendment that there is no grant of land in the bill except the right of way, and no other privilege is given to the company that I know of except the right to build the road and the right of way through the public lands.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Minnesota has stated that it is the object of this bill to allow these corporations to tie and bridge their road from timber on the public domain.

Mr. WINDOM. I wish to correct that statement so as to have it more distinctly understood. That is not the object of the bill, but incidentally, undoubtedly, the timber will be used. The object of inserting the word "timbers" is that at such points on the road as may be more convenient this timber may be used, but, as I say, it will probably be used but for a very small portion of the line.

Mr. McDONALD. This is the language of the bill:

From the public lands adjacent to the line of the road, earth, stone, timbers, gravel, &c.

Mr. WINDOM. Let the vote be taken, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS.]

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. McDONALD. I now wish to offer the amendment that I suggested the other day. After the word "court" in line 16 of section 4 I move to insert:

Provided, That in assessing the value of the lands actually taken, consequential benefits to the remaining lands of the owner shall not be taken into account.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. I move to insert after the word "timbers" in line 6 of section 3, the words "for tying and bridging said road."

Mr. WINDOM. I have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WINDOM. I move to amend the title to conform to the body of the bill by striking out the word "narrow-gauge," and also adding after the word "from" and before "Bismarck" the words "a point at or near;" so as to read: "A bill to authorize the construction of a railroad from a point at or near Bismarck to the Black Hills."

The motion was agreed to.

RAILROAD IN THE TERRITORIES.

Mr. TELLER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 655) to incorporate the National Pacific Railroad and Telegraph Company. It is almost identical in its language with the bill which has just passed, and proposes to build a road in the same section from Cheyenne.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. TELLER. I propose to make some amendments to the bill at the request of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHRISTIANCY] who prepared them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There are some amendments reported by the Committee on Railroads which will be first acted upon. The Secretary will report the first amendment reported by the committee on page 1.

The CHIEF CLERK. The first amendment is to insert after line 11, in section 1, the following names:

G. M. Dodge, of Iowa; E. R. Carpentier, of California; P. D. Barker, of Alabama.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 26, after the word "Cheyenne," to insert the words "or Pine Bluff."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in lines 28, 29, and 30, of section 1, to strike out "commencing at or near Fort Laramie to a point at or near Fort Fetterman; thence," and insert "from some point on the line north of the North Platte River;" so as to read:

Thence on some point on the line north of the North Platte River, in a northerly or northwesterly direction, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the end of the first section, in lines 35 and 36, to strike out the words "the Pacific Ocean, or the navigable waters connecting therewith," and insert "tide-water at Portland, Oregon."

Mr. McDONALD. I move to amend the amendment by striking out all after the word "Montana" in line 35.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question will be first on the amendment proposed by the committee, and the amendment to strike out will then be in order. The question is on the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McDONALD. I move to strike out after "Montana," in line 35, being the words as now amended:

Thence, by the most practicable route, to tide-water at Portland, Oregon.

That part of the bill proposes to authorize this corporation to construct a road through a portion of the State of Oregon. I object to that, as I do not believe we possess the power to organize a corporation to construct a railroad within the limits of a State.

Mr. CHAFFEE. Not if Oregon agrees to it?

Mr. McDONALD. We are not asking Oregon to agree to it. This provision asserts the power of Congress to construct a road through the Territories and through a part of a State. So far as it undertakes to give authority to construct a road through the State of Oregon I object to it, and my amendment is designed to limit the bill to authority to construct a railroad within the Territories of the United States upon the line indicated.

Mr. TELLER. While I do not consider this very important, yet of course it must be understood that this will be done with the consent, probably, of the State of Oregon. Congress did the same thing in 1864 with reference to the North Pacific Road, and there is a bill here, which I presume will be passed, in which it is proposed to recognize the same practice. I do not think it very important, but I think, as these parties desire to put their money into this enterprise and want this provision in, we might as well leave it. I hope the clause will not be stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER put the question upon the amendment and declared that the yeas appeared to prevail.

Mr. McDONALD. Let us have a division.

Mr. EATON. Let us have the yeas and nays. I think this is too important a matter to be decided by a mere division. I do not apprehend the Senate have yet considered the importance of the amendment of my friend from Indiana. We cannot give the right to build a railroad through the State of Oregon. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator from Indiana will so modify his amendment as to provide that the road shall go to the Oregon line, I shall not object to it.

Mr. McDONALD. I have no objection to that modification.

Mr. EATON. There is no objection at all to that.

Mr. McDONALD. I will say "to the western boundary of the Territory of Montana."

Mr. TELLER. I will accept the amendment in that form.

Mr. McDONALD. I move to strike out the words:

Thence, by the most practicable route, to tide-water at Portland, Oregon—

And to insert:

To the eastern boundary of the State of Oregon;

So as to read:

Thence by the most practicable route, to a point at or near Helena, in the Territory of Montana, thence to the eastern boundary of the State of Oregon.

Mr. TELLER. I will accept that.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Attention is called to the word "subjects" in line 4 of section 7. It is suggested that it is a misprint and should be "objects."

The CHIEF CLERK. The section reads:

It shall be lawful for said company, their agents or engineers, for the purpose of exploring, surveying, and locating said road, to enter upon any lands, and may acquire title to such as may be necessary to effect the subjects of this act.

Mr. TELLER. It should be "objects." I ask to strike out "subjects" and insert "objects."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will be made. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The next amendment of the Committee on Railroads was to strike out section 14 in the following words:

The said railroad and telegraph company shall be free from taxation, either Federal, territorial, State, county, city, or town, for the term of ten years after the same shall have been completed.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

The said railroad and telegraph company shall be free from taxation, either Federal, territorial, State, county, city, or town, except as herein provided. When the said railroad and telegraph company shall complete fifty miles of its road, and shall run trains on the same, then the said company shall file with the secretary of the Territory or State where such fifty miles, or the major part thereof shall be situated, a certificate stating the date of such use, and the road so built and used may be taxed by the proper authorities where it is situated after five years from the date of such use, and not before.

Mr. TELLER. I will say that I propose to have this amendment rejected in order to offer an amendment in the place of it.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Section 14 will stand as in the original bill.

Mr. TELLER. There is still another amendment of the committee which I suppose ought to be disposed of.

The next amendment of the Committee on Railroads was to insert as a new section:

SEC. 17. Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act until such time as the said railroad so to be built shall be, or the major part thereof shall be, within the limits of some State; and when the said railroad, or the greater part thereof, shall be within the limits of a State, the corporation hereby created shall in all respects be considered and treated as a corporation created by such State, when it shall have become subject to the laws thereof; and thereafter Congress shall not have any greater or other control over such corporation than if it had been created by the State.

Mr. TELLER. I propose to strike that out.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. TELLER. I agreed with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHRISTIANCY] to offer some amendments to the bill for him, as he desired them to be made. In section 6, line 19, after the word "services," the last word of the section, I move to insert:

And shall transport the mails of the United States at rates not exceeding the average rates at any time paid upon the railroads in Colorado.

The Senator from Michigan desired that that amendment should be added, and I offer it now.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. I have agreed to offer one or two other amendments for the Senator from Michigan, as he is not present. In section 9, line 17, after the word "court," the words "for confirmation" ought to be added; so as to read:

And make a return of their proceedings and action to the judge of the said district or circuit courts for confirmation.

I move that amendment on my own account.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. I move to strike out section 14, and in lieu thereof to insert the following, at the request of the Senator from Michigan:

That whenever any part of the present Territory of Wyoming through which said railroad may run shall be admitted into the Union as a State, so much of said railroad and the appurtenances and property that may be within such State shall be subject to taxation in such State.

Mr. McDONALD. That is limited to the Territory of Wyoming. As the bill authorizes a railroad company to construct a road through other Territories as well, they also should be embraced.

Mr. TELLER. It does not now.

Mr. McDONALD. Yes, to Montana.

Mr. TELLER. This is an amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan, and any amendment to it which the Senator from Indiana may suggest I am willing to accept.

Mr. McDONALD. I move to amend the amendment so as to read:

That, whenever any part of the proposed road shall be embraced within the limits of any organized State, so much of said railroad and the appurtenances and property that may be within any such State shall be subject to taxation by such State.

Mr. TELLER. I accept that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. I have another amendment which I promised to offer for the Senator from Michigan. I move to insert as an additional section:

This act and every provision thereof, and every right, power, and privilege therein granted, are hereby declared to be subject to the condition that Congress may at any time alter, amend, or repeal this act or any provision therein contained.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to say just one word on this bill. If this road should be built as provided for in the bill, to Deadwood, and the road in the bill which was recently passed were also built, it would form a connection between the North Pacific and the Union Pacific road.

Mr. McDONALD. I should like the Senator from Colorado to allow me to offer just one other amendment.

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. McDONALD. In section 9, line 5, after the word "lands," I move to insert:

Provided, That in assessing the value of the lands actually taken the consequential benefits to the remaining land of the owner shall not be taken into account.

That is the same amendment which was adopted to a corresponding clause of the other bill.

Mr. TELLER. I am willing to accept that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I move to amend the third section of the bill by striking out the latter part of the fourteenth line and lines 15, 16, 17, and 18, in the following words:

The United States shall extinguish as rapidly as may be the Indian titles to all lands falling under the operation of this act, and required for the said right of way and grants herein made for stations, buildings, work-shops, and necessary appurtenances.

Mr. TELLER. I have no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. I have one other amendment. In section 3, lines 12 and 13, I move to strike out "one hundred and sixty acres" and insert "forty acres;" so as to read:

Not to exceed forty acres for each station and buildings and appurtenances thereunto appertaining.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. McMILLAN. In section 3, line 8, I move to strike out the word "two" and insert "one."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota will allow the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole to be concurred in and then his amendment will be in order. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole. The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. McMILLAN. I move to strike out the word "two" before "hundred," in line 8 of section 3, and insert in lieu thereof the word "one;" so as to read:

Said right of way is granted to said railroad to the extent of one hundred feet in width on each side of said railroad where it may pass over the public lands, &c.

Mr. TELLER. I have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The title of the bill is, I see, "to incorporate the National Pacific Railroad and Telegraph Company." The bill has been amended so as not to authorize the company to build a road to the Pacific ocean, but to build a road merely to the eastern line of the State of Oregon. I suggest to the Senator who has charge of the bill that he change the title.

Mr. TELLER. I do not care about moving to change the title; I do not think that amounts to anything.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Such a motion is not in order now. Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The title is stated in the seventeenth line of the first section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A motion to amend that clause is in order.

Mr. TELLER. Does the Senator wish to move to strike out the word "Pacific?"

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Yes, sir; so as to read "the National Railroad and Telegraph Company." I think the object of the bill is merely to build a road from the Union Pacific road to the Black Hills; and the title ought to express the object of the bill; I therefore move to amend the seventeenth line of the first section by striking out the words "the National Pacific Railroad," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "the Cheyenne and Black Hills Railroad."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McDONALD. I desire to offer an amendment. The quantity of land that the bill authorizes for each station, it seems to me, is in excess of what is actually needed and is more than we were willing to concede before. I wish to limit the amount to forty acres.

Mr. TELLER. That is done already.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment was made.

Mr. TELLER. I moved that myself.

Mr. INGALLS. Does the bill allow this company to bridge and tie their road from timber on the public domain? It should do so, if it does not, to make it symmetrical with the other bill which we passed to-day.

Mr. TELLER. Does the Senator move an amendment to that effect?

Mr. INGALLS. If that amendment has not been made, I move it.

Mr. WHYTE. It is in the original bill.

Mr. INGALLS. Allowing them to bridge and tie the road?

Mr. WHYTE. They may take all the timber they want for any purposes.

Mr. INGALLS. I hope the bill will be amended, then, so as to allow them to take all the timber they want from the public domain.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. That would come in after the word "timber" in the sixth line of section 3.

Mr. INGALLS. I move, if not already done, to amend the bill by inserting after the word "timber" in section 3, line 6, the words "for the purpose of tying and bridging the said road."

Mr. WHYTE. I hope my friend will not move that, because it might be supposed to limit the requirements of the company to it. They can only take the timber for this purpose, and I think the broad language here will cover this case, that is to take all the "timber and other materials necessary for the construction thereof" from the public lands.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas insist upon his amendment?

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas. [Putting the question.] The yeas appear to have it. Does the Senator desire a division?

Mr. INGALLS. No—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas have it.

Mr. INGALLS. No, no. There was but one "no" to three "ayes."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas have it.

Mr. INGALLS. In order to test that I call for a division. There were three "ayes" and one "no."

Mr. TELLER. There were two or three "noes" around here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The call is too late.

Mr. INGALLS. I will find out whether or not I am too late, before this bill is through with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the Senator's privilege to find out anything he pleases.

Mr. INGALLS. It is the first time I ever heard, when a division was called for, that it was denied by the Chair; and if I cannot have the privilege of a division now, I shall endeavor to find it some time before the bill is through with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state in answer to the Senator from Kansas, that the Chair, contrary to the custom of the Chair, put the question whether a division was called for and the Senator from Kansas, as the Chair understood him, said distinctly "no." Then the Chair took the responsibility to decide.

Mr. INGALLS. Then I call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question has been decided and the amendment is lost. The Chair refuses to entertain the call for the yeas and nays after a decision on a rising vote. The question is on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 20, noes 6; no quorum voting.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WHYTE. Let us take a ye and nay vote on the passage of the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. I agree with the Senator from Maryland to take a vote by yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You cannot do anything else now but to get the yeas and nays. There is no quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a second to the call for the yeas and nays on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read the third time?

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 18, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—18.
Allison,	Chaffee,	McMillan,	Saunders,
Armstrong,	Coke,	Mitchell,	Teller,
Booth,	Conover,	Morgan,	Windom.
Butler,	Eustis,	Plumb,
Cameron of Wis.,	Grover,	Rollins,
NAYS—19.
Anthony,	Edmunds,	Kernan,	Oglesby,
Bailey,	Garland,	McCreery,	Voorhees,
Burnside,	Harris,	McDonald,	Wadleigh,
Davis of W. Va.,	Hierford,	McPherson,	Whyte.
Eaton,	Johnston,	Morrill,
ABSENT—39.
Barnum,	Dawes,	Jones of Florida,	Randolph,
Bayard,	Dennis,	Jones of Nevada,	Ransom,
Beck,	Dorsey,	Kellogg,	Sargent,
Blaine,	Ferry,	Kirkwood,	Saulsbury,
Bruce,	Gordon,	Lamar,	Sharon,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hamlin,	Matthews,	Spencer,
Christiancy,	Hill,	Maxey,	Thurman,
Cockrell,	Hoar,	Merrimon,	Wallace,
Conkling,	Howe,	Paddock,	Withers.
Davis of Illinois,	Ingalls,	Patterson,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The vote discloses the lack of a quorum.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that there be a call of the Senate to see if we cannot get a quorum here at half past three in the afternoon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. WITHERS] is detained at home, and is not able to be in his seat.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a quorum present. Forty-seven Senators have answered to their names. Is a further call of the Senate insisted on?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask unanimous consent to strike out of section 2 the words empowering this road to locate branches. The Senator who has charge of the bill has no objection to the amendment. I supposed these branches had been stricken out of the bill.

Mr. TELLER. I supposed those words had been stricken out. We agreed the other day that they should be stricken out.

Mr. MORRILL. I move in line 6 of section 2 to strike out all after the word "Washington," being the words:

With such branches and side lines as may be necessary to the growth and development of the public domain therein.

This can only be in order by unanimous consent.

Mr. INGALLS. What is the stage of the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered and the roll has been called on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time. No amendment, therefore, will be in order except by unanimous consent.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask unanimous consent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let there be unanimous consent to reconsider the vote on going to a third reading so as to have the bill open for amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There has been no third reading yet. Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well.

Mr. VOORHEES. I should like to ask a question in regard to the general purpose of the bill. I think there was a vote given under some misapprehension, at least without that clear, distinct understanding of the purposes of the bill that ought to be had, and I am inclined to think with such an understanding the vote would have been different. What I wish to know is whether the bill does anything more than grant the right of way through the territory of the United States for the building of a railroad to the Black Hills country, without touching any State, and without granting any lands or subsidies, of any kind whatever. Does it do anything more than that?

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator from Indiana to allow the Chair to put the question whether there be unanimous consent to treat the bill as open so as to get rid of the difficulty into which we have fallen?

Mr. VOORHEES. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state the present status of the bill. The yeas and nays were ordered on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time. The call was made and it disclosed the want of a quorum, pending which the Senator from Vermont moved a call of the Senate, which was had. That was dispensed with upon ascertaining that there was a quorum present. The next thing in order, and the only thing in order at this time, is the call of the roll of absentees at the former call on the question of ordering the bill to be engrossed and read the third time.

Mr. INGALLS. By unanimous consent that can be waived.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am not sure that that is right, but I take it to be so for the moment, and I ask unanimous consent that that be dispensed with, so as to leave the bill open on the question of the third reading to amendment and explanation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By unanimous consent that will be the order. The bill is in the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. Now I move the amendment which I indicated, to strike out all after the word "Washington" in line 6 of section 2.

Mr. TELLER. There is no objection to that. In fact I supposed the amendment had been made. It was overlooked in committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHYTE. There have been a great many amendments offered to this bill since it came from the committee. When I first looked at it awhile ago, it had a great many objectionable features in it. I have understood from the Senator who seems to have it in charge that many of these have been stricken out, but I do not think that in a legislative body we ought to vote for any bill upon trust. I should like to see the shape and form of the bill after all these amendments have been incorporated in it and the defects have been stricken out. For that purpose I move to postpone its consideration, to let it lie upon the table, that it may be printed as amended, so that we can understand exactly what it is when we vote upon it; and it can be called up to-morrow morning. I move, therefore, that it be laid on the table temporarily.

Mr. CHAFFEE. I desire to state to the Senator from Maryland that this bill has been amended to correspond with the other bill which has just passed through the Senate, the other bill being to authorize a company to construct a road from Bismarck to the Black Hills. This bill is almost identical in terms, and the changes which have been made by the Senate have been to correspond with the amendments to the other bill and to meet objections which were made to that measure. This bill is for the purpose of building a railroad from Cheyenne, or some place near Cheyenne, on the northern boundary of the State of Colorado, to the Black Hills, to be extended into the Territory of Montana near Helena, and from there to the eastern boundary of the State of Oregon. The bill grants no subsidies of any kind, except the right of way and forty acres of land at each station, the same as was provided by the other bill which passed this afternoon. There are no extra provisions in the bill and nothing that can designate this bill as one that should be defeated, while the other bill has been passed, they being almost identical in terms.

Mr. WHYTE. I ask for a vote on my motion. The motion is not debatable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not debatable except by unanimous consent. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maryland to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. INGALLS. Was the motion to lay on the table or to postpone until to-morrow?

Mr. WHYTE. To lay on the table, with a view to take it up to-morrow.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator from Maryland will give me his attention, I appeal to him to withdraw the motion and merely make a motion to postpone and print, so that any explanations upon this subject may be given now as well as at any other time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland modify his motion?

Mr. WHYTE. I have no objection to modifying it. My object is simply to understand what we are voting upon before we are called upon to vote finally.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion, then, of the Senator from Maryland is to postpone the consideration of the bill until to-morrow, which is debatable.

Mr. TELLER. There are some amendments that ought to be made before the bill goes over. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] desires to make some amendments to the bill. If we are to make any further amendments, they should be made now.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from Colorado to give way, that I may move to go into executive session. That would leave this bill the unfinished business for to-morrow.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It had better be fixed a little and printed.

Mr. ALLISON. In the mean time let this bill be printed with the amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Maryland to postpone the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Colorado asks me to yield to him in order that one or two amendments may be offered before the bill shall be printed, and I withhold my motion for an executive session for that purpose.

Mr. TELLER. I consent that the bill shall go over and be printed; but the Senator from Vermont wishes to make some amendment to it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If Senators will turn to section 13, they will perceive that there is granted to the company the power to lease its line to any other line or to consolidate with any other line. That, I think, is wrong. I therefore move, first, in order to get that out of the bill, in section 13, line 1, after the word "power" to insert the words "subject to the approval of Congress," so that the leasing of the line to any other line, which might be a perpetual lease and therefore a substantial consolidation, shall not be made unless Congress shall approve it, because it tends to get up monopolies, and so on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland withdraw his motion to postpone the bill?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Oh, I beg pardon of the Chair; I had forgotten it. Mr. WHYTE. It was understood. I withdraw my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to postpone is withdrawn, and the question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In lines 4 and 5 of the same section, I move to strike out the words "or operating their roads," so as to confine this approval of Congress only to the leasing, and leave them with the ordinary power, which these words are not necessary to confer, to make the ordinary business arrangements with other roads.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In line 6, of section 13, after the word "Territories," I move to strike out all the rest of the section; that is to say, these words:

And they are empowered hereby to consolidate their property and stock with each other, such consolidation to take place whenever such companies shall respectively agree upon the terms and conditions thereof; and they shall have all the powers, privileges, and liabilities that they may hold by their separate charters, by filing a copy of such articles of consolidation in the office of the Secretary of the Interior.

I do not think we ought to allow this company or any other chartered by Congress to consolidate of its own will with some other road, and thus get up a monopoly against the people.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHYTE. Now the Senator from Iowa moves to go into executive session.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Has there been an order to print?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There has been no such order made.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the bill be printed, so that we shall have it to-morrow as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont, to print the bill as amended.

The motion was agreed to.

DAKOTA SOUTHWESTERN RAILWAY.

Mr. EATON. I enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate bill No. 927, to authorize the construction of a railroad from Bismarck to the Black Hills, was passed this afternoon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion will be entered.

THE CALENDAR.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That on Wednesday next, at one o'clock, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the Calendar, and continue such consideration from day to day until the same shall have been gone through with; and bills that are not objected to shall be taken up in their order, and each Senator shall be entitled to speak once, and for five minutes only, unless, upon motion, the Senate should at any time otherwise order; and the objection may be interposed at any stage of the proceedings; and this order shall take precedence of special orders or unfinished business, unless otherwise ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Rhode Island ask for the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. ANTHONY. I should like to have it considered now.

Mr. INGALLS. It had better lie over and be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the resolution will go over and be printed.

BENJAMIN HOLLADAY.

Mr. McMILLAN. I ask the Senator from Iowa to give way to me while I ask for authority from the Senate for the Committee on Claims to employ a stenographer to take the testimony of witnesses in relation to the claim of Benjamin Holladay which was referred to that committee. The witnesses will be ready to proceed with their examination to-morrow, and it is desirable that the case be disposed of at as early a time as possible.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I understand this authority is to be limited to a single case.

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes, sir; to the claim of Benjamin Holladay.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I am not opposed to it; but I understand our official reporters here generally do that kind of work. I take it that is the usual rule.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But they do it on the private employment of the committee, and are paid for it like anybody else.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I understand that, and I merely throw out the idea that such work is done by our regular Senate stenographers, and not generally by those outside. I am in favor of that course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion made by the Senator from Minnesota that the Committee on Claims be authorized to employ a stenographer in a certain case specified by him. The motion was agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask that the Committee on the Judiciary be authorized to sit during the sessions of the Senate. The amount of business before that committee is so great of difficult and disputed questions, that I think we ought to be authorized to sit while the Senate is sitting. I ask that authority.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the suggestion made by the Senator from Vermont? The Chair hears none. Leave is granted.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. ALLISON. I now make the motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GORDON. While the galleries are being cleared I ask the Senate to take up and pass, if there is no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 3739) to prevent the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States. It is the quarantine bill which came from the House the other day. The bill has been reported back favorably from the Committee on Commerce with amendments, and I hope the Senate will pass it now, in order that it may go back to the House.

Mr. EUSTIS. I rise to a point of order that legislative business is out of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. PATTERSON. I ask leave to introduce a bill.

Mr. GORDON. What becomes of my motion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana raised the point of order that the order of the Senate should be executed, and the Chair sustained the point raised by the Senator from Louisiana. Is there objection to the Senator from South Carolina introducing a bill?

Mr. EDMUNDS. The regular order, Mr. President.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and eighteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at five o'clock and nine minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, April 15, 1878.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON.

The Journal of Saturday last was read.

NIGHT SESSIONS FOR PENSION BILLS.

Mr. MILLS. I think there should be a correction of the Journal in reference to the order, made on Saturday upon my motion, in reference to evening sessions this week. The Journal, as read, is not sufficiently specific. It reads that the sessions are to be "for business on the Private Calendar." The Journal should read, "for the consideration of business on the Private Calendar reported from the Committees on Revolutionary and on Invalid Pensions."

The SPEAKER. That portion of the Journal will be again read. The Clerk read as follows:

On motion of Mr. MILLS, by unanimous consent, ordered: That evening sessions be held on Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday, the 16th, 17th, and 18th instant, commencing at seven and a half o'clock p. m., for the consideration of reports from the Committees on Revolutionary and Invalid Pensions, and for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar, as on objection day, reported from the said committees, no other business to be transacted.

Mr. MILLS. There are two points in the order adopted upon my motion: one is the consideration of reports from the Committees on Revolutionary and on Invalid Pensions, and the second is the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar for revolutionary and for invalid pensions.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the intention of the House was to allow the two committees, on Revolutionary and on Invalid Pensions, to report, say on the first evening.

Mr. MILLS. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. To submit reports for an hour, and then that the House should proceed to consider the bills on the Private Calendar, those last reported, of course, not taking precedence.

Mr. MILLS. But when the House comes to the consideration of the Private Calendar, it is for the consideration of revolutionary and invalid pension bills, not for claims, &c.

Mr. PRICE. For pension bills alone.

Mr. MILLS. Yes; that is what I mean.

Mr. THOMPSON. The order as recorded in the Journal just read says, "bills on the Private Calendar reported from the said committees."

Mr. MILLS. Some have been reported before this time and are now on the Calendar. In the first place, reports are to be received and considered from the Committee on Revolutionary and on Invalid Pensions; and in the second place those bills are to be considered which are already pending on the Private Calendar.

Mr. THOMPSON. And none others.

Mr. MILLS. And none others.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would say that the bills reported on the first evening should go to the bottom of the Calendar.

Mr. MILLS. Unquestionably.

The SPEAKER. And then the second branch of the resolution would seem to indicate that the bills reported from the Committees on Revolutionary and on Invalid Pensions already on the Calendar should be taken up and considered in their order.

Mr. MILLS. I suppose that the committees would first be called for reports, and those reports would go to the bottom of the Calendar.

The SPEAKER. Any one member could insist upon their being sent to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. EDEN. No other reports to be considered except pension reports?

The SPEAKER. No reports to be considered except such as already have been made from the Committees on Revolutionary and on Invalid Pensions, and such as may be made from those two committees; that is the distinct understanding.

Mr. HANNA. I suppose if the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, for instance, should report favorably upon a given bill, it would be competent for the House to consider and pass upon it at once.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that according to the understanding such bills should go to the bottom of the Calendar. Any one member can send them to the Calendar on a point of order, and they would take their place with those which have already been reported. In other words, those first reported should have the first chance for consideration; the Chair thinks that is but equitable.

If there be no objection, the Journal as read will stand as approved.

There was no objection, and the Journal was approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. EDEN. I now call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the morning hour, which begins at ten minutes past twelve o'clock. This being Monday, the first business during the morning hour is the call of States and Territories for bills and joint resolutions for introduction and reference to appropriate committees. During this call memorials and joint resolutions of State and territorial Legislatures are in order for reference.

PREVENTION OF CRUELTY TO CHILDREN.

Mr. FRYE (by request) introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4293) to prevent and punish wrongs to children in the District, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. CLYMER. Let the bill be read.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. FRYE. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and printed.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New York. I would move that the bill be referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. FRYE. I have no pride of opinion about the matter. The friends of the bill desire it to go to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New York. I do not know that it is a matter of any importance; but it seems to me that there are a great many provisions in that bill which should be considered by the Committee for the District of Columbia. I will not insist upon it, however.

The bill was accordingly referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

MRS. ELIZABETH S. ROBERTS.

Mr. JOYCE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4294) to increase the pension of Mrs. Elizabeth S. Roberts; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. BANNING. I call for the reading of that bill.

The bill was read at length, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

BUILDING ASSOCIATIONS IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. HENDEE (by request) introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4295) to provide for the incorporation of building associations in the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. CLYMER. I ask for the reading of that bill.

The bill was read at length, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 1080) authorizing the issue of passports free to colored citizens going to Brazil.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WADDELL. I ask unanimous consent that the call for bills and joint resolutions for reference be continued till all the States and Territories have been called.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

H. LOUISE GATES.

Mr. BANKS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4296) increasing the pension of H. Louise Gates; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

GEORGE A. STEVENS.

Mr. DEAN introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4297) to restore George A. Stevens to his relative rank in the Navy of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

NEW LONDON NAVY-YARD.

Mr. WAIT presented resolutions of the General Assembly of the State of Connecticut, relative to the New London navy-yard; which were read, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WAIT. I ask unanimous consent that this resolution and the accompanying letter of the governor of Connecticut be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot ask that during the morning hour of Monday.

JANE A. O'BRIEN.

Mr. BLISS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4298) granting a pension to Jane A. O'Brien; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

JAMES O. HAIGHT.

Mr. MULLER (by request of Mr. QUINN, absent on account of sickness) introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4299) for the relief of James O. Haight; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM BEANTOR.

Mr. MCCOOK introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4300) for the relief of William Beantor, late private in Company C, Twenty-first United States Infantry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CHAPLAINS IN THE ARMY.

Mr. MCCOOK (by request) introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4301) to regulate the appointment, assignment, and duties of chaplains in the Army, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ROBERT L. MAY.

Mr. HUNGERFORD introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4302) for the relief of Robert L. May, of the United States Navy; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

SPECIE PAYMENTS.

Mr. WILLIS, of New York, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4303) to restore the national credit and revive public confidence by making a certain and definite pledge of the resumption of specie payments; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILLIS, of New York, called for the reading of the bill at length; and it was read.

JOHN HILLEN.

Mr. COX, of New York, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4304) for the relief of John Hillen; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

DESECRATION OF UNITED STATES FLAG.

Mr. COX, of New York, also (by request) introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4305) to prevent the desecration of the United States flag; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

DAVID I. SCOTT.

Mr. CUTLER introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4306) for the relief of David I. Scott, late first lieutenant Tenth Infantry, United States Army; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PETER BOHANNON.

Mr. CUTLER also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4307) granting a pension to Peter Bohannon; which was read a first and second time referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

JAMES L. JORDAN.

Mr. BAYNE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4308) granting a pension to James L. Jordan; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

ESTHER M'CONKEY.

Mr. BAYNE also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4309) granting a pension to Esther McConkey; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

MRS. ELIZABETH F. LONG.

Mr. TURNEY introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4310) for the relief of Mrs. Elizabeth F. Long, widow of Andrew K. Long, deceased, late captain and commissary of subsistence United States Army; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM B. CONNOR.

Mr. TURNEY also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4311) authorizing and directing the Adjutant-General to erase from the rolls the charge of mutiny against William B. Connor, deceased, a private in the late war; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PENSION TO TEAMSTERS AND OTHERS IN WAR OF 1812.

Mr. MACKEY introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4312) granting pensions to teamsters and Indians who were in the service of the United States in the war of 1812, and to widows who remarried; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

MEREDITH MONUMENT ASSOCIATION, WAYNE COUNTY, PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. OVERTON introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4313) appropriating $10,000 to the Meredith Monument Association of Mount Pleasant Township, Wayne County, Pennsylvania; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

CORNELIUS WESSELS.

Mr. KETCHAM introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4314) granting a pension to Cornelius Wessels; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

REVISION OF THE TARIFF.

Mr. EVANS, of Pennsylvania, presented resolutions of the General Assembly of the State of Pennsylvania, against any revision of the tariff; which were referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

MODE OF TRYING TITLE OF PRESIDENT AND VICE-PRESIDENT TO THEIR RESPECTIVE OFFICES.

Mr. KIMMEL introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4315) to provide a mode for trying and determining by the Supreme Court of the United States the title of the President and Vice-President of the United States to their respective offices when their election to such offices is denied by one or more of the States of the Union; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTORAL VOTE.

Mr. SWANN. I present a joint resolution of the Legislature of Maryland, authorizing judicial proceedings to give effect to the electoral vote of Maryland, and I move it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I ask that it may be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the General Assembly of Maryland. That the attorney-general of the State be, and he is hereby, instructed, in case Congress shall provide for expediting the action, to exhibit a bill in the Supreme Court of the United States, on behalf of the State of Maryland, with proper parties thereto, setting forth the fact that due effect has not been given to the electoral vote cast by this State on the 6th day of December, 1876, by reason of fraudulent returns made from other States and allowed to be counted provisionally by the electoral commission, and subject to judicial revision, and praying said court to make the revision contemplated by the act establishing said commission; and upon such revision to declare the returns from the States of Louisiana and Florida, which were counted for Rutherford B. Hayes and William A. Wheeler, fraudulent and void, and that the legal electoral votes of said States were cast for Samuel J. Tilden as President and Thomas A. Hendricks as Vice-President, and that by virtue thereof and of 184 votes cast by other States, of which 8 were cast by the State of Maryland, the said Tilden and Hendricks were duly elected; and praying said court to decree accordingly.

Attest:

MILTON G. KIDD,
Chief Clerk of the House of Delegates.
AUGUSTUS GASSAWAY,
Secretary of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GARFIELD. I raise the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. In what respect?

Mr. GARFIELD. I object to its reception.

The SPEAKER. On what ground?

Mr. GARFIELD. The subject-matter has been settled by the authority of both Houses of Congress, and I therefore object to the reception by this House of a revolutionary proposition to reopen the question. The majority can refuse to refer it to a committee. I do not raise a question of order, but I object to the reception and reference of this paper.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Has the gentleman withdrawn his objection?

Mr. GARFIELD. No, sir; I have not.

The SPEAKER. In the first instance the gentleman from Ohio rose to a question of order, as the Chair supposed. Subsequently the Chair was informed by the gentleman from Ohio he did not raise the point of order. His objection is in his individual capacity as a member as to consideration.

Mr. EDEN. Is the question open to debate?

Mr. GARFIELD. I have raised the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. There is no question of consideration involved. It has been introduced for reference only under the rule.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is to be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary for consideration. On that motion we can now raise the question of consideration. On the motion to refer to any committee of the House, which means consideration, the House can determine whether it will put this subject in train for legislative consideration.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the House during this morning hour of Monday is not allowed to consider but to receive bills and joint resolutions which are introduced for reference only.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is consideration. This is my only method to object to the consideration of the paper. When a bill is offered for action we can raise the question of consideration. Now this is offered to be put in train for action, and my only method of raising the question of consideration is to object to its reference to any committee. A motion is pending to refer this paper to a committee. The House has an undoubted right to determine whether that motion shall prevail or not.

Mr. COX, of New York. I call for the reading of Rule 130.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will first cause to be read Rule 41, the rule evidently referred to by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

The Clerk read as follows:

41. When any motion or proposition is made, the question, "Will the House now consider it?" shall not be put unless it is demanded by some member, or is deemed necessary by the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. What rule does the gentleman from New York desire to have read?

Mr. COX, of New York. Rule 130, under which, I submit, the Chair has no discretion, when a joint resolution comes from a State, except to present it.

The Clerk read as follows:

130. All the States and Territories shall be called for bills on leave and resolutions every Monday during each session of Congress; and, if necessary to secure the object on said days, all resolutions which shall give rise to debate shall lie over for discussion, under the rules of the House already established; and the whole of said days shall be appropriated to bills on leave and resolutions, until all the States and Territories are called through. And the Speaker shall first call the States and Territories for bills on leave; and all bills so introduced during the first hour after the Journal is read shall be referred, without debate, to their appropriate committees: Provided, however, That a bill so introduced and referred, and all bills at any time introduced by unanimous consent and referred, shall not be brought back into the House upon a motion to reconsider. And on said call, joint resolutions of State and territorial Legislatures for printing and reference may be introduced.

Mr. GARFIELD. The point on which I desire the ruling of the Speaker is this: whether under the rule which has just been read the House is obliged to refer for consideration any proposition that any member may introduce on any subject. It seems to me, if we take that view of the case, then this House is compelled to consider by means of its committees any proposition whatever, no matter what its character may be. Now, I have always understood and do understand that the House of Representatives is the controller of its business, and if a bill should be offered that every member except the one offering it was unwilling to have considered, is it possible that this House is compelled to treat such a bill as it does a bill that it wants to consider? Is it possible we are bound to send such a bill to a committee, which means consideration? Is there no place where we can stop in limine and resist by refusing to allow a bill to be referred? It seems to me the right to determine whether we will consider a bill has never been given away by any of the rules cited. Let it not be forgotten that a motion is pending to refer this paper to a committee. Is it possible that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. SWANN] can carry a motion against the will of the House? No one denies that it is in order to amend the motion so as to change the reference to another committee. On that motion surely the House can vote. We can vote on any motion to refer. We can vote against every reference proposed. In short, we can vote not to refer this paper to any committee at all, and that is what I desire.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The parliamentary law, Mr. Speaker, in such cases is this, as I understand it: when any bill or measure is introduced into the House, the question of reception may be raised by anybody, and it may be rejected upon its first reading. That takes precedence of a question of reference. That I understand to be the parliamentary law.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Georgia be kind enough to direct the attention of the Chair to such a rule of this House?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I speak of the parliamentary law laid down in Jefferson's Manual.

In this case, however, I wish to say to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] that I trust he will withdraw his objection to this measure. It comes from one of the States of the Union. Let it go. Let it be referred. Do not raise a question of this sort upon this parliamentary motion. I trust the gentleman from Ohio will withdraw the objection, and that this resolution or bill will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. COX, of New York. I call the attention of the House to an interpretation of this rule which is found on page 263 of the Manual:

Ever since the foregoing rule has been in its present form, the Speaker has declined to entertain even a request for unanimous consent to transact any other business within the time prescribed for calls for bills on leave for reference.

So that no motion to reject could now be made as is suggested by the distinguished gentleman from Georgia. No motion can be made except to refer under Rule 130. Otherwise the motion to reject might be made on every petition and every bill that comes here.

The States have some rights yet left. When they present joint resolutions we are bound to receive them. The disposition of the resolution is another question. The right of petition on the part of the people and on the part of the States is equal and cannot be in any way abridged. We cannot derogate from it in any way.

The gentleman from Georgia speaks of some general parliamentary rule by which we can vote to reject. We can vote in certain emergencies to reject bills. I am aware of the rule to which he refers, but in this morning hour of Monday the Speaker has no alternative, no discretion, except to go on with the call for bills and joint resolutions from States for reference, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

Mr. HASKELL. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HASKELL. My inquiry is if it is not competent for this House to decide to which committee any bill introduced by any member on the floor shall be referred.

The SPEAKER. It is; and that is as far as the House, during the recollection of the present occupant of the chair, has ever gone; and that has uniformly been decided with the briefest possible debate.

Mr. HASKELL. I would like to ask further: if that is true and it is competent for this House to determine to which committee a bill shall be referred, whether it is not competent for this House to determine that it shall not be referred at all?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that would be an infringement upon the right of a member in his capacity as a Representative to refuse to receive.

Mr. SAMPSON. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to page 163 of the Manual, where it is said:

The first reading of a bill shall be for information, and if opposition be made to it, the question shall be: "Shall this bill be rejected?"

That is in accordance with Rule 117.

The SPEAKER. This is not a bill; this is a memorial from a State Legislature.

Mr. SAMPSON. But the question is: should not the same rule apply?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that a rule made to apply to bills is not comprehensive enough to embrace communications from State Legislatures in the absence of language to that effect.

Mr. SAMPSON. I understand this resolution of the State Legislature is introduced in the same manner as bills are introduced.

The SPEAKER. It is in the nature of a memorial.

Mr. SAMPSON. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] took the position that the question of reference or rejection could not be entertained in relation to any bill, and that every bill offered on Monday morning must be received. It seems to me that is not the correct position. The House has a right, as to any bill or joint resolution, to decide whether it will receive or reject it under the rule.

Mr. COX, of New York. In the last Congress a motion was made in the morning hour, by a gentleman from Indiana, (Mr. Williams,) who is now governor of his State, to reject a certain bill with reference to the currency, and the Chair decided that that motion could not be made in the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that this is not analogous to a bill at all. Here is a communication from a State Legislature in the nature of a memorial, and embraced within the right of a petition, and the Chair thinks that if the point of order is insisted upon he is prepared to rule upon it now.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the Chair have the kindness to have the joint resolution again read, as a number of gentlemen are here who did not hear the whole of it?

The joint resolution was again read.

Mr. SPRINGER. I wish to have read in connection with the joint resolution the section of the law establishing the joint commission upon the presidential question, to which reference has been made in the joint resolution.

Mr. REAGAN. That is in the nature of debate, and I object to it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that this is in the nature of debate only as to a point of order, and thinks the subject too important to refuse to hear anything that gentlemen submit.

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly it is in reference to the point of order. I simply ask that section 6 of the act establishing the electoral commission be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That nothing in this act shall be held to impair or affect any right now existing under the Constitution and laws to question by proceeding in the judicial courts of the United States the right or title of any person who shall be declared elected to the office of President or Vice-President if any such right exists.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to have read Rule 131.

Mr. MILLS. I rise to a parliamentary question. I wish to know if it is competent to instruct the committee to which this joint resolution may be referred during the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. Not during this "the morning hour." The practice has only gone to the extent of submitting to the House a test as to reference.

Mr. COX, of New York. What is the motion of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. PRICE. Has not the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. The morning hour proper, sixty minutes, has expired, but the House by unanimous consent authorized the business under this call to be continued until all the States and Territories should be called.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. The House by unanimous consent gave permission that this proceeding should go on.

The Clerk read Rule 131, as follows:

Members having petitions and memorials to present may hand them to the Clerk, endorsing the same with their names, and the reference or disposition to be made thereof; and such petitions and memorials shall be entered on the Journal, subject to the control and direction of the Speaker, and if any petition or memorial be so handed in which, in the judgment of the Speaker, is excluded by the rules, the same shall be returned to the member from whom it was received.

The SPEAKER. The House will observe that that rule governs the petitions which can be placed in the box and seems to allow it without limit, as the Chair thinks it should be, as every citizen, no matter who he may be, has a right respectfully to petition Congress. The Chair views this paper as a memorial from a State Legislature and thinks that in addition to Rule 131 the end of Rule 130, which provides that joint resolutions of a State Legislature may be presented in the manner as therein stated, governs this case.

Mr. GARFIELD. I demand a vote, then, upon the pending motion to refer the paper to a committee, and I call for the yeas and nays. In this demand I am plainly within the rules.

Mr. THOMPSON. If it be in order, I move that this memorial and all the accompanying papers, if there be others, be referred to a special committee consisting of fifteen members to be appointed by the Speaker. I make that motion for this reason, that in constituting that committee I have full confidence that the Speaker of the House will discharge a duty delicate and important so as to appoint a committee so constituted that its report, whatever it may be, will have the confidence of this House and command the respect of the whole country. I therefore desire to make the motion in good faith.

Mr. SAMPSON. Before that motion is entertained I wish to call the attention of the Chair to a point which I conceive has been overlooked in this case; and that is, that this is not a memorial directed to Congress asking anything of Congress. I wish to inquire if any member has a right to present here a paper on any subject and have it referred to a committee? It seems to me that Congress has nothing to do with this joint resolution whatever. It does not ask the action of Congress and is not directed to Congress, and it has no right to any place here.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the letter accompanying the joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

By the house of delegates of Maryland, April 1, 1878—

Resolved. That the clerk of this House be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit a copy of these joint resolutions, to give effect to the electoral vote of Maryland, to our Senators and Representatives in Congress, with a request that the same be presented to the Senate and House of Representatives.

By order.

MILTON E. KIDD,
Chief Clerk.

Mr. CARLISLE. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. There is one point of order already pending. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SAMPSON] raises the point of order that this paper is informally here. The Chair thinks, from the reading of the letter which accompanies this memorial or petition from the Legislature of the State of Maryland, that it is not informally here. It comes here presented by a Representative from Maryland and for a purpose stated in the body of the resolution just read. The Chair cannot conceive that it comes here for any other purpose than for presentation. It comes as all memorials of State Legislatures come, in the usual form. The Chair thinks that memorials usually come from the Legislature of his own State in this manner.

Mr. SAMPSON. I formed my opinion from the title of the resolution and the body of the resolution itself, so far as I heard it read. The paper just read by the Clerk is no part of the resolution, and is not the act of the Legislature of Maryland, but only a request by one branch of it. The resolution on its face does not appear to contemplate presentation here. It still seems to me that this paper is improperly here. The Legislature of Maryland is asking nothing of Congress. This paper is not in the nature of a petition, it is simply a notification to Congress that the Legislature of Maryland has considered this subject. It is not in the nature of a petition asking legislation from us; it is not directed to Congress. I still believe my point of order is well taken.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SAMPSON] certainly would not dictate to the Legislature of a State what kind of a petition it shall send to Congress. It is the province of the State Legislature to frame its resolutions and send them here; and it is our province to receive them in a respectful manner, and not to dictate to a State what kind of a resolution it shall send to us.

Mr. CARLISLE. I desire to make a point of order upon the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] to have a vote by yeas and nays upon the motion to refer. I do not understand that any gentleman has a right to call for a vote upon a motion to refer during the morning hour of Monday, unless he opposes the particular committee to which the gentleman who presents the proposition desires to have it referred and moves to refer it to some other one.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do oppose its reference to that committee or to any other.

Mr. CARLISLE. The gentleman did not make any such motion. The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the motion to refer gives the right to a member to call for a vote upon it.

Mr. GARFIELD. A single word. I do not take any objection to the form of this petition. I presume it is sufficiently formal to come here. I stand upon the right of the House of Representatives to say what it will do with papers when they have been read at the desk. And our right to say whether a paper shall be referred to one committee rather than to another necessarily involves our right to say that the paper shall be referred to no committee.

Mr. CARLISLE. What becomes of it then?

Mr. GARFIELD. It remains upon the table.

Mr. CARLISLE. The House then refuses to receive the petition.

Mr. GARFIELD. No; the petition is received; the House has heard it, but refuses to refer it to any place where it can be formulated into action; that is all. Upon that right of the House to dispose of papers that come before it, I base my demand for a vote of the House upon the motion to refer.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say in reply to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] that there would hardly be any place on the Speaker's table for the petition, under any rule of the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. I did not mean "the Speaker's table," but the table of the House. There is abundant room on that table for this paper.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to refer the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] to the third section of clause 5, article 1, of the Constitution, which reads "and the yeas and nays of the members of either House shall, at the desire of one-fifth of those present, be entered on the Journal."

Mr. CARLISLE. But this is a question which the gentleman has no right to make.

The SPEAKER. This is a question of reference.

Mr. CARLISLE. No, sir; the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] does not propose to refer this petition to any committee.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. SWANN] has moved that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GARFIELD. And on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. CARLISLE. Can the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] antagonize that motion during the morning hour on Monday in any other way than by moving to refer the petition to some other committee of the House?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THOMPSON] has moved to amend the motion of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. SWANN] by referring the petition to a select committee of fifteen. The Chair will have read the rule upon the question of reference.

Mr. CARLISLE. I did not hear the motion made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. COX, of New York. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COX, of New York. Do I understand the Chair that the only question before the House is as to the particular committee to which this paper shall be referred?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has stated that the proposition before the House is upon the motion of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. SWANN] to refer this communication to the Committee on the Judiciary; to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THOMPSON] has moved an amendment to refer it to a select committee of fifteen. The first question will be upon the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to refer to a special committee of fifteen.

Mr. COX, of New York. Then I understand the Chair to rule that the petition must be considered so far as to give it a reference, and not be laid upon the table, as was the case in a former Congress in reference to a petition presented by John Quincy Adams; that it must be considered in some way. The question before the House is not the rejection of the petition, but to determine to what committee it shall be referred. That will save the honor of the State and of Congress.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to correct a statement just made by him. He said that the first question would be upon the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THOMPSON] to refer to a select committee. That is incorrect; under the rule the question will be first taken upon referring to a standing committee of the House.

Mr. BANKS. And upon that I raise the question of consideration, and ask a vote upon it.

Mr. O'NEILL. Will not my colleague [Mr. THOMPSON] withdraw his motion now or at the proper time, so as not to appear to be giving importance to this paper coming from the Legislature of Maryland? It is a paper insulting to this House.

Mr. MORRISON. No, it is not.

Mr. O'NEILL. It is a paper insulting to this House and tending to give unrest to the people of the United States in reference to the title of the Presidency. It is a paper which should be treated with the greatest indignity by members on this floor, and should not be given importance by such a motion as my colleague has made.

The SPEAKER. The first question is upon the motion to refer to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that the question first put shall be: Will the House now consider the motion to refer?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is not the proper question under the rule.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that Rule 41 be read.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let us take a vote upon the motion to refer and vote it down.

Mr. MILLS. I desire to call attention to Rule 43, which provides that—

When a resolution shall be offered or a motion made to refer any subject and different committees shall be proposed the question shall be taken in the following order:

The Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; the Committee of the Whole House; a standing committee; a select committee.

Now I submit whether, under this rule, it would not be in order first to refer this proposition to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. It would be when that motion is made.

Mr. MILLS. Then I make that motion.

Mr. CONGER. I do not know that the Chair understood my demand.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will listen to the gentleman; and he desires to have order. The points now being raised are probably new, never having occurred before, and never, the Chair hopes, to occur again. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONGER. Rule 41 provides that—

When any motion or proposition is made the question, "Will the House now consider it?" shall not be put unless it is demanded by some member or is deemed necessary by the Speaker.

Now, under that rule I demand that the question, "Will the House now consider the proposition?" be put.

Mr. BANKS. That was the proposition I made before.

The SPEAKER. This proposition comes up during the morning hour of Monday, and therefore must be subject to the rule governing that hour, which contains the following language:

The Speaker shall first call the States and Territories for bills on leave; and all bills so introduced during the first hour after the Journal is read shall be referred, without debate, to their appropriate committees: Provided, however, That a bill so introduced and referred, and all bills at any time introduced by unanimous consent and referred, shall not be brought back into the House upon a motion to reconsider; and on said call joint resolutions of State and territorial Legislatures for printing and reference may be introduced.

The Chair thinks that under this rule, which provides for the introduction of joint resolutions of State Legislatures, it is not competent to raise the question of consideration on such resolutions, and that the first vote must be upon the reference and printing, as set forth in the rule.

Mr. CONGER. Does the Chair decide—

Mr. GARFIELD. Before the Chair leaves that point he will permit me to say that the language of the rule just read is "bills on leave;" and the word "leave" refers to the leave of the House.

The SPEAKER. That would be a strained construction.

Mr. GARFIELD. It seems to me that the Chair in his remarks has not given sufficient effect to the words "on leave." All these bills and papers are introduced "on leave."

The SPEAKER. The Chair is further confirmed in the position he has taken by the fact that the rule he has read is, he believes, subsequent in the date of its adoption to the one to which the gentleman from Michigan has referred.

Mr. CONGER. If the Chair please, I am not disputing the ruling of the Chair on that point. But that rule says that these resolutions may be referred. Now comes in Rule 41, giving the privilege to any member on "any motion or proposition" to raise the question, Will the House now consider it? This meets the matter where the Chair leaves it and preserves the rights of the member.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that the language of Rule 41 is intended to authorize any interference with the proceedings of the House in the morning hour of Monday, as regulated by Rule 130.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I would like to suggest that the rule which the gentleman from Michigan has read is a rule as to when the consideration shall be had. Now, if I understand aright, the purpose on the other side is not as to the time for consideration, but that the consideration shall not be had at all.

Mr. CONGER. That is for the House to determine.

Mr. SOUTHARD. That would be a denial of the right of petition.

Mr. BANKS. There is no petition in the case.

The SPEAKER. In fact Rule 41 would seem to relate to the priority of business, rather than the reception of memorials and petitions or even of bills in the morning hour of Monday.

Mr. CONGER. I suppose the Chair will not dispute that this proposition to refer is a "motion or proposition" under Rule 41.

The SPEAKER. The Chair entertains the motion to refer.

Mr. CONGER. Then if it be a "motion or proposition" Rule 41 is applicable.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that under Rule 130 this paper has a right to a reference. The old controversy with reference to the right of petition must be familiar to every member of the House; and the rules have been adopted, the Chair thinks, so as to give the widest latitude to the humblest citizen to present his petition and have it received when couched in respectful language.

Mr. CONGER. That is a question perhaps for the House, not for the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has his opinions, and occasionally is entitled to express them for the information and perhaps for the guidance of the House.

Mr. CONGER. I should be very unwilling to dispute that.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I raise this question of order: is there anything now to be done but to take the question on the motion to refer?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the question first is on the motion of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. SWANN] to refer the joint resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary as amended by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] to refer to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. BANKS. I beg to say a word on this question. If necessary, I will appeal from the decision of the Chair for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. BANKS. Rule 130, to which the Chair has referred and which relates in part to the presentation of resolutions from State Legislatures, treats the question just like any other question that may be presented to the House at any time.

It does not transcend in its rights the privilege which a member has to present under the rule of the House a bill or a resolution or a petition. It stands exactly upon the same ground that every other question must stand that is presented here, and when it is presented then the rules take effect, and the rule which requires the consideration of that subject to be submitted to the decision of the House is a rule which cannot be evaded and it is a privilege which cannot be denied.

What is done by Rule 130 is to provide by the call of States for the presentation of bills and these joint resolutions. It states when they shall be in order, and when that time has come they are in order, but the House of Representatives has the right to say whether they shall be considered or not. Suppose a resolution should be passed by the Legislature denouncing as guilty of crime the Speaker of this House or any of its members, are we to receive it? Suppose the resolution of a State Legislature or a petition denouncing the President of the United States as guilty of crime, are we bound to consider it? Undoubtedly we should consider it, but we have the right to say, as we have on the question proposed, by any member of the House, under the rules of the House, whether or not it shall be considered. This is not a petition. It is a resolution of the State of Maryland, directing the governor to transmit a certain paper to Senators and Representatives from that State, requesting them to present it to their respective bodies. It does not come under the form of a petition. It is no invasion of the right of petition to reject it; but if it were a petition we still have the right to raise the question of consideration. I remember, sir, on account of certain opinions pronounced by Mr. Daniel Webster, a petition throwing obloquy and charging infamy upon his name and character was presented to the Legislature of Massachusetts, and that Legislature refused to receive it, and refused to receive it rightfully. So would this House under similar circumstances.

All I ask, Mr. Speaker, this State having been called for resolutions of its State Legislature and those resolutions having been presented, that the rules of the House shall resume their power and the members of this House shall have the right to say whether those resolutions shall be considered or not. Gentlemen can vote as they please, to consider or not, and if they vote to receive and consider them that ends the question, and of course they will be referred.

On that question of the right to consider, the House should never under any circumstances surrender its privilege, because it is one which at some time may affect the honor and character not only of the House but every member of the House and every Department of the Government. It should not be surrendered under any circumstances whatever. If gentlemen on the other side of the House, or on this, think it should be presented then they should say it should be considered and when a majority of the House so decide of course no objection could be made to its reference. If on the contrary the majority think it ought not to be considered then they will say it ought not to be considered. It does not belong here under any privilege whatever.

Mr. COX, of New York. But I desire to say in response to the gentleman from Massachusetts, who forgets this is a peculiar Monday morning hour in which there are certain rights and privileges—

Mr. BANKS. I do not forget anything about it.

Mr. COX, of New York. Yes, sir; I think he does. The rule says that bills for reference—bills for reference only and without debate not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider—for reference and printing only.

When introduced they have to go in that direction. They cannot go otherwise. When introduced they have to be referred and printed, and a motion made to that effect is now pending. More than that, this rule has been interpreted that even a unanimous request by the House for the transaction of any other business, to wit, any other than for reference and printing the joint resolution, shall not be in order—shall not be entertained by the Speaker. The rule is express; it is a rule which has been unchanged and unchangeable.

So far as the right of petition is concerned, this is in one sense a memorial from the sovereign State of Maryland in decorous terms, which comes as a petition under the provisions of the Constitution of the United States as the right of the people to petition the Government for redress of grievances. It is not for me to argue what the grievance is, for under the law this is to be considered without debate as to the subject-matter of the memorial.

One thing is sure, Mr. Speaker, that there is only one question to be considered, the question of reference and printing in the Monday morning hour. Gentlemen forget the old tradition of their party in reference to the right of petition. They forget when John Quincy Adams presented a petition from the State of Massachusetts, gentlemen on the other side undertook to compel its reception and reference—a petition for the dissolution of the Union. It was opposed on this side of the House, but the right of petition has been vindicated by time, by reason, and by patriotism. That will be conceded by all. Here is a larger right than an ordinary right of petition, the right of a sovereign State to present its grievance. They present it here under the rule fixing the right to present it for reference and printing only. That is the only question, as the Speaker has well decided, which we can now consider.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say but one or two words more. In part I agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts, and also with the gentleman from Ohio, as well as with the Chair; but, sir, I hold it to be unquestionable as parliamentary law in all legislative bodies that when any matter is presented the question may be raised, not "Shall it be considered?" (under the forty-first rule, as the gentleman from Massachusetts argues), but "Shall it be entertained?" "Shall it be received?" "Shall it be rejected?" For these forms of putting it are all equivalent. The question of consideration under the forty-first rule is of a totally different nature. That relates to our ordinary business. It relates to matter before the House under leave, and amounts to this and this only, whether the House will then take it up, then consider it, and deliberate on it, act on it, or lay it upon the table, refer it, or make any other disposition of it. That is what the forty-first rule provides for. But anterior and antecedent to all this stands the great parliamentary principle that every deliberative body when any matter is presented has a right to say, "We will not receive it," "We will not entertain it;" that is the order, or "we reject it." The question that the gentleman from Ohio raised is equivalent to this: "We will reject it," the House "will not entertain it;" that is what the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] means, I suppose. Instead of the question under the forty-first rule, "Will the House consider it?" he means the great parliamentary question "Will the House entertain it?"

Mr. BANKS. No, sir.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. But he claims it under the forty-first rule.

Mr. BANKS. If the gentleman from Georgia will allow me I wish to say my position is this: that the Rule 130 in regard to receiving resolutions from State Legislatures appoints a time when they shall be in order. A member from the State of Maryland has presented a resolution from that State. That is his right under the Constitution. Then the House has a right to say whether it will receive it or not, and at that precise moment the objection was made to its reception. It is impossible that individuals or popular bodies can have the right to present here anything that they please independent of the will or right of the House to receive it. The petitions to which the gentleman from Georgia and the gentleman from New York refer were those presented in a proper manner asking for proper legislation under the Constitution. This is no petition. This is a resolution. They were received and laid on the table; never were referred. In this case there is nothing that obliges us to receive this resolution.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The gentleman from Massachusetts certainly did not understand me. We do not disagree. I say that it is the right of every parliamentary body at the initiative step—at the threshold—when a question is presented, memorial, petition, bill, or anything else, to say whether they will receive it or not. That is my position. But I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts to contend that the position he takes is justified by the forty-first rule. He raises the question of consideration. I say the question should be entertainment, not under the forty-first rule, but under the higher parliamentary law.

Mr. BANKS. I assent to that perfectly.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The forty-first rule simply means that the House shall have the right to decide "Will we act upon the measure now?" But the question now raised is, will the House entertain it or will the House reject it? This is not under the forty-first rule. I maintain that it is the right of this House now to say whether they will reject this State resolution or any other petition or not. That is the fundamental principle of all parliamentary law. All these discussions in years gone by, to which reference has been made, related to this question of the reception or rejection of petitions. The right to send in the petition is not disputed, but the right of Congress to refuse to receive and entertain it was maintained. The only practical question involved was as to the policy of exercising that right. The questions as to the right to petition or of the right to receive or reject are in no way impaired by our rules. These principles underlie them. They are all founded upon them.

No deliberative body could exist without this right; just as you turn out a man obtruding himself at that door. This is inherent in the rights of self-organization and self-protection, belonging to every such body. It should be discreetly, prudently, wisely, and patriotically exercised.

The grand mistake of those who contended against the policy of receiving petitions of a certain character was discovered when it was too late. The great right of the American people to petition and have their petitions received on all subjects is now settled, I think, as the best policy. The power to reject, however, still exists.

Now, sir, this House to-day has got the right to reject this memorial from Maryland if they see fit. But is it wise? Is it judicious? Ought not a State of this Union to have a hearing? Ought not the petition to be referred to a committee? This country will say "yes," and it would be a great error if this House were to say "no."

Mr. COX, of New York. I desire to state to the gentleman from Georgia that the rule in regard to the rejection of bills does not apply to the rejection of memorials.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from Georgia through?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Not yet.

Mr. COX, of New York. The rule that applies to rejection of a measure relates to bills only. I wish to ask my friend from Georgia a question. Hearing him a little indistinctly I understood him to contend that the House in the morning hour has a general parliamentary right to reject a memorial of this nature by a motion to reject.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I hold that in any hour, morning hour, evening hour—any time when a question of a bill, memorial, petition, or anything of the kind is presented to this House, which they do not intend to entertain, the question can be raised and a vote taken to reject it. The question raised may be "Will the House entertain?" or "Shall this bill or proposition be rejected." These are equivalent modes of stating the same thing. The motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] is tantamount to the same thing, though not expressed in the same words. The motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] as he now modifies it is non-parliamentary in form, or at least I view it in that light. If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] means not to reject the resolution, but simply not to refer it, it seems to me he should rather move to lay it on the table. The House can do this if it sees fit so to do. But again I ask is it wise to do so? Is it fit and proper action on so great a question raised by one of the States of the Union? I think not. Let the matter be referred to the Judiciary Committee, and let such a report be made upon it as will maintain the dignity of this body and the stability of our free institutions.

Mr. COX, of New York. If the gentleman will read the rule on that subject he will find—

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to say to the gentleman from New York that at two o'clock this proceeding will be interrupted by the business of the District of Columbia Committee; and the Chair would like to submit a few words if possible.

Mr. COX, of New York. The rule provides that bills only shall be open to the motion to reject, not memorials in the Monday morning hour. Under the Constitution a State, like a person, has a right to petition; but we have the right to direct the mode in which, and the time when, that petition shall be laid before the House.

Mr. CONGER. Will the gentleman tell us what there is in the Constitution which gives the right of petition to State Legislatures?

Mr. COX, of New York. This is in the nature of a petition because it is in fact a memorial from a State Legislature.

Mr. BANKS. It is no petition.

Mr. COX, of New York. It was brought to the attention of the House at the request of the Legislature of Maryland.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I claim the floor.

Mr. YEATES. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] has the right to conclude his remarks.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] relies upon Rule 41, in regard to the declaration of the right of petition.

Mr. BANKS. No, my position is that under the one hundred and thirtieth rule the right is exhausted when the State has been called. That is all that it provides for. If the House receives it other proceedings can take place; but if, as the gentleman from Georgia suggested, the House refuses to receive it or rejects it, then the proceeding is closed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from Massachusetts to claim the right of the House to consider the question.

Mr. BANKS. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. And the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] referred to Rule 41 as establishing that right. In regard to that point the Chair agrees with the gentleman from Georgia, that that rule does not cover this case; that that rule, which was anterior in date of adoption to Rule 130, refers to the consideration of a subject and the means of proceeding to its disposition. The gentleman from Georgia drew a line of demarcation between the right to consider and the right to receive. Now, under Rule 130, which directs the Chair as to the order of procedure in the morning hour of Monday, within which we are acting, it is authorized that communications of this character from State Legislatures may be received and presented for reference and printing.

The Chair thinks that the inherent right alluded to by the gentleman from Georgia as existing in every legislative body is realized by the body in case they should refuse to refer. For a refusal to refer is in effect equivalent to an adverse expression. Now, the gentleman from Massachusetts forgets, and perhaps many members of the House forget, that this subject has already gone to the Judiciary Committee in another form by a bill introduced by another member from Maryland, which bill preceded this memorial from the State Legislature. This communication from the State Legislature is a respectful communication upon a subject of vast importance, and it is due that it should have proper reference, and the Chair thinks that the rule properly provides for such reference.

The gentleman from Massachusetts undertakes to prove by a supposititious case that a communication might come here disrespectful in terms or that charged a member of this House with crime, or of like character. The Chair would remind the gentleman from Massachusetts that this is not such a case as the one he indicates. You can attempt to establish any fact or to diminish any course of reasoning by similes, but there is no such predicament as that in this case. Here is a respectful communication, and the rule provides for its reference, and if the House refuses to vote in favor of its reference, the Chair thinks, as already said, that a negative of a motion to refer is equivalent to an adverse expression.

Mr. GARFIELD. I then demand the vote upon the motion to refer. Mr. COX, of Ohio. In regard to the effect of the rule, while I agree in most respects with the statement of the Speaker, there are others in which I cannot agree with him, and I am unwilling to have my vote recorded without making the distinction. I believe that under our rules when a memorial or petition is read from the Clerk's desk the right of the party or body presenting it to this House is then fully accomplished, and if no member makes any motion it simply goes to the table of the House. After that time we have a right to consider it in accordance with our own rules. I therefore wish to be understood as urging that when a petition or memorial is read every right that the party or body sending it can ask for is fully given. The House has respectfully heard it, and the action upon it is then just as respectful if contrary to its request as if given in its favor.

The SPEAKER. Yet the rule states that such memorials may be presented for reference and printing.

Mr. COX, of Ohio. That is for the House to determine. I do not believe that it is bound to refer; but it has its choice, to refer or to let the paper go to the table of the House.

Mr. HENDEE. I call for the regular order.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I believe I have still the floor. I have not yielded it.

The SPEAKER. The hour of two o'clock has arrived, the time in which the Committee for the District of Columbia is entitled to the floor, and the matter goes over until the end of the day.

Mr. CARLISLE. Was not unanimous consent given that the call should continue until all the States had been called?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think it was intended to be extended to the exclusion of the business of the District.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill introduced by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. KIMMEL] in regard to this same subject was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I should have resisted it when it was offered if I had been in the Hall.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot entertain that motion at this time.

Mr. CARLISLE. It would be in the face of the rule itself, which says that bills referred during the morning hour under the call of the States shall not be called back under a motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio will see that the bill would be brought back under a motion to reconsider.

Mr. GARFIELD. This does not bring it back. It is simply a motion to reconsider the vote by which it was referred, so as to prevent its being referred at all.

The SPEAKER. That would bring the bill back before the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. If we can have a vote on the motion to refer this paper—

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. No. 3740) to provide for deficiencies in the appropriation for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, and for prior years, and for other purposes, which has been returned from the Senate with sundry amendments, be printed for the use of the House with the Senate amendments numbered in their order.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. YEATES. I believe the regular order has been called for. The SPEAKER. The regular order has been called for. Two o'clock having arrived, the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. HENDEE], to call up for consideration business from the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PHILLIPS. On Monday last the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] introduced a bill upon which he moved a suspension of the rules. That bill comes over to-day as unfinished business.

The SPEAKER. That will be in order after the business of the District of Columbia Committee shall have been disposed of.

Mr. HENDEE. I desire to make a request of the House and ask that order be restored so that it can be heard by members. [After a pause.] I desire to state to the House that the Committee for the District of Columbia have a large amount of business to present. They have been considering for some weeks past very many important and essential bills, and they are now ready to present them.

The bill known as the bill for the government of the District of Columbia is yet undisposed of. That bill the committee consider to be of much greater importance than any other bill which they have prepared and are now ready to report. Under the circumstances, I have been directed by the committee to ask consent of the House that Friday evening of this week from half past seven o'clock be set apart for the consideration of bills to be reported by the Committee for the District of Columbia, not including the one for the government of the District. If that request shall be granted, the committee will then ask the House to proceed at once to the consideration of the bill for the government of the District of Columbia, which they have no doubt can be disposed of before the close of the session to-day.

If that request is granted, then the District government bill will be out of the way of a great many important bills now being pressed by other committees of this House. I hope that the request for an evening session on Friday next will be granted. We have now business prepared for at least three days of the session, and we have but one day in each month for its consideration by the House. We shall not be able without some such arrangement to complete the necessary business for this District during this session of Congress. But with an evening session on Friday next we are confident that we can put the business of the District in proper shape and at the same time get out of the way of the bill for the government of the District.

Mr. BANNING. We already have four evening sessions ordered for this week.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. HENDEE] that Friday evening of this week, from half past seven o'clock, be set apart for the consideration of business reported from the Committee for the District of Columbia?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

GOVERNMENT FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HENDEE. I now call up, by direction of the Committee for the District of Columbia, the bill (H. R. No. 3259) providing a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia. I move that the House now proceed to consider it under the five-minute rule, and that all general debate upon the bill be now closed.

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. I must object to that. This District bill has very important matters in it.

Mr. HENDEE. The gentleman can have time enough under the five-minute rule.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I want some time myself. I think it would be better to let general debate proceed for an hour longer.

The SPEAKER. The bill is now in the House as in Committee of the Whole, and the question is upon the motion to proceed to its consideration under the five-minute rule.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HALE.) The House now resumes the consideration of House bill No. 3259, providing a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia. By order of the House the bill will now be considered under the five-minute rule.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I rise to a question of order. When the House last had this bill under consideration I was awarded the floor, and in contemplation of law and of the rules of the House I am on the floor now. I claim the right to use at least my five minutes before the reading of the bill is commenced.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. By order of the House made this morning, all general debate upon this bill has been terminated, and it is now to be considered by clauses under the five-minute rule. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from New York [Mr. TOWNSEND] when the Clerk has read the first paragraph of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That all that portion of the territory of the United States which was ceded by the State of Maryland for the permanent seat of the Federal Government shall continue to be designated as the District of Columbia. Said District, and property and persons that may be therein, shall be subject to the following provisions and for the government of the same, and also to any existing laws applicable thereto not hereby repealed or inconsistent with the provisions of this act.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I move to strike out the last word of the paragraph just read. In the five minutes allowed me I will not be able to state my objections in full to this bill; I can scarcely do more than hint at them.

Mr. HENDEE. I will yield to you another five minutes.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. My first objection to this bill, and I speak of the section just read as a part of it, is that for the first time in recent legislation the proposition is made to require a property qualification for a public officer. By the sixth section of this bill no person can be a member of the council of the District of Columbia unless he possesses property of the value of $3,000.

My second objection to the bill is, that it requires that a person to be such member of the council must have resided in the District of Columbia for the period of five years. That proposition I believe to be entirely unwise and preposterous.

My third objection to the bill is, that it requires that voters in this District must have resided here for the period of three years. So far as I know, there is not any place in any State in this country where a residence of three years is required in order to entitle a person to vote. There would seem to be a desire in regard to this bill to be repressive, to prevent popular action. If we are not to establish a form of government in this District which shall in some degree be popular, we might just as well allow the present state of things to exist.

There is another objection which I have to this bill, and that is that it provides that no person shall be allowed to vote unless he shall have paid his poll tax. I do not believe that the payment of any tax should be a prerequisite to voting.

I do not believe that the possession of wealth presumptively makes a better citizen than the non-possession of wealth. Wealth is a very excellent thing, and I certainly do not stand up here to disparage its benefits to the possessor or the benefits which its possession in the case of some citizens confers upon the Union. But my observation, through a life now somewhat protracted, has been that the men not possessing wealth were as faithful and as considerate in time of peace and as patriotic in time of war as the millionaires of the country. I believe that in the city of Washington there is no exception to my general rule of observation. Upon the whole my belief is that strictly popular government is the best form of government existing or that can exist.

Our experience in the city of New York in allowing the whole power of the city of New York to rest in the hands of four men has ended most disastrously, and I believe that whatever may be said of the population of that city in the way of declamation, the people of the city of New York if allowed the power of self-government would have saved nineteen-twentieths of all the money that was drawn from the coffers of that city under the reign of the four-men power.

One provision of the bill has my most hearty assent; that is, the provision for the payment of the debts of the District. We cannot without injury to the whole United States refuse to provide for the debt of the District of Columbia. When men propose now to work for this District they consider that they are to be paid in bonds bearing interest at the rate of 3.65 per cent.; and consequently they propose for the work they are to do a charge greater by 20 per cent. than they would propose were they to be paid in money—greenbacks, silver, gold, or any sort of money. The United States, as the half owner of the property in the District of Columbia, are in this way losing 10 per cent.

But that is not all. The men who do work and acquire the right to be paid under the District of Columbia have now come to understand that they are to wait as beggars at the door of Congress, day after day, month after month, year after year, before they can obtain their pay. Accordingly, in point of fact, in the work done in this District we obtain only about sixty cents in value for every dollar we have to pay. When the United States and the District of Columbia come to pay the District debts as other debts are paid, we shall get in the work that is done one hundred cents on the dollar.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HENDEE obtained the floor, and yielded his time to Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. There is but little more I desire to say. We should not make a mistake as to the position which the Government occupies in regard to the District of Columbia. One gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSEND] says that the debt of this District is larger per capita than the debt of any other city in the Union; that this debt rests upon one hundred and thirty thousand, one hundred and forty thousand, or at the most one hundred and fifty thousand people. This is true in one sense; but there is another and an important sense in which the number of debtors is much larger. There is an important sense in which this debt of the District of Columbia rests upon forty-five millions of people. Sir, we must not disguise from ourselves the fact that this city has to do its work in an expensive manner because we are here, because the nation is represented here, because the Government property is here, because the nation must here either be respectable or be disgraced. These streets would never have been what they are but because they lead to and from the White House and the Capitol.

Now whatever be said in regard to the management of District affairs in the past, of which I have no knowledge personally, this city has to-day the handsomest streets that ever existed in any capital in Europe, Asia, or America down to the present day. There never was a city that lay so well upon the ground as this city of Washington to-day. I submit that gentlemen here should tell their constituents at home that we as a nation cannot afford to go back to the state of things which existed in the city of Washington before the late improvements were made. Is there a man in this House who would desire to see Pennsylvania avenue and other important streets of Washington in the condition in which they were at the close of the war or during the war or before the war, or to see the old canal, that festering source of miasma, fever, and death, standing here with all its foul exhalations?

Now, it is true that this city is in debt nominally to a very large amount. Perhaps there has been extravagance, but it is passed.

If we wish to bear our one-half of the expenses of the District of Columbia for the future we must let it be understood that when a party contracts to do the work for this city somebody will pay. Take the cities which do not pay to-day: on what terms can they bargain? Take an individual who does not pay: upon what terms can he bargain? We must, for the interest of the country, in some way shake off this debt and shake it off to the honor of the country, not to its disgrace.

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I think there is great danger, for two obvious reasons, that hasty action will be had on this important proposition. The first is that those who live in this city are so anxious to get rid of the indebtedness now existing and to fix the annual proportion of the expense of the Government that they are willing to accept any sort of government for the District of Columbia, and the other reason is that those who hold the indebtedness against the city are so anxious to have the Government assume its proportion of the debt existing and the expenses for the city annually hereafter that they are willing to force upon the city any sort of government. We are liable, therefore, being pressed by the two classes to whom I have referred, to adopt a government which will not be satisfactory to ourselves and not be in accordance with the idea of government we have always entertained, but, on the contrary, will be a disgrace to the country.

Now, sir, I allude to this for this reason: the former commission, which was appointed in the Forty-fourth Congress for the purpose of adjusting this question, in their report presented to the House, in fixing the proportion of indebtedness, came to the conclusion that 40 per cent. was about the fair proportion to be borne by the General Government. This bill, however, doubtless under the persuasion of the committee of one hundred citizens, provides that the United States Government shall assume one-half, or 50 per cent., of the indebtedness. The difference is this: the indebtedness is $25,000,000, and therefore this bill proposes to saddle on the General Government $2,500,000 more of indebtedness than the commission that had the subject fully under consideration during the Forty-fourth Congress, and since considered the fair proportion to be assumed by the General Government. And, in the next place, the difference between the 40 per cent. recommended by the commission which investigated the subject and that proposed by this bill will amount to $300,000 annually more than the committee of the Forty-fourth Congress considered the fair proportion of the General Government.

Therefore, I say, Mr. Speaker, that the assumption of debt and expenses made by the General Government of this bill is so much greater than was ever before proposed that it causes the people of this District to disregard the character of government forced on them; and causes in the second place those who are anxious to have the debt assumed by the General Government not to care at all about the character or form of government to be established for this District. It is not my purpose to discuss in detail all the objectionable features of the bill under consideration. The second section, which provides for the selection of the commissioners, one by the President, one by the Senate, and one by the House of Representatives, presents a grave constitutional question, most intensely interesting to those who are fond of legal inquiry, and is one that should be carefully considered. This question engaged the attention of the select committee upon the form of government for the District of Columbia appointed by the Forty-fourth Congress. We are informed by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] that this commission took the opinions of eminent counsel on this subject. This fact and the fact that the commission itself had among its members men "learned in the law" adds great weight to their report, but I am not prepared to accept without question their conclusion. The commission set forth in their report the authority upon which they base their opinion, and a careful examination of this authority satisfies me that it is not at all conclusive that the mode of appointment of the commission as proposed by the second section of this bill is constitutional. The whole argument in favor of the constitutionality of this measure is based upon the language of the judge in a Pennsylvania authority cited in the report of the committee and presented to the House the other day by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] when my colleague [Mr. COX] had the floor, in the following language:

The constitution of Pennsylvania, in force in 1817, provided "that the governor shall appoint all officers whose offices are established by the constitution or shall be established by law, and whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for." The court in construing this article of the constitution of that State, in the case of Lieinan vs. Sutherland, (3 Sergeant and Rawle, 149,) used the following language: "The word office is of very vague and indefinite import. Everything concerning the administration of justice, or the general interest of society, may be supposed to be within the meaning of the constitution, especially if fees or emoluments are annexed to the office. But there are matters of temporary and local concern which, although comprehended in the term office, have not been thought to be embraced by the constitution. And when offices of that kind have been created, the Legislature have sometimes made the appointment in the law which created them, sometimes giving the appointment to the governor, and sometimes given the power of removal to others, although the appointment was left to the governor. The officers of whom I am speaking are often described in acts of Assembly by the name of commissioners—such, for instance, as are employed in laying out roads and canals and other works of a public nature. Yet all these perform a duty, or, in other words, exercise an office. So, likewise, officers within the limit of a corporation are generally appointed by the corporation unless they concern the administration of justice." The opinion from which I have just quoted was delivered by Chief-Justice Tilghman, and concurred in by Gibson and Duncan.

The citation is only the language of the judge and is merely "obiter dictum." The decision in the case turned upon the point whether the Legislature could prescribe the manner in which the governor should exercise the appointing power. Upon carefully examining this case it will be found the facts were that a Dr. Sutherland, as the relation of Dr. Lieman (both of whom claimed the position of lazaretto physician under the board of health of Philadelphia) was called upon in proceedings in quo warranto before the supreme court to show by what authority he exercised the office. His answer, which was sustained by the court, was in substance that he was appointed by the governor under the act of the Legislature of 1803, by virtue of which a board of health was established; that its members were, by the act, to be appointed by the governor, and that the act provided that the governor could only remove the physician on complaint of a majority of the board of health; that his time had not expired and that he had not been removed in the manner required by the law, and that until he was so removed the governor could not appoint his successor, and that in fact the new act of the Legislature had placed the power of appointment in the board of health of Philadelphia, and the law provided that the removal should only take place on request of a majority of the board of health, but the governor undertook to supersede Dr. Sutherland without any such request being made by the board of health. The point of the decision was that the Legislature might prescribe the manner in which the power of removal should be exercised by the governor. This was the only point necessary to decide the case and to that extent it is good law, but so far as the language of the judge goes beyond that it is obiter dictum and not decisive. In the "dictum" it will be observed the judge says "that everything concerning the general interests of society may be supposed to be within the meaning of the constitution, especially if fees or emoluments are attached to the office." And he speaks of matters that are of temporary and local concern as not being included in the term office. A board of commissioners was established in our State (Ohio) at one time who were authorized to appoint commissioners of the state-house and directors of the penitentiary. In deciding the case the judge defines what is an office, and his definition is so apt that I quote it entire:

What is an office? Among lexicographers, Webster defines the word to signify "a particular duty, charge, or trust conferred by public authority and for a public purpose." In a case in 20 John Rep. 492, Plat. J., delivering the opinion of the court, defines the legal meaning of the word to be "an employment on behalf of the government, in any station of public trust, not merely transient, occasional, or incidental."

This bill confers a public duty, charge, and trust upon the commissioners, conferred by Congress for public purposes of a weighty and important character that belong to Congress. In the language of the court in the case referred to, "their duties, their charge, and trust, are not transient, occasional, or incidental, but durable, permanent, and continuous." The court in the Pennsylvania case do say that the new law that took from the governor the power to appoint a lazaretto physician for the port of Philadelphia and conferred it on the board of health is constitutional. That is a very different question from an exercise of the appointing power by the Legislature or an attempt to confer appointing power on one of its own branches. The power to confer appointing power upon a board of health might be constitutional while an appointment made by the Legislature itself would be wholly unconstitutional. The former is to regulate it, the latter to exercise it.

In the Pennsylvania case cited by the committee the judge in the language used confounded the distinction between the authority to determine the manner in which an appointment may be made and the authority by which it may be made and making the appointment itself. Among the first principles law students are expected to learn is the distinction between legislative, executive, and judicial power. By legislative power laws are made, by judicial power laws are construed, and by executive power laws are administered or executed. Our Constitution, article 2, section 1, by its terms vests the executive power in the President:

The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America.

It is equally explicit as to the judicial, article 3, section 1:

The judicial power of the United States, shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish.

And article 1, section 1, provides that—

All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, &c.

The modifications of this clear and distinct division of powers are such only as are provided for in the Constitution itself, such as that each House shall choose its own officers and be the judges of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, and that the Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments, &c. Aside from these modifications, provided for in the instrument itself by express provisions, I maintain these divisions of power are absolute. The power to direct who shall do an act and the manner in which it shall be performed and the power to do the act itself are not, legally speaking, one and the same thing. The one is legislative and the other executive. This distinction was clearly stated and was the turning-point in the case in the supreme court of Ohio to which I have already referred. I allude to the case of The State against Kenner et al., 7 Ohio State. The facts in the case were as follows: in 1858 the Legislature of Ohio (being democratic and the governor republican) sought, by the establishment of a commission similar to the one proposed by this bill, to take from the governor certain appointments. They passed two acts: one entitled "An act to provide for the more expeditious completion of the new State-house," &c., and the other "An act providing for the appointment and more thorough system of accountability of officers of the Ohio penitentiary, fixing their compensation, prescribing their duties, and determining the manner of working convicts." These acts constituted three persons, therein named, a commission to finish the work on the State-house, and, among other duties, gave them authority to appoint three directors of the Ohio penitentiary. An information was filed against the members of the commission, and they were brought before the supreme court by proceedings in the nature of quo warranto. The constitution of Ohio in express terms denies appointing power to the General Assembly; but, in pronouncing the judgment of the court that the law was unconstitutional, Judge Brinkerhoff, in drawing the distinction between the power to determine the manner and to make an appointment, said:

That they are not identical or equivalent to each other is too clear for argument, and almost too clear to admit of illustration. To prescribe the manner of election or appointment to an office is an ordinary legislative function. To make an appointment to office is an administrative function; and, under a constitution in which the philosophical theory of a division of the powers of government into legislative, executive, and judicial should be exactly carried out in detail, the power of prescribing the manner of making appointments to office would fall naturally and properly to the legislative department, while the power to make the appointments themselves would fall as naturally and properly to the executive department.

It is clear that directing by law the manner in which an appointment may be made and making an appointment are the exercise of two different and distinct powers: the one prescribing how the act may be done is legislative and the other, doing the act, is executive or administrative. Article 1, section 8, clause 17, of the Constitution authorizes Congress—

To exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever, over such district (not exceeding ten miles square) as may, by cession of particular States, and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of the Government of the United States, and to exercise like authority over all places purchased by the consent of the Legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock-yards, and other needful buildings.

It is not claimed by the committee that there is any authority for the appointment of the commissioners as provided in this bill other than is conferred upon Congress in the clause just quoted. I agree with the Judiciary Committee of the Forty-third Congress, that this clause of the Constitution vests in Congress the authority to do whatever may be done under or is embraced in the exercise of legislative power, but what I claim is, there is no grant in the Constitution of administrative power to Congress and that to fill offices by appointment is an administrative duty not included in a grant of legislative power. Congress under this clause can create offices, provide for commissioners, grant municipal rights to the people of the District of Columbia, and provide the manner in which the appointments may be made, for all this is within the scope of legislative power, but the appointments to fill these offices is an administrative power, no matter whether they are United States officers or municipal officers, and has nowhere in the Constitution been conferred upon Congress. The Government of the United States is one of enumerated powers and in the Constitution must be found a grant for the exercise of every power it assumes. The difference between the Constitution of the United States and those of the several States laid down by Colley in his Constitutional Limitations is that under the Constitution of the United States Congress can claim no power not expressly granted or given by necessary implication, while the State constitutions only impose restrictions upon the powers the States inherently possess. A prohibition in a State constitution, according to this principle, leaves the Legislature of the State in the same condition as to the power of exercising the appointing power of municipal or corporate officers that Congress is in under the Constitution in the absence of a grant of power either specific or by necessary implication. Where, I ask, then, in the Constitution is administrative power conferred upon Congress to appoint by their own act these commissioners?

I maintain that the commissioners are under the provisions of this bill inferior officers of the United States, and, if so, it will not be claimed by the committee, as I understand the tenor of their report, or by any one else, that they can be appointed in any other way except as provided in that part of section 2, article 2, of the Constitution, which reads as follows:

He [the President] shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur, and he shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law; but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments.

These commissioners must come under the class of inferior officers, or the Constitution does not warrant Congress in authorizing the President alone to appoint or designate one of them, as is proposed in this bill, and if they do come under this class of officers, then the Constitution having pointed out or designated the method of appointment Congress cannot authorize it to be done in any other way. "Expressio unius est exclusio alterius." We cannot call them inferior officers of the United States so as to authorize the President alone to designate one of them, and then claim they are not such inferior officers so as to authorize the Senate and House to designate the others.

They must be appointed by the President, by and with the advice of the Senate, or if Congress choose it may by law be authorized to be done by the President alone, by the courts of law, or the heads of Departments. That these commissioners are officers of the United States further appears from the fact that they represent the authority and power of the General Government. They exercise political functions and powers that are derived not from the people of the District of Columbia but from the Congress of the United States. The act makes them a public tribunal to aid in representing and acting for the General Government in the execution of the public trust of governing the District of Columbia; a trust in which the people of the District have no constitutional or legal right to participate, only in so far as such right may be granted or delegated to them by act of Congress. Their office is established by the law of the United States; their duties are all prescribed by the laws of the United States; they are not responsible to any other power but the United States; they are required to give bonds to the United States in the sum of $50,000 for the faithful performance of their duties; their salaries ($5,000 each for two of them) are paid by the United States; the United States is responsible for their acts and contracts, and in short all their duties are to be performed under the direction and control of Congress for the benefit of the people of the District of Columbia. If we pass this bill, instead of establishing a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia we will have one that can probably be upset by proceedings in "quo warranto" in the Supreme Court of the United States in less than sixty days after it is inaugurated.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. McCOOK. I will take the floor and yield my time to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. There are other features of this bill that I do not like. I dislike the idea of appointing any of these commissioners. The security provided for is a bond to be executed by the commissioners and the oath to be taken, and with this safeguard I think we might with propriety let the people from such men as can qualify select the men of their own choice. The property qualification is to my mind odious. It assumes that a man worth $3,000 is better than a man worth nothing; and, to follow out the assumption, a man worth $6,000 would be better still; and, I suppose, if a man should be worth $3,000 to render him fit for position in a town council, to be a commissioner he ought to be worth $6,000, to be a member of a Legislature $12,000, and so on until to be a Congressman he ought to be worth at least $100,000, and that anything below a million would be entirely too small a sum for a Senator or President. The whole thing is wrong in principle, and to the lovers of political equality odious. David Paul Brown maintained that pecuniary competency was not necessary to human happiness, and that to admit it would destroy the lofty character of man, and said "that a dollar more or less should exercise any influence upon his position, as rightly understood, is to make him the meanest instead of the noblest of God's creatures." We are getting too many men in this country that are ready to repudiate the doctrine that "all mankind are created free and equal." I believe in the elective system, the fundamental idea of which is perfect political equality. That "governments derived their just powers from the consent of the governed" is a golden nugget of political wisdom that ought not to be disregarded even in the government of a municipality, and the principle that lies at the basis of our ideas of government is the absolute and perfect political equality of all citizens; and the establishment of the doctrine that a man must be worth a certain amount of property to entitle him to hold office is so utterly at variance with everything we have been taught on this subject that we ought never to consent to any measure that embraces such a feature. We have always accepted the elementary theory laid down in every elementary treatise on the subject that all are politically equal, and this is wholly at variance with the idea of a property qualification. We have likewise hitherto accepted the doctrine that the majority should govern, which embraces the idea so often repeated that the knowledge and wisdom of the greater number are superior to the knowledge and wisdom of any smaller number of the same community or body of men, and that whatever is done or resolved upon by the greater number must necessarily possess the quality of justice in a higher degree than the act or resolution of any smaller number would likely possess.

This is asserted to be not only an elementary principle but a maxim of free government. The elementary writers assert this principle as the common sense of mankind and as the only solid foundation of all popular government. Equality is the law of heaven, and, so far as government is concerned, it should be the law of earth. I know some effort is made now and then to disturb public confidence in this old idea of republican government. The proposition, however, to introduce a property qualification in the selection of a city council by the Congress of the United States for the government of the nation's capital is the most serious and the most odious innovation that has been proposed for a long time, if ever before, in the history of this country. Here and there less objectionable attempts have been made to modify the rule of the majority by the introduction into the body-politic of cumulative voting and minority representation and other thimble-rigging arrangements, little less complicated than a problem in Euclid, to enable men to thrust themselves into public positions against the will of the majority of their fellow-citizens, but, as a general rule, such men are undesirable, if not dangerous, public servants; and if we wish to perpetuate our free institutions we must cultivate the love of liberty and defend the principle of universal political equality. I will vote for no measure of government, however desirable it may be in other respects, that conflicts with this doctrine; and I believe that the republican party, when it conferred the unrestricted, universal right of suffrage upon the colored race, and thus made them politically the equal of the proudest American citizens, won for itself the brightest star in its crown of glory.

Mr. HUNTON. If the position of the gentleman is correct, that the President alone has the power to appoint these officers in the government here provided for this District, I would like to know how he reconciles the law heretofore passed for the government of the District of Columbia with the Constitution, because he knows that heretofore Congress by legislative enactment authorized the people to designate the officers who were to govern this District, and if Congress can authorize them to do it cannot Congress do that which it authorized the people to do?

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. Very well, I will answer that. It is the very point in connection with which I desire to call attention to the case decided in Ohio. That is, that the power to authorize the people to make these appointments or the power to authorize the President to make them or the power to authorize anybody other than Congress to make them is a legislative power. But the filling of offices is an administrative act which is not embraced in the clause of the Constitution, which simply grants legislative power.

Mr. HUNTON. But the gentleman does not exactly catch my idea. I understand his objection to that section of the bill which gives to this House and to the Senate the power to appoint and the President to detail a third from the Army is that it is in violation of that clause of the Constitution which says the President may appoint.

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. I did not say that.

Mr. HUNTON. Then on what ground do you place the violation of the Constitution in this bill, which you allege?

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. I place it on the ground that by this bill Congress undertakes to make a new appointment, and I undertake to say Congress cannot make any appointment.

Mr. HUNTON. Why?

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. Because it has no appointing power. This is an administrative power which is not granted to Congress.

Mr. HUNTON. I beg your pardon. It is an act of legislative power.

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. I am contending that it is not legislative power.

Mr. HUNTON. Congress has the right to legislate, and this is not in conflict with the clause which gives the power of appointment; for Congress is supreme in this matter.

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. I have referred to the language of the supreme court of the State of Ohio in the case I have cited, where they draw the distinction between the legislative power and the executive power, putting that power which prescribes the manner or which determines who may make the appointment on the legislative side; but the power of appointment, the court clearly says, is not embraced in the broadest definition of legislative power. It is an executive or administrative duty that is not embraced in legislative power.

Now, the point I make is this, that we may do anything which is embraced in the legislative power; we may determine who shall make the appointment; we may do everything the elementary law-books define to be included within the term "legislative power." But that does not include, according to the decision I have referred to nor according to the books, the administrative power to fill the appointments.

Mr. HUNTON. The supreme court of Ohio?

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. Yes, sir; the supreme court of Ohio whose decision I have read.

Now, keeping in mind the distinction there laid down, the power of Congress to create the office and to prescribe the manner of making the appointments is clearly a legislative function. But when we say A, B, C, or D shall fill that office, that is clearly an executive function not embraced in the term legislative power.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LATHROP. Is this bill now open for amendment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. An amendment to the first section is pending.

Mr. LATHROP. I wish to offer an amendment to that section.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman can do so.

Mr. LATHROP. I offer the following amendment:

After the word "Government," in line 5, insert the words "including the river Potomac in its course through the District and the islands therein."

That is a part of the description of the District of Columbia as heretofore existing, and it seems to me that it should be included in this bill.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I think there will be no objection to that amendment.

Mr. HUNTON. It is wholly unnecessary.

Mr. HENDEE. I think it can do no harm.

Mr. HUNTON. There was recently a decision by the commission accurately settling the boundary between the States of Maryland and Virginia. The boundary, according to the decision of that commission, goes to low-water mark. All above low-water mark belongs to Virginia, and all below that belongs to Maryland.

Mr. HENDEE. Is that included in what was originally ceded by the State of Maryland?

Mr. HUNTON. The State of Maryland ceded all that portion of the District which runs to the Virginia line within the ten miles square; and that line of the State of Maryland has been recently determined by a convention between the two States to be at low-water mark on the other side of the river. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. HENDEE] will recollect when we were on the joint select committee in regard to the government of the District, Governor Whyte and myself had a talk on that subject, and we finally agreed that was the proper phraseology.

Mr. HENDEE. Then the language of the first section, in the opinion of the gentleman from Virginia, covers all the territory known as the District of Columbia.

Mr. HUNTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. LATHROP. Is it not better, then, to keep the statement of the boundaries as they have been heretofore described?

Mr. HUNTON. I think it might be that by attempting to determine this matter in the bill we should interfere with some of the details of the conventional settlements between the two States, and that is my objection to inserting the amendment in the bill. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. Whyte] and myself agreed upon this phraseology as properly describing the boundaries of the Territory ceded by the State of Maryland to the General Government.

Mr. LATHROP. When was that convention held?

Mr. HUNTON. The matter was finally settled in 1876, about the close of the year. Mr. Black, of Pennsylvania, was one of the commissioners, Senator Beck, of Kentucky, was another, and I think Mr. Graham, of North Carolina, was the third.

Mr. LATHROP. Had it not been claimed by Virginia, prior to that time, that it owned to the middle of the river?

Mr. HUNTON. No, sir; not to the middle of the river. The difficulty lay further down the river.

Mr. HENKLE. Near the Chesapeake Bay.

Mr. HUNTON. Yes, near the Chesapeake Bay and a few islands (this side of it; but that has been settled and there is no controversy between the two States of late.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question was taken on Mr. LATHROP's amendment; and, on a division, there were ayes 19, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the second section of the bill, as follows:

Sec. 2. That on the —, in the month of —, in the year 1878, there shall be elected or appointed, in the manner hereinafter directed, three persons, to be commissioners of the District of Columbia, who shall exercise all the powers and authority now vested in the commissioners of said District, except as hereinafter limited; shall be subject to all the restrictions and limitations which are now imposed upon said commissioners. One of the said commissioners shall be an officer of the Engineer Corps of the Army, whose lineal rank shall be above that of major, and shall be detailed by the President for the term of three years, and until his successor shall be appointed and qualified: Provided, That the officer so detailed shall not be assigned to any other duty, and that he shall receive no further compensation than his regular pay as an officer of the Army. The second of the said commissioners shall be elected by the House of Representatives, by ballot, for the term of three years, and until his successor shall be elected and qualified; and the third of the said commissioners shall be elected by the Senate, by ballot, for the term of three years, and until his successor is elected and qualified; and at the end of the several terms of each of the commissioners, their successors shall be elected or appointed, in the same manner, for the term of three years respectively, and until their successors are elected or appointed and qualified; the said election or appointment to be made on the —, in the month of —, in which the term of such commissioners shall expire: Provided, That at the first election of commissioners by the Senate and House of Representatives, as above provided, the terms of said commissioners so elected shall expire one, one year from the date of said election, and the other two years from the date of said election, the same to be determined by lot. Their successors shall be elected in the manner and for the term above prescribed. The two persons elected as commissioners by the House of Representatives and the Senate shall, at the time of their election, be citizens of the United States, and shall have been actual residents of the District of Columbia for ten years previous to their election, and who have, during that period, claimed no residence elsewhere; and if the place of any commissioner shall become vacant from any cause, or he shall neglect for twenty days to take the oath of office if he be elected by the Senate or House of Representatives, his place shall be filled forthwith, for the balance of his term, in the same manner as the person whose place is to be filled was elected or appointed; but if the person whose place so becomes vacant shall have been elected by the Senate or House of Representatives, and such vacancy shall occur not in session of Congress, then the said vacancy shall be filled by the appointment of the President, until the Senate or House of Representatives, as the case may be, shall elect a person to fill the said office for the balance of the term thereof. One of the said commissioners shall be chosen president of the board of commissioners at the first meeting thereof, and annually thereafter.

Mr. BRENTANO. I desire to offer an amendment to that section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee for the District of Columbia have reported sundry amendments to this section and they will first be voted upon.

The first amendment reported by the committee was to fill the blank in line 1 with the words "third Monday" and to fill the blank in line 2 with the word "April."

Mr. HUNTON. I desire to suggest that at this period of time the word "April" is too early a date, for this bill cannot pass and receive the approval of the President by the third Monday in April. I believe this is the third Monday in April and therefore the commissioners could not be appointed in time.

Mr. HENDEE. I was not aware that the committee had offered this amendment.

Mr. HUNTON. I suggest to the gentleman that he move to amend it.

Mr. CLAFLIN. I suggest that we put in the words "the third Monday in June."

Mr. HENDEE. I will move to strike out the word "April" and insert in lieu thereof the word "June," so that it will read: "that on the third Monday in the month of June in the year 1878 there shall be elected," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment reported by the committee was in line 11 to strike out the word "major" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "captain."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment reported by the committee was to insert in line 27 the words "third Monday" and in the same line to fill the blank space by inserting the word "February."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRENTANO. I offer the following amendment:

Strike out on pages 2, 3, and 4 all after the words "second section," and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That immediately after the passage of this act the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint three citizens of the United States, inhabitants of the District of Columbia, to be commissioners of the District of Columbia, who shall exercise all the powers and authority vested in the commissioners of said District, except as hereinafter limited, and who shall be subject to all restrictions and limitations which are now imposed upon said commissioners. One of the said commissioners so appointed by the President shall be chosen president of the board of commissioners at the first meeting thereof, and annually thereafter.

Mr. Speaker, my amendment does not propose any change in the government as provided for in the bill. It proposes not to change the mode of the appointment of the commissioners. While the bill proposes that one of said commissioners shall be detailed by the President from the Engineer Corps, and one shall be elected by the House of Representatives, and one shall be elected by the Senate, my amendment proposes that, in accordance with the prerogatives of the Executive of the United States, the President shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint these commissioners just as they are now at present appointed by the President of the United States. Another difference between my amendment and the original bill is that the President shall have the right to appoint any citizen of the United States who is an inhabitant of the District of Columbia, while the bill proposes that only such citizens shall be appointed or elected as have been actual residents of the District of Columbia for ten years previous to their election. My reasons for this amendment I have already stated in the remarks which I made when the bill was last before the House, and arise from constitutional doubts in regard to the right of the Senate and House of Representatives to elect such officers as can only be appointed under the Constitution by the President of the United States.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I was not prepared for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRENTANO] who is a member of the Committee for the District of Columbia. I thought that that committee had agreed to the bill as offered to the House. I trust that the amendment submitted by the gentleman will not be adopted, for if it is it simply changes the whole frame-work of the bill. Therefore, sir, I think that a majority of the Committee for the District of Columbia would be found opposed to the passage of the bill if the amendment were incorporated into it. I do not want to enter into an argument as to the constitutional power of Congress to elect these commissioners. I simply state the fact that the amendment changes the frame-work of the bill and would put the committee at loggerheads as to its passage. I yield now to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. HARTRIDGE.]

Mr. HARTRIDGE. I desire to say but a few words in reference to what seems to be a question of doubt in the minds of some gentlemen upon this floor, and that is as to the constitutional power of this Congress to designate in what manner these contemplated officers, these commissioners, shall be elected or appointed. Congress, it will not be denied, has the exclusive right to legislate over this District; but the question arises whether in the exercise of that exclusive right of legislation it has the power to designate who shall carry out the acts of that legislation.

I contend that the power to designate the officers who shall enforce and execute the laws made by Congress in reference to this District is as unlimited as the power itself to legislate over the District. If it be not so, then there must be some clause in the Constitution itself which inhibits Congress from thus designating how these officers shall be appointed. There is but one clause which would seem even to come in conflict with this power which I assume for Congress, and that is the second clause of the second section of the second article of the Constitution, as follows:

He (the President) shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law; but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments.

Now Congress seeks by this act, contemplating the appointment of commissioners as provided by this bill, to appoint these officers not in the mode pointed out by the clause of the Constitution which I have read. Therefore if the officers to be created by this act are, in the language of that section, "officers of the United States," then this section of this bill is unconstitutional. But if they be not "officers of the United States," then Congress, under its exclusive power of legislation over this District, has the right to designate the ministers of its legislation. I contend that the officers contemplated by this act as commissioners will not be officers of the United States; they are officers of the municipal corporation of the District of Columbia, created by Congress.

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HARTRIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. Why is it, then, that this bill requires that these officers are to give bonds to the United States for the faithful performance of their duties?

Mr. HARTRIDGE. Simply because Congress can make them give bond to any officer it pleases: to the Treasurer of the United States or to anybody else. But they are not officers of the United States, more than the officers of any other municipal corporation.

Before the war, when there was no necessity for this legislation of Congress, for thus taking charge directly of the affairs of this District, because of the now anomalous condition of its population—before the war there were three municipal corporations in the District of Columbia, each one created by Congress, the cities of Georgetown, Alexandria, and Washington, each presided over by an executive officer to enforce the laws, and that executive officer was never appointed by the President, either with or without the advice and consent of the Senate.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HUNTON. I will take the floor and yield my time to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. HARTRIDGE.]

Mr. HARTRIDGE. I thank the gentleman. Before the war the municipal officers were elected by the direction of Congress. After the war Congress saw fit to merge and bind together all these separate municipal corporations and make that into one great whole. They did that by the act of February 21, 1871, which declares that—

The District is created a government by the name of the District of Columbia, by which name it is constituted a body-corporate for municipal purposes, and may contract and be contracted with, sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, have a seal, and exercise all other powers of a municipal corporation not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States and the provisions of this title.

Congress created this whole District into a municipal corporation, in the place of the three separate and distinct municipal corporations which previously existed. And it now declares that the execution of the laws made by it for that municipal corporation may be exercised by commissioners which it appoints, as in the former days it appointed the officers of the three municipal corporations which then existed.

Nor is this any new idea, that this is a municipal corporation. It is as old as the time of the creation of the Government, as old as the contest over the framing of the Constitution and its adoption. I will read from Story on the Constitution, page 126:

They [the people of the District of Columbia] as yet possess no local legislature; and have, as yet, not desired to possess one. A learned commentator has doubted whether Congress can create such a legislature, because it is the delegation of a delegated authority. (1 Tucker's Black Comm., app., 272.) A very different opinion was expressed by the Federalist; for it was said that "a municipal legislature for local purposes, derived from their own suffrages, will of course be allowed them." (The Federalist, No. 43.) In point of fact, the corporations of the three cities within its limits possess and exercise a delegated power of legislation under their charters, granted by Congress, to the full extent of their municipal wants, without any constitutional scruple, or surmise, or doubt.

No one ever doubted after that the power of Congress to delegate to a municipal legislature the power to make laws. Now if it be but a municipal corporation, what prevents Congress from saying who shall execute the laws which it passes for this District and from declaring how the persons who execute those laws shall be appointed, whether by selection by Congress or by designation by some other power? I think it is clear that these officers are not "officers of the United States," in the sense of the Constitution; but in a more contracted sense they are simply officers of a municipal corporation which involves and includes this whole District, a corporation created by Congress under its power of exclusive legislation for this District. Under that power Congress has the right to designate any one to execute and carry out the laws which it makes under its exclusive power of legislation for this District.

The question was then taken upon the substitute offered by Mr. BRENTANO for section 2 of the bill; and upon a division there were—ayes 39, noes 59.

Before the result of this vote was announced,

Mr. JONES, of Ohio, said: No quorum has voted.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BRENTANO and Mr. BLACKBURN were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 56, noes 94.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. FINLEY. I offer the following amendment:

In section 2, after the word "commissioners," in line 8, strike out the following: One of said commissioners shall be an officer of the Engineer Corps of the Army, whose lineal rank shall be above that of captain, and who shall be detailed by the President for the term of three years, and until his successor shall be appointed and qualified.

And insert in lieu thereof as follows:

One of said commissioners shall be a competent, skilled engineer, who shall be appointed by the President from civil life, who shall hold his office for a term of three years, and until his successor shall be appointed and qualified.

I do not desire to antagonize this bill; but it occurs to me that there can be no reason why the commissioner to be appointed by the President should be detailed from the Army. The only reason I have heard suggested is that one of the commissioners should be an engineer in order that one member of the board might be competent to supervise the labors and understand the duties pertaining to the engineers to be appointed under the provisions of this bill. Now I see no reason, if it is found necessary that one of the commissioners shall be an engineer, why he should not be appointed by the President from civil life instead of being detailed from the regular Army. There are just as competent engineers in civil life as are to be found in the Army; and I think it really objectionable to detail an officer from his duties in the Army to perform service as a civil officer in the Government of the District of Columbia. It seems to me to be setting a bad precedent. I would like to hear any good reason suggested, if any exists, why the commissioner who is to be an engineer should not be appointed by the President from civil life rather than detailed from the Army.

Mr. WRIGHT. Does the amendment of the gentleman require that this commissioner shall be a citizen of the District?

Mr. FINLEY. That is elsewhere provided for in the bill.

Mr. WRIGHT. It is provided in regard to the other two commissioners; but I think not with regard to this commissioner who is to be an engineer.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HENDEE. I move to amend by inserting after the word "elsewhere," in the fortieth line, second page, the words "and shall each own property in his own right in said district, the assessed value of each shall be at least $5,000." I will state my object in offering this amendment. It is provided in a later part of the bill that each member of the council shall be required to own property to the amount of $3,000. It seems to me just as essential that the commissioners selected from the District should have some property qualifications, which in this amendment I propose to fix at the sum of $5,000.

Mr. CLYMER. That is right.

Mr. HUNTON. So far as I have ascertained the sense of the Committee for the District of Columbia it is favorable to this amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MAISH. I move to amend by inserting in the thirteenth line of this section, after the word "qualified," the words "and such engineer shall be selected from officers of the Army on the retired list."

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of California. I move to amend by striking out in the tenth and eleventh lines of the second section the words "whose lineal rank shall be above that of captain;" so as to read:

One of the said commissioners shall be an officer of the Engineer Corps of the Army, and shall be detailed by the President, &c.

I do not desire to antagonize this bill as a whole. I am satisfied with the method of appointing the commissioners; but I think that the limitation in selecting an officer of the Engineer Corps is injudicious. It seems to me that, if we are going to leave to the President the appointment or detail of an officer from the Engineer Corps, it would be much wiser for us to leave the matter to his judgment without this restriction upon his choice. To say that he shall not select from the Engineer Corps any officer except one above a certain rank appears to be an impeachment of the judgment of the Executive.

Another objection is that this limitation leaves so few from whom to make the selection that we might almost as well specify in the bill the individual to be selected. In the entire United States Army there are only forty-three officers, out of the seven or eight million voters in the country, who will be eligible to this appointment under the terms of the bill. Of these forty-three many would naturally be excluded by their position, age, or other circumstances. For instance many of them are already detailed to certain important labors, and by reason of their familiarity with the duties on which they are now employed could not very well be detached from such service, and consequently they would be prevented from receiving this commission. The number actually open to appointment would be limited to something like twenty or twenty-five.

A third objection, it occurs to me, to this limitation is the extreme age which, in the natural course of circumstances, these men would have attained before they could possibly be eligible to this appointment. You will observe, sir, that it limits the appointment of the President to those whose lineal rank shall be above that of captain. Now, in the ordinary course of events, when the Army shall have been reduced to the peace establishment the rate of promotion will be exceedingly slow. It has been well said, under the peace establishment of the Army before a man comes to be entitled to be a field officer he is so old and so infirm that he is unable to sit on his horse to go out into the field. This appointment is limited to the field officers of the Engineer Corps. In the natural course of events this officer, this commissioner, supposed to be possessed of the ability to perform the active duties of superintending the highways and streets and public buildings belonging to the District of Columbia, who is supposed to be capable to perform the duties requiring a young, vigilant, and vigorous man under ordinary circumstances, would be of necessity over fifty-five or sixty years of age.

I think you might as well go on and prescribe the age of the commissioners. If you are going to limit the rank of the officer who is to be appointed from the Engineer Corps as commissioner, why not of the others? Why not specify that the Senate and the House should not choose a commissioner unless he had a certain rank or passed a certain age; that none should be appointed a commissioner unless he was fifty-five or sixty years of age and should have occupied some distinguished position, such as ex-congressman and ex-governor?

For all these reasons it is exceedingly injudicious in my judgment that this limitation should be placed on this appointment. First, I regard it as an injudicious and unnecessary restriction of the executive power.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BLACKBURN obtained the floor.

Mr. DAVIS, of California. I hope the gentleman from Kentucky will allow me to finish my sentence.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS, of California. I was about to say simply that I objected to it for three particular reasons: first, because it limits the appointing power of the President and is an impeachment of his discretion; secondly, because it limits the number of men who can be chosen from or who can be chosen to forty-three and virtually to about twenty or twenty-five; and, thirdly, because in the natural course of events the man who will be selected by this limitation will have passed the time of life when he would be fitted for the performance of these active duties. I thank the gentleman from Kentucky for his courtesy.

Mr. BLACKBURN. If I had doubts before when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRENTANO] offered a material amendment to this bill, by which he proposed to change its whole frame-work, I am now satisfied that whatever the purpose may be, the result of the amendments offered by different gentlemen, if adopted, will be to defeat this bill. And I am led to say further that if the amendment now pending, offered by the gentleman from California, were to be adopted, I then think the bill ought to be defeated. I need not profess, sir, that I am willing to give to the President of the United States the fullest power in the selection of this officer, and trust it is not necessary, after the debate which has once before occurred on this floor, in which I took a part, that I should profess my confidence in the Engineer Corps of the United States Army, for if I failed to pay a just tribute to their honesty it was because of the poverty of my language.

I concur in but one thing on this amendment of the gentleman from California, and it is this: I do not want to restrict the President of the United States in the selection of this engineer officer. He says if his amendment is adopted and this bill is passed the President will be restricted to forty-three officers from whom to select. I say if that amendment offered by the gentleman from California is adopted then, sir, the President of the United States is restricted to one man. I will not undertake to say that the motive that actuates the gentleman who offers this amendment or any other gentleman who votes for it is in the direction of special and personal legislation, but I will say this, that if that amendment is adopted I can tell this House now the name of the engineer officer who will be made that commissioner of this District as well as the gentleman from California can state after the appointment has been made by the President.

Mr. DAVIS, of California. Let the gentleman state, then, who he is.

Mr. BLACKBURN. If the gentleman from California wants it I will tell him. It will be Lieutenant Hoxie, of the Engineer Corps. If you adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from California to strike out the grade and the rank it will put the President in that shape of putting the question, "Here is an engineer officer of the grade and rank of a lieutenant who has been on service, not as commissioner but on duty as engineer officer, detailed under the law by the President to supervise the construction and repair of streets and avenues in this city for four years." This bill does not interfere with him in any regard. Pass the bill as it stands and it leaves him to fill, not the very position and discharge the duties he is to-day discharging and has been for four years before, but if you pass this amendment you will make him eligible as commissioner of the District from the Corps of Engineers and you put it to the President in such a way he must appoint Lieutenant Hoxie in that place, or failing that declare he is unfit and unworthy for that purpose. That is not what I propose to do.

Now, sir, further, let me say, if you take the mode provided in this bill, you will get a man, one of these forty-three officers at whose hands we have received at least twenty years' service, to earn the commission he holds. He goes upon that board of commissioners with his commission in the Army, the product of twenty years or more of service, at stake. If there be a contract made which upon investigation turns out to be unfair or disreputable, he stands there with his commission at stake, and that commission he cannot afford to lose.

If you adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from California you do one of two things: either you compel the President of the United States to declare that this lieutenant who is now here on duty is an improper man to assign to such service, or else you leave it open to him to foist upon this District a twenty-three or twenty-four year-old boy who holds a commission that has not been in his pocket ninety days. I take it that is not the sort of a commissioner that Congress proposes to fasten upon the people of this District.

One more point and I am done. This bill as it stands renders it utterly impossible that any man who has been identified with the government of the District of Columbia hitherto as a commissioner can come in as one of its commissioners now. I may correct that sentence. This bill as it stands renders it impossible that any man who has been connected officially with the government of this District shall become a commissioner. It leaves the present acting lieutenant of the Engineer Corps precisely where he is. But it does provide in its several sections that no man who has up to this time been identified with the administration of government in this District, either a commissioner or this lieutenant of the Engineer Corps, can possibly become one of the board of commissioners for whom this bill makes provision.

If we are to have a new government, let us have it de novo. Let us have it all new, and not a piece of patchwork. Adopt the amendment of the gentleman from California, and if any one of you held the appointing power thus conferred on the Executive you would yourselves be compelled to ignore the whole Engineer Corps, and select that officer now assigned to duties kindred in some degree to those devolved on the commissioners. I trust the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. CALKINS. I desire to offer a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The Clerk read as follows:

In section 2, line 11, strike out the words "above" and "captain" and insert the words "first lieutenant," so that it will read:

One of the said commissioners shall be an officer of the Engineer Corps of the Army, whose lineal rank shall be that of first lieutenant and shall be detailed by the President for the term of three years, &c.

Mr. CALKINS. I do not care anything about this substitute in place of the amendment offered by the gentleman from California, [Mr. DAVIS,] but I desire to say a word or two upon the subject; I will not detain the committee more than a moment.

I want to say that the reasons urged by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] why this amendment should not be adopted furnish to me a very cogent argument why the amendment of the gentleman from California should be adopted. In an Army like ours men do not get to be captains or first lieutenants until they pass the meridian of life. I had occasion not long ago to examine that subject very thoroughly, and I put the question to all the officers of experience with whom I could have conversation; each one of them agreed, if you take the Army organization just as it is now, and unless the President appoints from civil life or arbitrarily some young lieutenant as spoken of by the gentleman from Kentucky, he cannot obtain one of that rank who has not passed the age of thirty-nine. Taking the Army as it is now, unless there is an arbitrary appointment an officer cannot have that rank much before that time. Therefore I say, Mr. Speaker, that if Lieutenant Hoxie is retained by the President as the commissioner provided for by this bill he now is past the age of very many members of Congress upon this floor. He has shown himself to be an honest and competent man for the last five years. During all the time so much cry has been raised about corruption and the like in the District this man has been unsmirched. I do not stand here pleading for him personally, but I do so as an act of justice. The door ought to be left open so that the President might appoint a first lieutenant if he saw proper.

Another word, Mr. Speaker, and it is this: the gentleman from Kentucky remarked that he could name the man who would be appointed. I do not know by what authority he spoke, but I should be sincerely glad if the gentleman he named would be the man.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Will the gentleman allow me one moment to correct myself?

Mr. CALKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I did not profess to have any ground on which to predicate that prediction except what I gave to the House, that if I or any member of the House should be in the position the President will be in if that amendment shall be adopted, we would be compelled to make that appointment.

Mr. CALKINS. Now, Mr. Chairman, the point I was going to make was this, that the gentleman, who had had five years' experience with all the affairs of the District is to be placed under the charge of some other officer perhaps of no experience, but of higher rank. He has performed the duties well and competently. That is a position which the gentleman from Kentucky I think would be willing to admit, and I think it would be well and wise in the House to leave the President the discretion to appoint from among the lieutenants of the Army a commissioner, if he sees fit. I now withdraw my substitute.

Mr. CLARK, of Iowa. I move to amend the pending amendment so that it will read, "one of said commissioners shall be an engineer appointed by the President." I invite the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FINLEY,] whom I see in his seat, to come to the support of that proposition, and let us provide for the appointment here of a suitable man. I did not understand the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] to condemn the engineer officer, Lieutenant Hoxie, who has been serving four years here.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Permit me to say that if that point is involved in this discussion, then I do not intend to be understood as admitting that Lieutenant Hoxie is the right man for the place. But I do not wish to treat upon questions of personal fitness in a general bill; but if the friends of that gentleman seek to be heard upon the personal phase of the question, I shall certainly wish to be heard in reply.

Mr. CLARK, of Iowa. Nor do I desire to discuss the personal question, although I should challenge all that the gentleman from Kentucky might say against this gentleman. I will simply say in answer to anything of that kind, that might seem to be implied from what the gentleman said to-day, and also in what he said the other day in answer to a question from the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. TOWNSEND,] that the gentleman from Kentucky intended to say that the engineer officer now here in service had been in some manner snatched—

Mr. BLACKBURN. I thank the gentleman from Iowa for giving me an opportunity to do justice to this gentleman. I desire to say now that in anything that I have said I did not intend to refer to Lieutenant Hoxie; and now, in order to make myself perfectly distinct, I will state that I refer to a member of the board of public works, who brought nothing but disgrace upon him. I refer to Babcock.

Mr. CLARK, of Iowa. I so understood it perfectly, but there were others who might have thought otherwise, and therefore I am very much obliged to the gentleman that he now corrects—

Mr. BLACKBURN. Not corrects—

Mr. CLARK, of Iowa. That he now explains away any implication that might have been drawn from what he said. All I desire to say in reference to that matter is simply to refer to a report made by an investigating committee of the last Congress. Lieutenant Hoxie has served since 1874, four years, not five. The investigating committee into the conduct of the board of commissioners made this report, and I want to put it before this House as a matter of justice, lest it might be inferred that this limitation is intended to exclude Lieutenant Hoxie. It is the implication that it is intended to exclude one man who has served without smirch or possible taint here. The committee say that "the work which has been done, under the charge of the engineer and under the supervision of the commissioners of works, in the performance of uncompleted contracts under the late board of public works, has been well and economically done." Lieutenant Hoxie came out of the investigation with every possible title to laudation for the work he had done. Now, I am not prepared to vote to exclude a man whose freedom from anything like imputation of wrong or suspicion entitles him to be considered in the appointment of an engineer under this bill. Why not throw the matter open? But I am not here to legislate Hoxie into office, but I do say that the bill ought to be heeded at once, unless it is thrown open to discretionary appointment by the President. Otherwise it would exclude a man whose experience entitles him to be considered. He is old enough to be a Senator of the United States. He has been seventeen years in the Army of the United States. He has served for four years in the service of this District. Why exclude him? Let the appointment be thrown open to any competent engineer. I do not ask you to retain him, but I do insist that he ought not to be excluded simply because he is a lieutenant and not a captain.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I want the House to understand that I appreciate fully the efforts which the gentleman from Iowa makes in behalf of his constituents. If Lieutenant Hoxie were from my district I doubt not that I should feel more interest in his retention or promotion in office than I now do.

Mr. CLARK, of Iowa. Yet I think the gentleman will admit that I have not said anything in Lieutenant Hoxie's favor to which he is not entitled.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not propose to indorse all the gentleman has said by way of commendation of this officer by any means.

Mr. YOUNG. Consistency, if nothing else, will compel me to support the proposed amendment. When a question very similar to this one was submitted a few weeks ago to the House, affecting the right of the President to discharge his legal and constitutional duties untrammelled by any dictation by Congress, I voted against imposing any restrictions upon the exercise of his official discretion in the matter, and the reasons which prompted me then are sufficient to control my action now in supporting this amendment. I am not aware of the fact that any provision of this bill is calculated to affect the interest of any particular individual. If, as the gentleman from Kentucky has intimated, the intention of the amendment is to legislate Lieutenant Hoxie or any one else into employment, that is a sufficient reason why it should be rejected by the House. But I cannot think that the gentleman who offered it has any such purpose in view, and if he has I have no sympathy with it. I do not care how the bill in either form, with or without the amendment, may affect any public officer or private individual. I only desire that the President may have the right to select from the whole Army of the United States a proper officer for the position designated, and if I thought the amendment pointed to any particular one, I should want no better reason for opposing it.

If, on the contrary, as I am authorized to believe by the statements and arguments of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN,] this provision of the bill fixing the rank of the officer and limiting the discretion of the President is intended to exclude any particular officer, then that furnishes an equally good reason why that clause of the bill should be stricken out. It is no part of the duty of this House in any measure of general legislation to provide specially for individual interests.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am sure the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] does not deliberately intend to misrepresent me.

Mr. YOUNG. I do not; I am only drawing an inference from what you said.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman says he understood me as saying that the object and purpose of this provision of the bill was to exclude some particular man from office.

Mr. YOUNG. The gentleman certainly misunderstood me. I said his language authorized such an inference.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Very well.

Mr. YOUNG. I only intended to say that if I were to draw my conclusion from the arguments of the gentleman, I would be of the opinion that this provision of the bill, requiring that the officer selected should not be of less rank than captain, was directed at some particular individual who now holds that office. I do not believe, however, that the gentleman from Kentucky really has that purpose in view.

Mr. BLACKBURN. No gentleman holds that office now?

Mr. YOUNG. I understood that it was held by some one, and that this provision of the bill might be necessary to prevent him from continuing to hold it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. On the contrary, this provision of the bill leaves the lieutenant where he is. The provision of the bill upon which the gentleman is speaking relates to the commissioners for the District.

Mr. YOUNG. I do not care what officer it relates to. It is wrong, however it may be applied. I scarcely know the gentleman referred to; I have only seen him a few times and have but little personal acquaintance with him. I do not know whether he is fit or unfit to occupy the position in question, but we should not assert that he is not. I insist that wherever it is made the duty of the Chief Executive of this nation to carry out any act of Congress it is not proper for him to be trammelled any further than the public interest or constitutional limitations may require. I believe there has been no instance in past legislation where the rank of any officer of the Army has been designated by act of Congress who was to carry into effect any law under the direction of the President, but in all cases the selection has been left to the discretion of the Executive.

I remember one instance that occurred after I became a member of this House, when a bill was proposed creating a commission of certain Army officers, in which it was proposed to designate the rank of those officers, and I know that was protested against by the General of the Army, by the chief of the Engineer Corps, and by many gentlemen on this floor who were acquainted with the law and usage which governs the question. I have no objection to the bill in other respects and if amended as indicated I shall support it more cheerfully than I can otherwise do.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FINLEY. Is the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. DAVIS] now pending?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is.

Mr. FINLEY. I understood that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] withdrew his amendment to that amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment of the gentleman from California is pending, and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. CLARK] has moved an amendment to that amendment.

Mr. CLARK, of Iowa. If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FINLEY] desires an opportunity to be heard I will withdraw my amendment if he will renew it or move a similar amendment.

Mr. FINLEY. I renew the amendment; or will move one similar to it. The amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. DAVIS] proposes to strike out the words "whose lineal rank shall be above that of captain," leaving it to the President to detail any officer of the Engineer Corps of the Army to perform the duty of commissioner. I propose to further strike out the words preceding, that is, the words "an officer of the Engineer Corps of the Army," and insert in lieu thereof the words "engineer in civil life." I now ask the Clerk to read that portion of the section as I propose to amend it.

The Clerk read as follows:

One of the said commissioners shall be an engineer in civil life, &c.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I raise the point of order that that amendment has already been rejected by the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment voted down by the House involved the same principle, but was not in terms the same as this amendment.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Is not this amendment virtually the same as the one which has already been considered and rejected by the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Although in principle it amounts to nearly the same thing, the Chair thinks that it is not subject to the point of order.

Mr. FINLEY. The object of my amendment is that the appointee of the President, if he is not to be an officer of the Engineer Corps above the lineal rank of captain, then he shall be from civil life. But as I have already said, I see no good reason why an officer of the Engineer Corps of the Army should be appointed as one of these commissioners. Why should one of these commissioners come from the Engineer Corps or from any other branch of the military service? The duties of these commissioners are those of officers in civil life; all the duties of the commissioners prescribed by this bill, to a certain extent pertain to the executive and judicial functions of civil magistrates, wholly unlike the duties pertaining to military life and in which an Army officer is supposed to be qualified.

It occurs to me, as I have before said, that an officer of the Engineer Corps of the Army is to a certain extent unfitted by his education in military life to perform the duties of a commissioner under this bill. Why should we restrict the President in his appointment to the Engineer Corps of the Army? Why not give to the President the power to appoint any competent, skilled engineer who is fitted for the place? I have no doubt that the President, in the exercise of his discretion, can find an able and well-qualified man from civil life for this purpose.

Mr. CLARK, of Iowa. Why put in the words "in civil life?"

Mr. FINLEY. Simply because I am opposed to taking a commissioner from the Army; to have detailed from the Army a person to perform the functions of a civil officer.

Mr. CLARK, of Iowa. The gentleman does not pretend that a man in the Army is unsuitable for such a position and disqualified for it?

Mr. FINLEY. He is not necessarily disqualified for it, but the education which an officer of the Army receives is not in the direction of that of a civil officer. His previous education as an Army officer to a certain extent unfits him for this position.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that an engineer should be selected from civil life to this position as commissioner. There are plenty of civil engineers in civil life just as well qualified to perform these duties as any engineer in the Army. The duty of engineer will not devolve upon this commissioner, for the bill provides for two other engineers. This commissioner will perform exactly the same duties as the other two commissioners. Why not, then, select him from civil life?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HENDEE. I move to limit all further debate on this section and pending amendments to one minute.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HENDEE. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WRIGHT] can have this one minute if he wishes it.

Mr. WRIGHT. I do not know that I can say much in a minute, but I will make the most of it that I can. I favor the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FINLEY,] provided it be modified so that the President in appointing this commissioner, who is to be an engineer, may make his selection either from civil or military life, as he chooses. If you confer upon the President this power of appointment, I think that he ought to be left to this extent free in his selection.

Mr. BEEBE. I would like to ask the gentleman one question. If we provide simply that the President shall appoint an engineer as commissioner, will the President have authority to make the selection of an engineer from the Army to perform these civil duties without some express provision in the law?

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time to which debate on this section and pending amendments was limited has expired. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FINLEY] to the amendment of the gentleman from California, [Mr. DAVIS.] The Clerk will first report the amendment of the gentleman from California, and then the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio, offered as an amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read the amendment of Mr. DAVIS, of California, as follows:

In lines 10 and 11, strike out the words, "whose lineal rank shall be above that of captain."

The amendment of Mr. FINLEY was read, as follows:

In lines 9 and 10, strike out the words "an officer of the Engineer Corps of the Army," and after the word "be," in line 9, insert, "an engineer in civil life;" so as to read: "One of the said commissioners shall be an engineer in civil life," &c.

Mr. FORT. I rise to a question of order. I understood that an amendment was pending providing for striking out all limitation as to officers in the Engineer Corps.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk has read the only amendments pending.

Mr. FORT. I think the House never would have limited debate if it had understood the question was in the present shape.

The question being taken on Mr. FINLEY's amendment to the amendment it was not agreed to.

The question then recurred on the amendment of Mr. DAVIS, of California.

Mr. CLARK, of Iowa. I renew my amendment to strike out the words, "officer of the Engineer Corps of the Army," and insert "engineer."

The amendment was not agreed to.

The question again recurring on the amendment of Mr. DAVIS, of California, the question was taken; and there were—ayes 43, noes 67; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. DAVIS, of California, and Mr. HENDEE were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported ayes 49, noes 92. So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. I offer the following amendment:

Strike out all after section 2 and insert the following:

The three commissioners herein provided for shall be elected by the qualified voters of the District of Columbia on the third Monday of April, 1879, and the commissioners so elected shall determine by lot which shall serve for the term of one, two, and three years respectively; and annually thereafter the qualified electors of said District shall elect one commissioner, who shall serve for the term of three years and until his successor is elected and qualified.

I wish to say in explanation of this amendment—

Mr. EDEN. Has not debate been closed on this section?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate was closed on the section and pending amendments. This amendment was not pending.

Mr. EDEN. Is debate in order upon amendments that may be offered?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. As this was not pending at the time the debate was closed, the Chair would hold that it is debatable.

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. Then I desire to say—

Mr. EDEN. I think it was understood that debate was entirely closed on the section.

Mr. WADDELL. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. HUNTON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I understood the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. HENDEE] to move that all debate upon this section and the amendments be terminated in one minute. I suppose that the effect of the motion when adopted is that while it does not cut off the offering of new amendments, those offered cannot be debated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman from Vermont had chosen to frame his motion so as to close debate on the section and amendments, the Chair might have ruled differently; but as his language was "pending amendments," and as this section is clearly amendable at present, the Chair cannot hold that debate on new amendments is cut off until further action by the House.

Mr. HENDEE. I supposed that my motion limited debate upon all amendments that might be offered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman did not so frame his motion.

Mr. HENDEE. I move, then, that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be closed in one minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair cannot recognize the gentleman from Vermont at present, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JONES] is entitled to the floor upon his amendment.

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. I have no desire to prolong the discussion, but only to explain briefly this amendment. As I understand, the principle underlying this bill, if there is any principle in it, is to secure proper persons to act as commissioners. That security is provided for in that the commissioner shall give bond in the sum of $50,000. The people can only elect some person who can give such a bond, and the objection, therefore, to putting men in position who are not responsible is obviated by the bond thus required.

In the next place the object of my amendment is that neither one of these commissioners shall act as the engineer of this District, and for the reason that the engineer himself is an executive officer under the commissioners and should not be called upon to decide in reference to his own official acts. If this amendment be adopted I intend to offer a further amendment that the commissioners shall select their own officer for engineer and that the President shall detail the officer they select.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HENDEE. I move that all debate on the pending section and all amendments thereto be limited to one minute.

The motion was agreed to.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. JONES, of Ohio, and it was rejected.

Mr. LATHROP. I move after the word "receive," in line 15, to insert "$5,000 per year;" and in the same line to strike out the word "than" and insert the word "including;" so it will read:

Provided, That the officer so detailed shall not be assigned to any other duty, and that he shall receive $5,000 per year and no further compensation, including his regular pay as an officer of the Army.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I make that for this reason: this commissioner when elected—

Mr. BLACKBURN. I make the point that debate is not in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order is well taken.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That as soon as the commissioners appointed as aforesaid shall have taken and subscribed the oath or affirmation hereinbefore described, and the two so elected as aforesaid shall have duly bonded as aforesaid, all the powers, rights, and privileges lawfully exercised by, and all property, estate, and effects now vested by law in, and exercised by, the commissioners appointed under the provisions of the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, shall be transferred to and be vested in said commissioners, and the functions of the commissioners so appointed under the act of June 20, 1874, shall cease and determine; and the commissioners of the District of Columbia shall have power, subject to limitations herein provided, to apply the taxes or other revenues of said District to the payment of the current expenses thereof, to the support of the public schools, the fire department, and the police, and for that purpose shall take possession and supervision of all the offices, books, papers, records, moneys, credits, securities, assets, and accounts belonging or appertaining to the business or interests of the government of the District of Columbia, and exercise the power and authority aforesaid; but said commissioners, in the exercise of such power and authority, shall make no contract nor incur any obligation other than such contracts and obligations as are hereinafter provided for and shall be approved by Congress. All taxes heretofore lawfully assessed and due, or to become due, shall be collected pursuant to law, except as herein otherwise provided; but said commissioners shall have no power to anticipate taxes by a sale or hypothecation of any such taxes, or evidence thereof, but they may borrow in anticipation of collection of revenue, not to exceed in any one year $500,000, at a rate of interest not exceeding 6 per cent. per annum; and said commissioners are hereby authorized to abolish any office, to consolidate two or more offices, reduce the number of employes, remove from office, and make appointments to any office under them authorized by law, subject to such limitations as are hereinafter provided: Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to abate in any wise or interfere with any suit pending in favor of or against the District of Columbia or the commissioners thereof, or affect any rights or cause of action existing in favor of any citizen of the District of Columbia or any other person, but the same may be commenced or prosecuted to final judgment, and the corporation hereby created shall be bound thereby as if the suit had been originally commenced for or against the said corporation; and all final judgments recovered against said District shall be paid by warrant of the commissioners, or a majority of them, on the Treasury.

Mr. BLACKBURN. By direction of the committee, I move in line 32, on page 6, to strike out "five" and insert "two;" so it will read:

But they may borrow, in anticipation of collection of revenue, not to exceed in any one year $200,000, at a rate of interest not exceeding 6 per cent. per annum.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read section 6, as follows:

SEC. 6. There shall be a council, consisting of twenty-four members, with duties and powers as hereinafter provided.

No person shall be eligible as a member of said council who is not the owner of property in the District of Columbia of the assessed valuation of $3,000 or more, and who is not at the time of his election a citizen of the United States, and who has not been a permanent resident of the District of Columbia for five years previous to such election, without claim of residence elsewhere during that time, and who is not a resident of the election precinct from which he is chosen.

No person holding any office under the United States or District of Columbia, or who shall be interested, either directly or indirectly, in any contract with the District of Columbia or with the United States for any work to be done within the District of Columbia, shall be eligible as a member of the council.

Removal from the District of Columbia or from the precinct from which a member is chosen, or the becoming interested in any claim against or contract with said District of Columbia or with the United States for work to be done in the District of Columbia, or the acceptance of any office under the United States or the District of Columbia, shall create a vacancy in such case, and a new election shall forthwith be ordered by the council.

The commissioners of the District of Columbia shall apportion the cities of Washington and Georgetown into eleven election precincts as nearly equal in population as may be, and the Territory of the District of Columbia outside the limits of said cities shall constitute one election precinct.

At the first election, one member from each precinct shall be elected for one year, and one member therefrom shall be elected for two years; and thereafter one shall be elected annually in each precinct, who shall be elected for two years.

Each male inhabitant of the District of Columbia above the age of twenty-one years, and who shall be a citizen of the United States, shall be entitled to vote at all elections for councilmen: Provided, He shall have been an actual bona fide resident of said District of Columbia for the three years, and of the election precinct in which he offers to vote for the six months last preceding the election at which he offers to vote, claiming no residence elsewhere during that time, and who shall have paid the poll tax imposed upon him by law.

Until Congress shall otherwise provide by law, the commissioners of the District of Columbia shall prescribe the time, place, and manner for holding elections for councilmen, shall appoint a board of registration prior to each general election, not to exceed three members in each election precinct, whose pay shall not exceed $2.50 per each day, who shall register the qualified electors in their respective precincts at such times and places as said commissioners shall prescribe; and said commissioners shall designate three inspectors in each election precinct to conduct said elections and make returns thereof to said commissioners, who shall canvass the same and issue certificates of election to those having the highest number of votes in their respective precincts; and said commissioners shall make all needful rules and regulations for carrying into effect the provisions of this act not otherwise herein provided for: Provided, That the first election for councilmen shall be held within sixty days from the passage of this act: And provided further, That said commissioners shall give notice, by publication, of all elections and registrations provided for by this act, by printed notices to be posted in convenient and public places in each election precinct in said District of Columbia at least thirty days prior to such election or registration.

No member of said council shall receive any compensation for his services. Each member of the council, registrar, inspector, clerk, or other officer shall, before entering upon the discharge of the duties of his office, take an oath binding himself to the faithful performance of the same, before some officer authorized to administer oaths.

A majority of said council shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business.

The council shall have power to prescribe rules for its own government; shall be the judges of the qualifications, election, and returns of its members; shall elect a president from among its own members, and a secretary who shall not be a member of the council, and who shall be allowed a salary, to be fixed by the council, not to exceed $1,000 per annum.

The council shall convene whenever notified by the commissioners of the District of Columbia that they have business to submit for their consideration, and at such other times as the council in its discretion may determine: Provided, That the first meeting of said council for the organization thereof shall, by action of the commissioners, be called within thirty days after the first election of councilmen.

The necessary expenses of said council shall be certified by the president and secretary of said council, audited by the comptroller, and paid by the commissioners of the District of Columbia.

The appointment of all officers, agents, or employes of the District of Columbia whose salaries shall be at the rate of $1,500 per annum or more shall be made by the commissioners of the District of Columbia, subject to confirmation of said council.

The council shall, through a committee of its members, have free access to the records, books, and papers of said commissioners of the District of Columbia, and of any department of the government of the District of Columbia, and may at any time, by a committee of its members, institute and carry on an investigation into the accounts and official conduct of any officer, agent, or employe of the District of Columbia, and shall report to the commissioners of the District of Columbia any mismanagement, maladministration, or official misconduct upon the part of such officer, agent, or employe; which said report when so made shall, by the said commissioners, be promptly transmitted to both Houses of Congress when so requested by the council.

No contract for the construction, improvement, or repair of any street, avenue, sewer, alley, highway, or other public work in the District of Columbia, or for material to be used for any of the purposes above mentioned, shall be entered into by the commissioners of the District of Columbia without the approval of the said council.

No member of the council or salaried officer of the District of Columbia shall be accepted as surety on any bond required to be given to the District of Columbia, nor shall any contractor be accepted as surety for any other contractor.

All contracts for the construction, improvement, alteration, or repairs of the streets, avenues, highways, alleys, gutters, sewers, and all work of like nature, shall be made and entered into only by and with the official consent of a majority of the commissioners of the District, of which majority the commissioner appointed from the Engineer Corps of the Army shall be one. And the entire control and supervision of the execution and fulfillment of all contracts entered into and the preparation of all plans, specifications and estimates for work as above mentioned, shall be vested in and exercised by that commissioner of the District of Columbia, appointed from the Engineer Corps of the Army, as hereinbefore provided.

Before any moneys shall be raised or taxes levied and collected for the purpose of carrying on the government of the District of Columbia, the said commissioners shall submit annually to the council for their approval a statement showing in detail the work proposed to be undertaken by them during the fiscal year next ensuing, and the estimated cost thereof; and also an estimate in detail, which shall include the cost of all courts in said District, except the United States courts, the judges, officers, witnesses, jail fees, and all expenses incident thereto; also the cost of constructing, repairing, and maintaining all bridges, authorized by law, across the Potomac River within the District of Columbia, and also all other streams in said District; the cost of maintaining all public institutions of charity, asylums, hospitals, reformatories, and prisons in the District of Columbia, and which are now by law supported, wholly or in part, by the United States or District of Columbia, of the amount necessary to defray the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the next fiscal year.

The council shall carefully consider all estimates submitted to them, as above provided, and shall approve or disapprove the same; they may reduce the same, or any item thereof, but shall have no power to increase such estimate, or any item thereof.

All votes of said council upon such questions of revision or reduction of estimates shall be taken by yeas and nays, and a record kept thereof.

After the council shall have considered and passed upon all the estimates as submitted to them, they shall cause a statement to be made of the amounts approved by said council, and the fund or purpose for which required, which statement shall be certified by the president and secretary of the council, and delivered, together with the estimates as originally submitted to said council, to the commissioners of the District of Columbia, who shall transmit them to both Houses of Congress.

To the extent to which Congress shall approve the said estimates they shall appropriate the amount of 50 per cent. thereof, and the remaining 50 per cent. thereof shall be levied and assessed upon the taxable property in said District other than the property of the United States and of the District of Columbia, in such manner as the commissioners of the District of Columbia may deem best, and shall be collected in the manner now provided by law for the collection of taxes in said District, with such change in the manner of advertising sales for taxes as may seem expedient to said commissioners: Provided, That the rate of taxation in any one year shall not exceed $1.50 on every $100 of real and personal estate not exempt by law, according to the cash valuation thereof: And provided further, Upon lands used and held solely for agricultural purposes, and to be so designated by the assessors in their annual returns, the rate for any one year shall not exceed $1 on every $100.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question will first be put on the amendments reported from the committee, which will be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The first amendment. Strike out the following:

No member of the council or salaried officer of the District of Columbia shall be accepted as surety on any bond required to be given to the District of Columbia, nor shall any contractor be accepted as surety for any other contractor.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Second amendment. After line 136 add as follows:

The President of the United States may detail from the Engineer Corps of the Army not more than two officers, of rank subordinate to that of the engineer officer belonging to the board of commissioners of said District, to act as assistants to said engineer commissioner in the discharge of the special duties imposed upon him by the provisions of this act. No member of the council or salaried officer of the District of Columbia shall be accepted as surety on any bond required to be given to the District of Columbia, nor shall any contractor be accepted as surety for any other contractor.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Third amendment. Strike out the word "in," in line 162, and insert "belonging to and controlled by."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am directed by the committee to offer the following amendments to this section: On page 12, line 127, after the word "official" insert the word "unanimous." Then in the same line strike out the words "of a majority." Also strike out from and including the word "of," in line 128, down to and including the word "one," in line 130, as follows: "Of which majority the commissioner appointed from the Engineer Corps of the Army shall be one." Also strike out from and including the word "of," in line 130, down to and including the word "into," in line 131, as follows: "Of the execution and fulfillment of all contracts entered into." The effect of which amendments, Mr. Speaker, if agreed to, will simply be to require the action of the commissioners of the District shall be unanimous upon all subjects therein referred to as to matters of contract. As the bill now stands it requires a majority of the commissioners and requires the engineer officer shall be one of that majority. The amendment I offer under the direction of the committee strikes out that requirement and simply substitutes the unanimous action of the commissioners on all these questions.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLAFLIN. I am directed by the committee to move, page 5, line 44, to insert "and provided, further, he shall have been duly registered as a qualified voter as herein provided."

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. CLAFLIN. I move, on page 13, line 162, after the word "prisons," to insert "and the Washington Aqueduct and its appurtenances."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLAFLIN. I am further directed by the committee, in line 15, to insert after the word "any" the word "buildings."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FINLEY. I move, on page 7, line 13, after the word "Columbia," to insert the words "except as hereinbefore provided for the office of commissioner," and after the word "eligible," in line 16, to insert "as commissioner or;" so it will read:

No person holding any office under the United States or District of Columbia, except as heretofore provided for the office of commissioner, or who shall be interested, either directly or indirectly, in any contract with the District of Columbia, or with the United States, for any work to be done within the District of Columbia, shall be eligible as commissioner or as a member of the council.

Mr. BLACKBURN. We are willing to accept that.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. REAGAN. I offer the following amendment:

On page 14, in line 186, strike out "50" and insert "40," and in line 187 strike out "50" and insert "60," so that it will read:

To the extent to which Congress shall approve the said estimates they shall appropriate the amount of 40 per cent. thereof, and the remaining 60 per cent. thereof shall be levied and assessed upon the taxable property in said District, &c.

The object of the amendment is to put on the Federal Government 40 per cent. of the whole amount of the expenses of the District Government and 60 per cent. of the amount on the people of the District. I do not propose to enter into a discussion of this bill further than to say that it seems to me a city with one hundred and sixty thousand population ought to pay more than half the expenses of its government. It seems to me it is inequitable and unjust to impose half the expense of the city government on the people of other portions of the country. I am willing to act quite liberally by the people of the District, and I recognize the fact that a portion of the expenses ought properly to be borne by the Federal Government; but I think we recognize that fully enough if we agree to pay 40 per cent. of the expenses of the District government.

Mr. EDEN. I am favorable to the amendment offered by my friend from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN.] I think that 40 per cent. is a sufficient proportion for the Government of the United States to pay of the expenses incurred in the city of Washington. The city owes a debt the interest of which will require about or over a million dollars annually, and it will take about half a million more to support its public schools. This bill proposes to limit the rate of taxation in this District to one dollar and a half in the hundred. I suppose that will just about raise enough money to keep up their schools and pay the interest on the debt, and it will leave the Government of the United States to pay all the balance of the expenses of this District, of every sort and kind. I do not think that is right. I hardly see the propriety in any event of the people of the United States paying to keep up the schools in this District. At home our constituents have to pay all those expenses themselves.

But it is said that the Government of the United States owns one-half the property in the District, and therefore they ought to pay one-half the expenses of all kinds. If I understand the matter aright, in order to make out the ownership in the Government of one-half the property in this District they count the streets and avenues of the District. I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that it is fair in making up this apportionment that is to be devolved upon the Treasury of the United States to charge us with the streets and avenues. Those streets and avenues are for the benefit of the inhabitants of the District, and the people everywhere outside the city of Washington are taxed for the purpose of repairing the streets and avenues abutting on their property, not for the reason that the owners of property own the streets and avenues but for the reason that the streets and avenues are kept up for the benefit of the people who own the property abutting on those streets.

Mr. CLAFLIN. Will the gentleman allow me—

Mr. EDEN. I have but five minutes and cannot yield. If I had more time I would be glad to do so.

I think, then, if the people of the United States are to pay one-half or any proportion of the expenses of keeping up the schools or any proportion of the interest upon the debt of this District, even 40 per cent. of the amount is too great a proportion to be charged upon the Treasury of the United States.

A large portion of the debt created by the improvements that were made here was paid out of the Treasury of the United States at the time the improvements were being made. In one single session of Congress the following appropriations were made: on the 8th of January, 1873, there was appropriated for improvement of streets, sewerage, &c., $1,241,920.92. There was also appropriated for paving roadway and crossings, &c., in front of United States property, $92,620; to the board of public works, for filling canals, $68,365. On May 15, 1872, $100,000 was appropriated. On March 3, 1872, there was appropriated as follows: to reimburse the city of Washington for work done around Government reservations, $188,200.75; for the same, $106,533; to complete improvements of streets, avenues, &c., $913,457.26; to reimburse the city of Washington for improvements, &c., $1,000,000.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HUNTON. I rise to oppose the amendment. The question as to the division of the expenses of the District of Columbia between the Federal Government and the people of the District is a question which has engaged the attention of this Government for the last thirty years and more, and the question never has been referred to a committee except on one occasion, when that committee did not report either to the Senate or to the House of Representatives, from which the committee was appointed, that the true proportion of the expense to be borne by the Federal Government and the people of this District was one-half by each.

The first report I find on the subject was one by Mr. Southard, made to the Senate in 1835, in which he took that ground. The subject was again referred to a committee of this House, of which Judge Poland was the chairman, and the committee reported to the House that each one of the parties to the government of this District should pay 50 per cent. Then, sir, when there was a special joint committee appointed in 1876 to investigate this question, that committee—and the only committee that has reported differently from the bill now under consideration—reported 60 and 40 per cent. But since that time this bill now under consideration includes burdens upon the people of this District not heretofore embraced in any bill or any report from a committee of this House or the Senate. For instance, sir, this bill imposes upon the District 50 per cent. of the expense of the bridges leading into the District; it imposes 50 per cent. of the expenses of all the charities; it imposes, by an amendment which is offered, 50 per cent. of the expense of the Aqueduct and its appurtenances; and this committee determined that when these additional subjects of burden to the people of the District of Columbia were added to the bill it did not do more than keep up the proportion of the bill reported by the joint select committee of 60 per cent. and 40 per cent.

I believe I can say in the presence of the gentleman from Vermont that a large majority of that joint select committee thought that 50 per cent. on the part of the Government and 50 per cent. on the part of the people was about the fair thing. Well, now, I have studied this question with a great deal of care, and having been a member of that joint select committee and also a member of the committee that framed and reported this bill, I say, after the maturest reflection that I could give to the subject, that it is but just to the people that the Government should bear equally with the people the burdens of the government of the District of Columbia.

I wish I had time to look at the object of the framers of the Constitution of the United States in founding the seat of the Federal Government at this place, because we all know that when these ten miles square were ceded by the States of Maryland and Virginia to the Federal Government for the permanent seat of Government, when this territory was ceded, it was a vast wilderness and there was not then scarcely a house within its borders, and the very reason of locating the seat of Government here and making this the capital of the Federal Government was because of its situation.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BRIGHT obtained the floor and yielded his time to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTON.]

Mr. HUNTON. And, sir, the object of locating the capital here was to get us away from commercial and manufacturing cities, that we might not be overawed by a population not under the absolute control of Congress. It was never contemplated in the debates of Congress—and, if members will take the trouble to read them, it will be found that it was never contemplated—that the people of this District, but a few hundred then in number, at the time when the seat of the Federal Government was located here, should bear the expenses of founding a capital for this great nation.

Why, look at the streets of this city, over one hundred and sixty to one hundred and ninety feet wide. Look at the vast areas of public grounds set apart for public use, now held by the Government of the United States in absolute title.

Now, my friend from Illinois [Mr. EDEN] says that, although the Government of the United States owns half the property here, which is exempted by this bill from taxation, it should not pay half of the governmental expenses of this District. I do not know how it appears to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. EDEN,] but that seems to me to be the fairest rule that the House can now adopt, and make all parties pay the expenses of the Government of the District of Columbia according to the property owned by those parties.

Mr. REAGAN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HUNTON. Certainly, but my time is very limited.

Mr. REAGAN. I would ask the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] upon what data the Committee for the District of Columbia have arrived at the conclusion that the Government owns one-half of the property in the District of Columbia.

Mr. HUNTON. By the last assessment made of the real estate in the District.

Mr. REAGAN. Without reference to the business carried on by merchants, &c.?

Mr. HUNTON. By the assessment of the real estate of the District of Columbia. According to that assessment the ownership of property is divided about equally between the Federal Government and the citizens of the District.

Mr. REAGAN. And the commerce and wealth of the District outside of the real estate, which amount to much more than the real estate, are to be exempt from taxation?

Mr. HUNTON. I do not see that that has any relation to my argument. Now in regard to the streets—

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. HENDEE. I move that all debate upon the pending section and the amendments thereto be limited to one minute.

Mr. EDEN. There is one other amendment, and a very important one, which should be made. I hope debate will not be closed until we have had a fair opportunity for discussion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is a matter for the House to determine. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. HENDEE] moves that all debate upon the pending section and amendments thereto be limited to one minute.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EDEN. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. GARFIELD. Allow me to remind the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EDEN] that a session for this evening was agreed upon by the House, and his motion to adjourn, if carried, will cut off that evening session.

Mr. EDEN. What is the session for to-night?

Mr. GARFIELD. For debate on the tariff bill.

Mr. EDEN. Then I will withdraw the motion to adjourn and move that the House now take a recess until half-past seven o'clock.

The motion was not agreed to, upon a division—ayes 67, noes 94.

The question recurred upon the motion of Mr. KEAGAN, to amend section 6, by striking out of line 186 the word "fifty" and inserting the word "forty;" also, in line 187, by striking out the word "fifty" and inserting the word "sixty;" so that that portion of the section, if so amended, would read as follows:

To the extent to which Congress shall approve the said estimates they shall appropriate the amount of 40 per cent. thereof, and the remaining 60 per cent. thereof shall be levied and assessed upon the taxable property in said District other than the property of the United States and of the District of Columbia, in such manner as the commissioners of the District of Columbia may deem best, &c.

Mr. EDEN. Upon that amendment I call for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and upon a division there were—ayes 20, noes 117; not one-fifth in the affirmative.

Before the result of the vote was announced—

Mr. SPRINGER called for tellers upon ordering the yeas and nays. Tellers were not ordered, there being but 14 in the affirmative; not one-fifth of a quorum.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the House now take a recess until half-past seven o'clock to-night.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. EDEN. I move to amend this section by striking out the first proviso, as follows:

Provided, That the rate of taxation in any one year shall not exceed $1.50 on every $100 of real and personal estate not exempt by law, according to the cash valuation thereof.

I believe I am entitled to one minute for debate. I am opposed to limiting the rate of taxation in this District to $1.50 upon each $100 and putting all the balance of the burden of the support of the District upon the people of the United States. My constituents pay twice as much taxes as this for the support of their State, county and municipal governments. If the rate of taxation in this District is limited as proposed by this bill to $1.50 on the $100, there will not be received enough revenue to pay the interest on the debt of the District and to keep up the schools.

The people of the United States will have to pay every dollar of the expense necessary to keep in repair the streets and avenues of the city, and you will simply by this bill take the burden off the people of this city and place it upon the people of the United States.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. EDEN; and upon a division—ayes 59, noes 91—it was not agreed to.

Mr. EDEN. I now move that the House take a recess until half past seven o'clock.

Mr. HENDEE. Let us finish this bill.

Mr. EDEN. You cannot get through with it to-day. I call for the yeas and nays on my motion.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and there were 17 in the affirmative.

So (the affirmative not being one-fifth of the last vote) the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion of Mr. EDEN for a recess was not agreed to.

Mr. CLARK, of Iowa. This section is still open to amendment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is still open to amendment, but not to debate.

Mr. CLARK, of Iowa. I move to amend lines 4, 5, and 6 of the section by striking out the words, "Who is not the owner of property in the District of Columbia of the assessed valuation of $3,000 or more; and;" so that it will read, "No person shall be eligible as a member of said council who is not at the time of his election a citizen of the United States," &c.

The amendment was not agreed to.

No further amendment being offered to section 6, section 7 was read, as follows:

SEC. 7. That the said commissioners may, by general regulation consistent with the act of Congress of March 3, 1877, entitled "An act for the support of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, and for other purposes," or with other existing laws, prescribe the time or times for the payment of all taxes and the conditions of prompt payment, and the duties of assessors and collectors in relation thereto; that all taxes collected shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States, and the same, as well as the appropriations to be made by Congress as aforesaid, shall be disbursed for the expenses of said District, on proper vouchers certified by said commissioners, or a majority of them; and the accounts of said commissioners, and the tax-collectors, and all other officers required to account shall be settled and adjusted by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department of the United States.

No amendment being offered to section 7, section 8 was read, as follows:

SEC. 8. That hereafter the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay the interest accruing on the 3.65 per cent. bonds of the District of Columbia as the same mature, and the amounts so paid shall be credited as part of the appropriation for the year by the United States toward the expenses of the government of the District, as herein provided.

Mr. EDEN. I move to strike out section 8. The object of my motion is this: the effect of the section will be to make the appropriation out of the Treasury for the payment of the interest on the 3.65 District bonds a permanent and continuing appropriation instead of an annual appropriation. The practice, since these bonds were issued, has been for Congress at each session to make the necessary appropriation for the payment of the interest of the 3.65 bonds out of the funds of the District. The law upon the subject is this:

And the faith of the United States is hereby pledged that the United States will, by proper proportional appropriations, as contemplated by this act, and by causing to be levied upon the property within said District such taxes as will provide the revenues necessary to pay the interest on said bonds as the former may become due and payable, and create a sinking fund for the payment of the principal thereof at maturity.

Now I object to changing the law in reference to the payment of the interest on these 3.65 bonds. The Government of the United States is now responsible only for the collection of taxes to pay the interest as it now accrues; that is all we are bound to do.

These bonds run for fifty years, and if this bill in its present form becomes a law the contract with the holders of the bonds is irrevocable during that term, no matter what may be the desire of the District authorities or of the Government itself in reference to the bonds.

I am very well aware that the passage of this provision will add greatly—perhaps thirty cents on the dollar—to the value of the bonds, which have been bought up on speculation; but I am not very anxious for the passage of a law which will be irrevocable for fifty years, even if it does have that effect.

We discharge our duty fully in reference to these bonds when we see that the interest as it falls due is paid without making a permanent appropriation. I am not very much in favor of permanent appropriations. I think it a correct principle that appropriations should be made annually; that each Congress should have the right to take up and examine the estimates and determine what appropriations are necessary. I repeat, I am not in favor of legislation the only effect of which, so far as I can see, will be to enact with reference to these bonds a law irrevocable for the next thirty years, and to add thirty cents on the dollar to the value of the bonds in the pockets of men who have bought them up as a speculation.

Mr. HUNTON. I wish to say only a word or two in opposition to the amendment of my friend from Illinois, [Mr. EDEN.] He has just read a law which binds the Government of the United States to guarantee the payment of interest on the 3.65 bonds. The section under consideration, and which he moves to strike out, does no more than provide for the payment of this interest, which is already guaranteed by the Government. We know that year by year the Congress of the United States makes an appropriation to pay the interest on these 3.65 bonds; and the only thing additional provided in this eighth section is that, when a computation is made of the 50 per cent. to be paid by the Government and the 50 per cent. to be paid by the people of the District, whatever the Government shall have paid as interest on the 3.65 bonds shall be credited to the Government in that computation.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HUNTON. Certainly.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) If the Government is bound now, why is it necessary to insert this section?

Mr. HUNTON. Because year by year we have this fight over an appropriation to pay the interest on the 3.65 bonds, and it is a fight that always results in the payment. Now this is simply a general provision for the payment of this interest as it accrues and for crediting the Government of the United States with the payment in the division of the expenses between the Government and the people of the District.

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HUNTON. Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. I understand that the gentleman, as a member of a committee of the Forty-fourth Congress, fixed upon 40 per cent. as the fair proportion of expenses of the District to be assumed by the General Government. Now this bill proposes that the Government of the United States shall pay 50 per cent. How does the gentleman justify himself in supporting this increased proportion?

Mr. HUNTON. I have already attempted to explain that matter which properly belongs to a section already passed and not now under consideration. I will, however, for the gentleman's benefit repeat the explanation. The bill now under consideration adds to the expenses of the District government enough to justify fully the different rule here proposed as to the proportionate share of expense to be borne by the United States Government.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I desire to state in a few words as possible why in my judgment this section should be stricken out. If as stated by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTON,] the Government is already bound for the payment of this interest, then there is no necessity for inserting this section. In addition to that there is already pending in this House a bill (I think it is on the Speaker's table) in which this subject is provided for as a question entirely distinct from the formation of a government for the District of Columbia.

Mr. HUNTON. I beg the gentleman's pardon. That is a provision for one single payment of interest.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) On the contrary, if I understand correctly, it is a Senate bill providing that the Government of the United States shall be permanently bound until the payment of the principal of these 3.65 bonds.

Mr. HUNTON. I was not aware of any such bill.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) My impression is that the provision of the bill is what I have just stated.

Mr. HENDEE. I think the Speaker will find that there is no such bill.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I will ascertain the exact fact in a moment.

Mr. HENDEE. Mr. Chairman, the Government of the United States has already agreed to take care of this interest; but as the law stands to-day (I ask the attention of the gentleman from Illinois to this point) there is no provision for the payment of the interest by anybody. The commissioners of the District have no power to pay it; the Treasurer of the United States has no power to pay it.

Mr. EDEN. If the interest is provided for annually as it becomes due, is not that sufficient?

Mr. HENDEE. The gentleman says that this interest may be provided for annually. Mr. Speaker, we have attempted at every session within the last three or four years to pass a permanent law on this subject; and I understood the gentleman to admit the other day that, in his judgment, the United States Government was honestly and honorably bound to take care of this interest and of the principal, if it should not be paid on the maturity of the bonds.

Mr. EDEN. I presume the effort will be to saddle the principal on the Government, of course.

Mr. HENDEE. This bill provides that the Government of the United States shall pay 50 per cent. of the expenses of the District, and that the people of the District shall pay the remaining 50 per cent. It provides further that as this interest becomes due the Treasurer of the United States shall pay it, and the amount shall be charged up as a part of the 50 per cent, which is to be the proportionate share of expense to be borne by the Government of the United States. In other words the Government will not pay this interest, but will simply advance it from year to year as so much of its proportion of the expenses of the District. That is all.

I have no objection to the amendment saying this shall not change the relation of the General Government in regard to these District bonds.

Mr. EDEN. It does change the relation of the General Government in regard to these District bonds, and if it does not there is no use of having it.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I desire to correct a statement I made a few minutes ago in so far as I stated there was a Senate bill pending of like purport. The question has been acted on separately by a committee of this House, the Committee of Ways and Means, and reported, and is now upon the Calendar.

Mr. HENDEE. It has gone to the Calendar where it will never be reached.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) But it is a subject which should be considered separately and distinctly by the House and by Congress rather than in the form of a provision in a bill establishing a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia.

Mr. HENDEE. It has been reported separately each year.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) That shows probably it ought to be discussed and beaten another year.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I simply desire to say there is not a member of the Committee for the District of Columbia nor a member of this House who goes further than I go in protesting the Government of the United States is not bound to pay that 3.65 bonded debt. The bill to which the honorable Speaker of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, has referred, reported by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SAYLER] from the Committee of Ways and Means, is not such a bill as will ever receive my support or approval in this House. And while I deny the Government of the United States is bound for the principal of the 3.65 bonded indebtedness of $13,000,000, I am frank to admit that the law does bind the Government for the interest upon those 3.65 bonds. The law provides the Government shall see that interest is paid, but the law goes no further except to bind this Government to see the District of Columbia makes provision to meet the principal of the bond.

Now, sir, if this bill, or if this section of the bill, in any way whatever bound the Government to meet the principal of that $13,000,000 of debt, I would be the last man to give my assent to its passage, but the six lines which constitute this eighth section, in no wise touches the question of the obligation of the principal. It simply does what the law already requires, that we shall meet the interest on this debt. You may say if that be all there is no use in enacting it as a section to this bill. I grant you that, but there is one thing more it does do: this gives to the United States Treasury a credit upon its 50 per cent.

contribution to the expenditures of this District of Columbia for every dollar it thus advances to meet the obligations which already rest upon it under the law. For that reason, it is not as the advocate or the friend of the 3.65 bonds, but it is from the stand-point of the opponent of the 3.65 bonds, it is from my own stand-point, declaring this Government is not responsible for the payment of that debt. I advocate the passage of this section because it gives to the Federal Treasury a credit of 50 per cent. in conducting the affairs of the District of Columbia. It gives a credit in that direction for every dollar it pays on the interest of these bonds.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. EDEN and Mr. HANNA rose. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. EDEN. I have only a word to say.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HANNA.]

Mr. HANNA. I have been already cut out once or twice, and I hope I will be permitted to proceed.

Now, Mr. Speaker, to the end there may be no misunderstanding about this section, and to the end it may not be claimed by the passage of this section the Government has committed itself to the payment of the principal of this 3.65 bonded debt, I ask the following amendment be appended to this eighth section:

Provided, Nothing herein contained shall be hereafter so construed as to commit the Government to the payment of the principal of said bonds.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) That has never been asserted by anybody that we are in the least degree to pay the principal of the 3.65 bonded debt.

Mr. HANNA. It is a wise thing, then, to make the provision here, so that years after the passage of a section of this kind it may not be argued that the Congress of the United States intended by the passage of this section to assume that bonded debt. It seems to me right and prudent under the circumstances to guard against any such construction being given to our Government.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I should like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky a question, whether in fact the adoption of this eighth section does not make us bound for all time for the payment of the interest on the 3.65 bonds in the same way as provided in the bill reported from the Committee of Ways and Means by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I answer and say, the bill to which the honorable Speaker refers, it is true, is on the Calendar, but it is not before the House for consideration. I have read that bill—

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) That is not an answer.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I have read the bill, but I have not examined it with such particularity as would warrant me to go into a discussion of it; but this I wish to add by way of answer, that this section does make provision for the payment of the interest on these bonds. The law already does that. This section goes further and does that which induces me to support it: it declares for every dollar the Government shall advance to pay the interest on these bonds the Government shall receive a credit on it of 50 per cent. toward the expenses of the District. It is for that reason I am in favor of it.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) The effect both of the eighth section of this bill, and of the bill which the gentleman from Kentucky speaks of, is exactly the same. If either this eighth section should become a law, or if the bill reported from the Committee of Ways and Means should become a law, the Government will be in like manner in both cases bound for the interest on this debt. And the House may as well understand distinctly that when they vote for this eighth section they practically vote to make the Government bound for the interest on the 3.65 bonds.

Mr. BLACKBURN. May I ask the Speaker a question?

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) Certainly.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I admit the operation of the eighth section is just as the honorable gentleman puts it. But I desire him to answer this question: Is not the Government of the United States now bound to pay that interest?

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) Not until the District makes default. And I am for compelling the District first to make every effort itself to pay this interest on the 3.65 bonds before I recognize its right to put its hand into the Treasury of the United States and take out therefrom the difference between what it is able or willing to pay and the amount which has to be paid to the 3.65 bondholders.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am sure there is no difference between the gentleman and myself as to that. But if the Government is to go on paying the interest on these bonds as it is now bound to do under the law, what I desire is that we shall have a credit for it under the 50 per cent. arrangement.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Oregon. If you pass this bill, will not the Government have to pay the interest without question?

[Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) Will the Chair declare what the question is, that we may vote understandingly?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HANNA] to the eighth section, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the section these words:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to commit the Government to the payment of the principal of said bonds.

Mr. ELAM. I understood that the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EDEN] was pending.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EDEN] is to strike out section 8. The amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HANNA] is to perfect the section which it is proposed to strike out, and that amendment is first in order to be voted on.

The question being taken on Mr. HANNA's amendment, it was adopted.

The question recurred on the motion of Mr. EDEN to strike out the eighth section as amended; and being taken the Speaker pro tempore announced that in the opinion of the Chair the "noes" had it.

Mr. EDEN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, there were—ayes 26, noes 98.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the whole vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ALDRICH. I move that the House take a recess until half past seven o'clock.

The question being taken on Mr. ALDRICH's motion, there were—ayes 82, noes 74.

Mr. FELTON. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. ALDRICH and Mr. HENDEE were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 62, noes 94.

So the motion to take a recess was not agreed to.

Mr. BURCHARD. I move that the further consideration of this bill be postponed until to-morrow morning after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. EDEN. I object to that.

Mr. HENDEE. We can finish the bill now in a very few moments.

[Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. CONGER. What was the result of the vote on ordering the yeas and nays?

Mr. EDEN. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion for a recess.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That call is made too late. The question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EDEN] to strike out the section, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered. Pending that a motion was made that the House take a recess, which motion was lost.

Mr. CONGER. I call for tellers on the question of ordering the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The call is made too late. Other business has intervened.

Mr. BURCHARD. I have moved that the further consideration of this bill be postponed until to-morrow after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to a point of order. I submit that that motion is not in order. This is the third Monday of the month, which is assigned for District business after two o'clock, and this bill is considered as a part of the business in order on that day, and when it goes over to-day it goes over till the next day assigned for District of Columbia business.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Not if the House orders otherwise.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair overrules the point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois. The bill before the House is a special order, subject to the control of the House at any time.

Mr. BEEBE. I move that the House now take a recess till half past seven o'clock, and upon that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CLYMER. No business has intervened since the last vote.

Mr. BEEBE. I submit that business has intervened, and that my motion is in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] to move that the consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow morning after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. EDEN. Is it in order to move that the House do now adjourn?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion is in order.

Mr. EDEN. I make that motion.

The question being taken, the Speaker pro tempore announced that in the opinion of the Chair the noes had it.

Mr. EDEN. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, there were ayes 19, not a sufficient number.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. ROBBINS. I call for tellers on the motion to adjourn.

The question being taken on ordering tellers, there were ayes 11, not one-fifth of a quorum.

So tellers were refused, and the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

The question being taken on Mr. BURCHARD's motion, there were—ayes 114, noes 38.

Mr. EDEN. I call for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered, only fourteen members voting therefor. So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. BURCHARD moved to reconsider the order just made; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced the passage of the following bills and joint resolution; in which concurrence was requested.

A bill (S. No. 35) to repeal the bankrupt law;

A bill (S. No. 134) making further appropriation for continuing the improvements of the Galveston Harbor, in the State of Texas; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 23) providing for the distribution and sale of the new edition of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The message further announced that the Senate insisted on its amendments disagreed to, to a bill (H. R. No. 3740) to provide for deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, and for prior years, and for other purposes, asked for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed as managers of such conference on its part Mr. BLAINE, Mr. WINDOM, and Mr. BECK.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BEEBE. I move that the House take a recess until half-past seven o'clock.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to move to suspend the rules and pass a bill. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the unfinished business coming up by agreement of the House, and it is the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] to refer the joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Maryland to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union in preference to the Committee on the Judiciary or to a special committee.

Mr. REAGAN. I move to postpone the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order, allowed by unanimous consent, was laid aside at two o'clock for consideration of the business from the Committee for the District of Columbia. When said business is disposed of the House resumes the business interrupted at the hour named, and the Chair thinks it cannot be postponed, having been allowed by unanimous consent.

Mr. BEEBE. I rise to a question of order. I was recognized by the Chair as the gentleman from New York, and made a motion that the House take a recess.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BEEBE. I desire to press that motion now. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. FOSTER. I hope the gentleman from New York will yield to me for a moment, to make a motion to concur in a request of the Senate for a committee of conference.

Mr. BEEBE. No; I will yield for nothing.

Mr. ALDRICH. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken on Mr. ALDRICH's motion; and on a division, there were—ayes 39, noes 111.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The question recurred on Mr. BEEBE's motion.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask the House to consent to a committee of conference asked by the Senate on the bill (H. R. No. 3740) to provide for deficiencies in the appropriation for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

Mr. EWING. I object.

[Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BEEBE.]

Mr. BURCHARD. I submit that the motion is not in order pending the motion to suspend the rules, and I understood the Speaker to say that the regular order came over from Monday last; which was the motion to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. The motion the gentleman from Illinois alludes to will be in order when it is reached. The Chair will state the exact position of business. In case the House will not adjourn, as it has agreed not to adjourn, the first business in order is the motion of the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. MILLS,] to refer the memorial from the Legislature of Maryland to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. The question of reference being disposed of the call of the States will still rest with the State of Maryland, then Virginia, and so on through the list. After the call of the States and Territories for bills and joint resolutions shall have been concluded, then the question will recur upon the motion pending from last Monday, and unfinished on that day, which is to suspend the rules and pass a bill. There cannot be two motions to suspend the rules pending at the same time under the same rule of authority.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I would ask whether or not, under the order of the House, the bill to establish a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia will not come up for consideration immediately after the reading of the Journal to-morrow morning?

The SPEAKER. That bill is unfinished business, and has a right to come up after the reading of the Journal to-morrow, and from day to day thereafter until disposed of. The Chair is advised that it was taken up by unanimous consent to-day during the time allotted under the rules to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. COX, of New York. Does it cut out the morning hour to-morrow morning?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. COX, of New York. Will not the morning hour come in after the District of Columbia bill is disposed of?

The SPEAKER. The District of Columbia bill comes up to-morrow and every day until disposed of, after the reading of the Journal; but in addition to that the House has determined to-day to postpone it until after the reading of the Journal to-morrow, thus reaffirming its status.

Mr. BEEBE. Is debate in order while a motion is pending to take a recess?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is always in order to inform the House as to the business before it, so as to have an intelligent decision.

Mr. HALE. Can any of this business, to which the Chair has referred, come up to-night if the House takes a recess?

The SPEAKER. No; because the House, by unanimous consent, allowed this evening's session to be set aside exclusively for debate upon the tariff bill.

Mr. CARLISLE. This being the day set apart by the rules of the House for the consideration of bills reported by the Committee for the District of Columbia, I would ask the Chair what has become of those bills.

The SPEAKER. There was none reported that the Chair is advised of; and the committee failed to assert and has lost its right to make reports until the third Monday of next month. [After a pause.] The Chair is reminded by the Clerk that Friday evening of this week has been set apart for the consideration of reports from the Committee for the District of Columbia. Its right to report will then come in force.

Mr. CARLISLE. I have been informed that there have been some bills reported from that committee.

The SPEAKER. Then they are in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SPARKS. I move that the House now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. That motion has just been voted down.

Mr. BEEBE. I move that the House now take a recess until half past seven o'clock.

The question was taken upon the motion of Mr. BEEBE; and upon a division there were—ayes 92, noes 75.

Before the result of this vote was announced,

Mr. WILLIS, of New York, called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WILLIS, of New York, and Mr. CARLISLE were appointed.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CONGER. If the House should determine neither to take a recess nor to adjourn, but should continue in session, then if the time shall come, by the disposition of other business, for a suspension of the rules, the matter could be reached in that way.

The SPEAKER. The first vote on a suspension of the rules would be on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. CONGER. Suppose that motion is disposed of, then another motion to suspend the rules would be in order.

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 89, noes 66.

So the motion of Mr. BEEBE was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until half-past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at seven o'clock and thirty minutes p. m. and was called to order by the Speaker.

Mr. SAYLER. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the special order for this evening.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. COVERT in the chair.)

THE TARIFF BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of House bill No. 4106, to impose duties upon foreign imports, to promote trade and commerce, to reduce taxation, and for other purposes. By order of the House, the session of this evening is for debate only upon this bill, no business whatever to be transacted. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MCKINLEY. Mr. Chairman, it is a matter of very considerable regret that the distinguished gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD,] who presented this tariff bill to the House on Tuesday last, should have failed in his opening speech to give any explanation of the details of the bill. Indeed at the very outset of his remarks he disavowed all intention of giving to the House any explanation or analysis of the provisions of the bill upon which the House will be expected to take action at no distant day.

Following his example, I shall content myself, for the present at least, with a discussion of some of the general features of the bill and their effect upon the business of the country. I am opposed to the pending bill from a high sense of duty, a duty imposed upon me by the very strong convictions which I entertain, after an examination of its several features, that should the proposed measure become a law it will be nothing short of a public calamity. It scales down the much needed revenues of the Government. Although this proposition was denied by the distinguished gentleman who opened this debate, [Mr. WOOD,] I desire in this connection to call attention to a carefully prepared statement by Mr. Young, superintendent of the Bureau of Statistics, in which it is shown that the revenues to be derived under this bill, if it shall become a law, estimated upon the basis of the importations of 1877, will fall short of the revenues of that year something more than $9,000,000.

This bill not only impairs the revenues of the Government, but it is a blow well directed at the mining, the manufacturing, and the industrial classes of this country. It will not be denied that any material readjustment of the tariff system at this time is a delicate and hazardous undertaking, and should be approached if at all with great care and circumspection, with a thorough knowledge of the business and commerce of the country, their needs and relations, which it proposes to affect. Its consideration should be unincumbered by individual or sectional interests, and should be free from any attempt or desire to promote the interests of one class at the expense of the many. The highest good to the greatest number should guide any legislation which may be had. I believe if this rule should be adopted the proposed measure will find little favor in this House.

I do not doubt that free trade or its "next of kin," tariff reform, might be of temporary advantage to a very limited class of our population and would be hailed with delight by the home importer and foreign manufacturer; but no one, I predict, who has thoughtfully considered the subject and its effect upon our present state and condition can fail to discern that free trade or tariff reform introduced into this country now will produce still further business depression and increased commercial paralyzation.

Our once prosperous manufactories are barely able now with the present duties upon imports to keep their wheels in motion; and what, I ask, must become of them if the foreign-manufactured product which competes with the manufactured product of the United States shall be suffered to come into this country free of duty or at reduced rates of duty? Mr. Chairman, there can be but one result, which I shall endeavor to present later in the course of my remarks.

If a change is necessary in the present tariff system or in some cases a reduction is demanded for the general good, then I answer that such reduction or change should be the work of time, and not hastily or inconsiderately made. Any change, however seemingly trifling, will seriously operate upon the business interests of this country, will unsettle trade and disturb values. Even a discussion of the question is a terror to the commercial classes; and we have discovered since the report of the subcommittee of the Committee of Ways and Means was given to the House and to the country a marked disturbance in every avenue of trade and labor.

There can be no justification for an immediate change of the present system. If a new policy is to be inaugurated or departures are to be made from the old, then they should have reference to a period of time in the future sufficiently remote from the present to enable business men and trades-people to prepare for the new order of things and adjust their trade conformably to it. We want in this country no sudden shock to further paralyze business. A law passed now to go into effect at once as proposed by this bill or in the near future would be without justification on the part of this House, and I had almost said an act of criminality.

The business interests of this country can stand no additional burdens; they ought not to be subjected to them; and the party which is responsible for them will be held to fullest accountability.

There is no national demand, I assert, for the passage of this bill; no popular appeal is pressing for its enactment; no public necessity requiring such legislation; no interest is suffering for want of it. There is no plethora in the revenues or overflow of the Treasury justifying it. Neither the producer nor the consumer wants it; but the almost universal sentiment of this country is for the defeat of this bill here and now, without concession, compromise, or amendment.

There can be no mistake, Mr. Chairman, as to the popular judgment upon this measure. Scarcely an interest in this whole country but has petitioned this body, commencing at its extra session in October and continuing down to the present moment, remonstrating against this proposed legislation. These petitions come not as in former years, from the manufacturer and the producer alone, but the farmer, the mechanic, the laboring-man, and the miner all unite in protesting against this legislation, declaring it injurious to them as a whole and as a class.

I am reminded in this connection of a single petition, signed by over one hundred thousand laboring-men of this country—coming from seventeen States of the Union, brought here by three of its own number, demanding an increase of at least 10 per cent. upon the present rates of duty.

Mr. Chairman, I doubt if any of the gentlemen of this House have read the memorial of these laboring-men, for by a single objection it was excluded from the pages of the RECORD, and I propose at this time to read it:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

We, citizens of the United States, believing that the permanent prosperity of the people of the United States can be secured only by the complete protection against foreign competition of all domestic industry, do respectfully petition for a revision of existing tariff laws by an increase of at least 10 per cent. of the present rates, and especially that, to prevent frauds, the same imports be levied upon old as upon new railroad iron; and that all imported iron shall be subject to a protective duty.

We do further petition that in such revision the rates upon all imposts be adjusted to accomplish, as nearly as possible, these results: First, absolute protection of all domestic products in the domestic market; second, the largest revenue upon all imported luxuries not produced in this country; and, third, to permit all uncompetitive articles of necessity or of general use, as tea and coffee, to go to the people untaxed.

This, I say, was signed by over one hundred thousand laboring-men of the country. And you will observe that it does not demand a reduction of the duties upon imports, but it demands an increase, and in case of a revision of the tariff it announces the true principles on which such revision should be made; and these principles have been wholly ignored by the committee which prepared this bill, as I shall show hereafter.

Now, I ask if these appeals are to go unheeded. I want to know if any respect is to be paid to the popular judgment on this subject. And I speak to the gentlemen on the other side of the House, who in season and out of season upon this floor have declared their affection for the poor laboring-men, and I had almost said during the first three months of this session of Congress had filled the daily Record with professions of love for them—I ask you now if your service in their cause is to be mere “lip service,” or will you unite with the majority of this side of the House in defeating a measure so much in opposition to the development of the material industries of the country and so obnoxious to the people at large?

I trust you will, and it will be no longer said of you that “you keep the word of promise to the ear and break it to the hope.”

But, Mr. Chairman, the defeat of this measure is not only demanded by the popular judgment of all classes, but it is alike the dictate of every just principle of morals and of fair dealing. The present tariff has existed almost without alteration for the past sixteen years and every effort in the direction of a substantial change within that time has been rewarded with defeat. Men have embarked in business under the existing law regulating the tariff; great enterprises have been projected; vast amounts of capital are invested all over the country upon the faith of the existing law and relying upon its permanence, and to-day millions of dollars are invested in buildings, machine-shops, and factories all over this land, built up under the fostering care of protection. It is proposed by this bill, without any note of preparation to the manufacturing classes, without any word of warning, without any service being made upon them, by a swift and certain blow to destroy these vast investments of capital and labor.

In my own district, imbedded with a wealth of mineral resources, dotted all over with factories, machine-shops, mills and furnaces, the disaster which must result from the passage of the pending bill cannot be estimated. The rich mines of coal abounding in the counties of Stark, Mahoning, and Columbiana, which by reason of the limited demand under existing tariff are unable to furnish full time and fair employment to the operatives, will be forced to diminish their productions and the miners will be driven into other avenues of labor already overcrowded. The mills and furnaces, factories and machine-shops situated in these counties accessible to rich mines of coal and ore, and which are famous for their iron and steel and agricultural implements, productions that have struggled with unyielding courage through the panic of 1873 and the distressing years which have followed and even at the meager wages now paid are keeping thousands of families from actual want, must, I am assured, if the present bill becomes a law, put out their fires, while the potteries of East Liverpool, which are employing a thousand men, after a bitter struggle with foreign capital and the established trade of European manufacturers, must also surrender. So with the steel interests, the wool and woollen interests, the flax interest, and the bagging interest; and what is true of these special interests in the localities I have named is true of the many industries the country over.

These industries, as I have already said, were commenced and have grown and developed under the wise and fostering protection thrown around them by the legislation of this country. Capital has been put into manufacturing everywhere, relying upon this law. Contracts have been made upon the faith of it, and I say that it has ripened into a vested right, if not a legal vested right, the highest equitable and moral right as to existing interests at least.

I was glad to observe the other day in the speech of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Wood] that he was forced to admit a moral right existing in the manufactures of this country for the continuance of this same protection, and I call your attention to a brief extract which I have taken from his speech upon this subject:

I recognize—

Says the gentleman from New York—

in consequence of the present tariff a moral right in the interest affected for a little longer enjoyment of the assistance so liberally dispensed to them.

Even he admits that there is a high moral right resting upon the Congress of this country to continue still further the protection which in the past has been given to the industries of the country. I can assure the gentleman that his bill does not recognize this right, but as to many industries wholly ignores it.

Free trade and tariff reform are captivating phrases, and to one unacquainted with their true meaning and import are deceptive, while the arguments urged in their behalf are alike deceptive and delusive.

The chief consideration that is urged by the advocates of free trade or tariff reform, so called, is that the duties fall upon the consumer; in a word, that the great mass of consumers in this country will get their products, their goods, their merchandise at a very much less price than they now do if free trade or tariff reform prevailed instead of the present policy.

Mr. Chairman, history and experience both teach us that the agricultural products of this country have in the main increased in price since the tariff of 1824, but that substantially all manufactured articles, articles that have been protected by that or successive tariffs, have been secured to the great body of the consumers at a very much less cost than they formerly were. And, Mr. Chairman, the price of articles have not only been diminished and the consumer benefited by the reduced price, but the quality of the article has in every instance been improved.

Home competition will always bring prices to a fair and reasonable level, and prevent extortion and robbery. Success, or even apparent success, in any business or enterprise will incite others to engage in like enterprises; and then follows healthful strife, which is the life of business, which inevitably results in cheapening the article produced.

I assure you, Mr. Chairman, that the European product costs the American consumer very much less than it otherwise would but for the existence of domestic rivalry. Remove American competition from foreign manufacture and importation, and the price of every article bought which is manufactured abroad will increase, and we will be forced to pay whatever grasping avarice might dictate. Our principal business will be to send abroad to enrich the coffers of foreign nations what money remains in this country. Be assured if the tariff is disturbed as proposed, very much of American competition will be destroyed.

These familiar propositions are aptly illustrated by the testimony and experience of foreign manufacturers, from which for a very little time I propose now to draw. I only use the testimony which I get from one branch of manufacture; but the testimony in this case, and conclusions to be drawn from it, I venture to assert is true of all the other industries which come in competition with American industries.

The old Staffordshire granite whiteware, so universally used in this country for a great many years, has almost disappeared from the American market, and is rapidly giving place to our own manufactured article in this branch of industry. The condition of the American market, the fact that the European trade was losing its hold upon this country, led in 1877 to an arbitration between the owners of the potteries at Staffordshire in England and their operatives, touching a proposed reduction of 10 per cent. in the wages of labor to enable them to compete with the American manufactured ware. The arbitration was held at Hanley, England, before J. C. Davies, esq., of London, umpire. I read you the testimony of Mr. Shaw, an English manufacturer, largely engaged in making this ware at Staffordshire. He says:

He found from time to time, first one article and then another, was being manufactured in America at a less rate than here. The boast of America was no empty boast, that in ten years, at the rate they were going on, they would supersede the use of British crockery in the United States.

This is the testimony of an English manufacturer, and must be very gratifying to the American manufacturer and to Americans generally.

In ten years at the rate they are going, they will supersede the use of British crockeryware in this country.

Do you object to this, my free-trade advocate? And would you check “the rate,” by unfriendly legislation, which in time will place Americans upon a footing so firm and in a position so encouraging? If this be your purpose you have only to pass the present measure.

Again, as to the quality of American ware. Mr. Shaw produces before the umpire samples of white granite ware of American manufacture, and testifies that they are sold at fully 10 per cent. less than English goods; he was convinced that Americans had superior materials to what they had in the Staffordshire potteries or they could not produce the articles they did; they had every material necessary; the difficulty as to strength and soundness was gotten over now, and in his opinion he saw no reason why, in a short time, they would not overcome each and every difficulty.

And I am justified in assuring this House if Congress will but let them alone they will overcome each and every difficulty which is now or hereafter may come in their way.

Mr. Ellsmore, another English manufacturer, testified that he was engaged in the American trade, had been to the United States and had had opportunities of seeing the quality of their goods; his impression was that the goods they were now making were superior to our own; he was himself exclusively in the American trade, and had had the greatest difficulty in retaining his trade there; at one time he was unable to supply as much as was demanded, but circumstances had changed, the demand had been nearly equal to the capabilities of supply by him.

The “circumstances” referred to by the witness, it is scarcely necessary I should tell you, have been produced by our manufacturers, under the judicious protection now afforded; and if you want to alter these circumstances and restore Mr. Ellsmore to his former position, when with all his capacity he was not able to supply the American demand, you have only to alter existing law as proposed by a majority of the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. Shaw is recalled, and resumes his testimony as follows:

When in America he had taken the trouble to go through the leading manufactures, and his impression as to their prospects of successfully competing with this country [Europe] was that unless we could produce at a very much less cost than at the present time, and the tariff was reduced, the trade of this district was limited to a time. But if with the tariff at 40 per cent. (and that is the existing tariff) they could here produce goods at as cheap a rate as they could, they would be able to keep the growth and the increase of the make in the States in check, and thus preserve the amount of trade that must otherwise go from the potteries.

The tariff must be reduced in the interest of the foreign potteries or their trade will be greatly impaired, and to gratify them, to promote this industry in Europe, to build up theirs at the expense of ours, is the purpose and effect of the proposed bill. This would be unwise, un-American, and unpatriotic.

Mr. Shaw closes his testimony with a significant question which he propounds to the umpire:

Is it your opinion that if Americans had enjoyed and benefited by a system of free trade as we have in this country for the past twenty years, that they would have been in a better position than we are at the present time?

The umpire answers, "I do not see how I can apply it, although it is a very important question." The question is a strange and contradictory one, for after Mr. Shaw has been complaining of the distressed condition of their business under free trade and the encouraging prospects of ours under a tariff policy, he gravely inquires, "If the United States had enjoyed a system of free trade as we have would they have been in any better condition than we are to-day?"

Certainly not, Mr. Chairman; but acting the part of wisdom the Congress of the United States has up to this time persistently refused to impose upon this people a policy which upon Mr. Shaw's own testimony has depressed and almost disorganized the pottery trade in Europe.

But I am anticipating. Mr. Edwin Powell, an English manufacturer and a party to the arbitration, makes the following truthful and forcible reply:

My opinion is that if there had been no protective tariff America would not have been in the same position to-day.

This is the whole story, and completes the doctrine of the protective system. This opinion is well worthy the careful consideration of the American statesman. It confirms all that has ever been claimed for the protective system. Our proud position to-day is due in great part—indeed I had almost said in most part—to the wise protection and the fostering care thrown around American manufactures and labor and enterprise by the early statesmen of this country and continued down to the present time. No other policy would ever have given us the advanced stage in manufactures that we enjoy to-day.

It will be seen from the testimony to which I have called your attention (and there is more of the same kind which I might present from this arbitration, for it is all printed and given to the public) that the policy of the manufacturers of Europe is to keep "the growth and the increase in the United States in check;" and it can be done, say they in their testimony, in one way only, and that is by a reduction of the tariff. The American Congress is to-day engaged in that, to the European trade, commendable work; and for what purpose? To keep the growth of manufactures in the United States in check and increase the board of trade returns in Europe. If we did not know better, Mr. Chairman, we would be justified in believing that we were in the British house of commons, legislating for British subjects, rather than charged with the high and sacred duty of making laws for the citizens of the United States, to protect them in their labor, their industries, and their investments.

Another significant fact is made apparent from the testimony to which I have called your attention, that since our American potteries have been established and have got some hold upon the trade of this country, graniteware has decreased in price from 30 to 35 per cent. Another fact which comes out in the testimony is that we pay to the workmen in this country in the same line of industry at least 50 per cent. more than the English manufacturers pay to their workmen. While upon this subject it is proper I should say that although the proposed bill upon its face reduces the duty only 5 per cent. upon common white graniteware, the old duty being 40 and the proposed duty being 35, and upon first examination would seem not to seriously operate upon this industry, yet upon a more careful examination it is found to be sufficient to very seriously cripple if not wholly destroy it in the United States.

I want to call your attention right here to the difference between the two rates of duty, the 40 per cent. under the present rate and the 35 per cent. as proposed by this bill; and I give you the average net price per package of this class of goods imported into this country, estimating two average assortments of best goods and one of second. The average net price is £6 6s. Under existing law what would be the duty? I give you the figures below:

UNDER PRESENT LAW.		£.	s.	d.
Net cost of goods.....		6	6	0
Add package.....		16	0	0
Inland freight and charges.....		10	0	0
		7	12	0
Add 2½ per cent. customs.....		3	9
		7	15	9
Total value of goods.....		7	15	9
Duty 40 per cent.....		3	2	4
		10	18	3
UNDER PROPOSED BILL.		£.	s.	d.
Net cost of goods.....		6	6	0
Add 5 per cent.....		6	4
		6	10	0
Duty 35 per cent.....		2	12	11
		8	22	11

Which is an absolute reduction of over 15 per cent. And yet they tell us that they have only reduced the duty 5 per cent. upon this class of goods.

The very meager profits now enjoyed by this trade and the great expenses to which they are still subjected by way of experiments and otherwise are enough, I am assured by the leading manufacturers of the country, to endanger this growing industry in the United States; and operators and operatives have united in a protest against this measure.

But this is not all. In the line of decorated wares they will be even more seriously affected than in the branch to which I have just called your attention. This is almost new in the pottery art in America, and may truly be said to be in its infancy. The proposed duty is 45 per cent. and the present duty is 50 per cent., and although the reduction is the same as on the former class of goods it will more seriously affect this special interest, because the latter has not reached that degree of perfection which the former has attained.

This class of ware is exciting great interest among potters, and the United States trade is commanding special consideration, as will be seen by an article which I have clipped from the Pottery and Glass Trades Review of January, 1878, an English publication:

During the past month good shipments have been made for America, and orders from that country are now coming in very freely. * * * There seems to be a growing taste for more artistic pottery than they have formerly had, and no doubt if our own manufacturers only lay themselves open to meet this demand they may yet show a considerable increase in the board of trade returns.

In the same publication I find a significant fact for the encouragement of the English manufacturer: that the duty on this class of goods is to be reduced by Mr. Wood's tariff bill.

Now the question which the American Congress is required to settle is, shall we concede to the demands of the British manufacturers and producers, to the injury of our own, or will we continue to throw a reasonable protection around our own industries, and thus develop the material interests of the country? I have given you the testimony of the English manufacturer; let me now present the statement of our own. I quote from the report of the United States Pottery Association for January, 1877:

The trade of the United States is of more value to England, France, and Germany than all the rest of the world combined.

Under our present tariff (though not in proportion to the difference of the labor values of the rival countries, Europe and America) they cannot crush us, as they are striving hard to do. In fact they are fast losing their hold upon the market of the United States, just in proportion to the increased home production. It is evident, however, that they do not propose to lose this market without an effort commensurate with the object to be attained.

They do not disguise the fact that they are prepared, with sufficient money, to buy up newspapers and fill the country, when the proper time arrives, from Maine to California, with free-trade lecturers and pamphlets. But we have faith in the sound common sense of the people of this country. We do not believe that they are going to be deceived by the catch word, "free trade," and to their own detriment alter their tariff to suit the foreigner, thus sending their money abroad to buy that which they will have to pay double price for the moment home competition is taken off. Let the tariff be kept where it is for fifteen years longer, until our clay beds, our spar and quartz quarries become developed and properly prepared for our use, and we add to the last fifteen years fifteen more years of experience in the use and combination of our materials, we will then, with the introduction of what machinery will have been developed, bid them get this market if they can, tariff or no tariff.

We feel safe in making the prediction that, if our tariff remains as it is, long before the expiration of fifteen years the people of this country will buy both china-ware and earthenware, plain and decorated, at less than half the price they paid for it previous to the present tariff—say from 1855 to 1860; and, further, that the development of an art industry will spring out of it, rivaling the most coveted and noted productions of Europe and Asia.

But it is said, Mr. Chairman, that our present system is an obstruction to foreign trade, while the fact stands out before us, so bidding us read, that our foreign trade has uniformly increased under the tariff policy, and always when the tariff policy has been withdrawn our foreign trade has invariably diminished.

Why, sir, we are increasing in our foreign trade to-day, with all the disadvantages we now experience and all the distresses that have swept over this country for the past five years. To-day our imports and exports are increasing, and in support of this I quote from the late report of the Secretary of the Treasury, issued 1st April, 1878:

Imports and exports.	1877.	1878.
Imports, (twelve months ending February 28).....	$420, 199, 831	$475, 638, 634
Exports, (twelve months ending February 28).....	603, 631, 538	637, 757, 892

I also invite your attention to the following extract and table, which I take from Mr. Bigelow's excellent work upon the tariff policy:

The foreign trade of Russia and of the United States increased during the past ten years, under the policy of protection, in a greater ratio than that of Great Britain under the policy of free trade; and also, in a greater ratio than that of France, which the English claim as a free-trade ally.

The following comparative table shows the percentage of increase (in round numbers) in the imports and the exports of merchandise of each of the countries just mentioned during the ten years ending 1875; the mean amount of trade in 1866 and 1867 and the mean amount of trade in 1874 and 1875 being taken as the basis of computation:

Countries compared.	Increase in imports.	Increase in exports.
	Per cent.	Per cent.
Russia.....	101	81
United States.....	33	74
Great Britain.....	30	25
France.....	13	16

Those who are accustomed so inconsiderately and flippantly to denounce our tariff as prohibitory and destructive of commerce would do well to ponder these facts.

The statement shows that, in the ten years ending 1875, in Russia and the United States, countries that throw around their industries and manufactures reasonable protection, the imports in the former country increased 104 per cent. and the exports 81 per cent., while in the United States there was an increase of imports 33 per cent. and of exports 72 per cent. On the other hand, in Great Britain the imports only increased 30 per cent. and the exports 25 per cent., and in France the increase in imports was but 13 per cent. and in exports but 16 per cent.

Mr. Chairman, a wise tariff protects American industries and manufactures, while it does not destroy foreign competition. Prohibition is no part of the American system. It builds no wall about commerce and trade, shutting out the great world from us; it does not exclude foreign importation; it prevents monopolies from absorbing the wealth of this nation, while it encourages growth and enterprise among our own people. I have said that it encourages enterprise; it opens our mines; it erects our machine-shops, our furnaces, and factories; it enlarges our cities and builds up villages.

It adds to the material wealth of the nation. It enhances the value of real estate. More than that, it gives to the farmer a ready market for the products of his farm. It brings a market almost to his very door. It imparts value to many articles which he raises which otherwise would be of little or no value; articles which it would not pay to ship to a distant market have ready sale at home. It does more than this: it furnishes employment to the laborer and subsistence to the poor, and all the while is adding to the nation's wealth.

General Jackson sounds the alarm of the present proposition in the bold words which he addresses in a letter to Dr. Coleman, of Virginia. He says:

In short, sir, we have been too long subject to the policy of British merchants. It is time we became a little more Americanized, and instead of feeding the paupers and laborers of Europe, feed our own, or else in a short time by continuing our present policy we shall be paupers ourselves. It is therefore my opinion that a careful tariff is much wanted to pay our national debt and afford us the means of that defense within ourselves on which the safety and liberty of our country depend; and last, though not least, give a proper distribution to our labor, which must prove beneficial to the happiness, independence and wealth of the community.

Mr. Chairman, if in that early day a careful tariff was needed with which to pay the national debt, how much more pressing is that necessity to-day with over two thousand millions of debt hanging over the American nation. And if a careful tariff was needed then for the proper distribution of the labor of the country and to prevent pauperism, how much more overshadowing is that necessity now with thousands of men out of employment and tramping the land searching for work!

And, Mr. Chairman, Henry Clay is no less emphatic. In the United States Senate, February 12, 1832, he delivered a speech from which I now read:

The fall of that policy, [the tariff], sir, would be productive of consequences calamitous indeed. When I look to the variety of the interests involved, to the number of individuals interested, the amount of capital invested, the value of buildings erected, and the whole arrangement of the business for the prosecution of the various branches of the manufacturing arts which have sprung up under the fostering care of this Government, I cannot contemplate any evil equal to the sudden overthrow of all these interests. History can produce no parallel to the extent of the mischief which would be produced by such a disaster. The repeal of the edict of Nantes itself was nothing in comparison with it. That condemned to exile and brought to ruin a great number of persons. The most respectable portion of the population of France was condemned to exile and ruin by that measure. But in my opinion, sir, the sudden repeal of the tariff policy would bring ruin and destruction on the whole people of this country.

There is no evil, in my opinion, equal to the consequences which would result from such catastrophe.

Mr. Chairman, if contemplating in that early day the variety of interests involved, the number of individuals interested, the amount of capital invested, the value of buildings erected, the whole arrangement for the manufacturing art led the great whig statesman to draw such a picture of calamity and distress which must follow a change of the tariff policy, how much greater, how much wider and deeper that distress would be with all the conditions he has described increased and multiplied!

The founders of the Republic and its early statesmen comprehended this subject and understood that it was of the highest importance to give protection to American industry and American labor. The very second law of any kind that passed the Congress of the United States after the adoption of the Federal Constitution embodies the whole doctrine of the protective system in its first section, to wit:

Whereas it is necessary for the support of the Government, for the discharge of the debts of the United States, and the encouragement and protection of manufactures that duties be laid on goods and merchandise imported.

Revenue and protection are distinctly recognized. And if revenue was needed then to pay the obligations of the Government how greater that necessity now. If the necessity existed then for the encouragement and protection of our manufactures, what of the necessity upon us to-day, when these manufacturers, in the language of the distinguished gentleman from New York, "lie weakened and prostrated and sick almost unto death?"

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio, and Mr. SAYLER moved that, by unanimous consent, the gentleman's time be extended.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. MCKINLEY. I am greatly obliged to the gentleman and to the House for the courtesy shown in extending my time.

Mr. Chairman, we can only compete with foreign manufacturers by being placed upon an absolute equality with them, and until that equality is reached free trade or, what is little better, tariff revision is simply impracticable and vicious. We have disadvantages in the United States which can only be overcome by a wise discrimination in favor of American and against foreign manufactures.

It may be asked, what disadvantages does America labor under not common to other countries? And I answer that while we have natural advantages equal to any, skilled mechanics, improved machinery, and industrious labor comparable with the best, we lack the accumulated capital, long and well-established trade, and that other important species of capital which alone can come from experience.

Again, we pay higher wages to the labor that enters into the manufactured article. We pay a higher rate of interest for the money used in the manufacturing business of this country. Ay, more than that, there is an inequality in the shape of local taxation which in many of our manufacturing towns is very, very onerous to bear.

No man or party would be bold enough to advocate the reduction of labor as a naked proposition, but rather its increase. But, Mr. Chairman, behind this bill, underneath its provisions, as I shall attempt to show you later, is inevitable reduction of the price of labor all over the country. The price of labor to-day is inadequate to the necessities of the laboring-men, and the workmen of the country are patiently accepting the inevitable in the hope of relief and better times in the very near future. And while I would rejoice at the reduction of the rate of interest for the use of money and the decrease of local taxation, I must protest against this or any other measure which looks to the scaling down of the wages of labor, although it might enable us to compete more advantageously with the foreign manufacture or to accept free trade wholly.

The rich stores of American manufactures exhibited at the centennial exhibition at Philadelphia, rivaling the exhibits of all nations, commanded the admiration of the civilized world and was the constant wonder of the foreigner. They exceeded his expectations, and the frequent inquiry was, "What has accomplished all this advance in a single century of the Republic," and the whole answer is contained in this statement: "Chiefly in consequence of the protection afforded manufacturers by the tariff."

The bill means reduced wages to operatives. It means the closest, sharpest, competition among manufacturers at home with manufacturers abroad. It means the closest economy of the price in the article produced. And the very first step taken in the direction of economy on the part of the manufacturer is to reduce the wages he pays to his laborer; not because he loves, to do it, but because the exigencies of his business demand it. That has always been so, and the present and future will be no exception to the past.

Why, we can even see this tendency underlying the great speech of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means made on Tuesday last. He uses this language:

The total exports of iron and the manufactures of iron for the fiscal year 1877 was $8,089,540, thus showing that the apprehension arising from the competition of foreign mechanics with American workmen has now little force.

And as further showing that such apprehension is without foundation he states that—

It was put in evidence before the Committee of Ways and Means, by Mr. Roach, the celebrated American iron-ship builder, that he readily obtained workmen in Pennsylvania from fifty to sixty cents per day.

Mr. Chairman, I grant you if workmen can be obtained readily at from fifty to sixty cents a day there need be no serious apprehension arising from competition of foreign manufacturers. But if this be true, is it to remain so? Is it to continue? Is the present low price of labor, arising from causes not connected with the tariff, to be taken advantage of to inaugurate a system which will still further depress labor? The argument of the gentleman from New York, showing our ability to compete with foreign workmen and foreign manufacturers, is based upon the presumption that from fifty to sixty cents a day is what the workmen are receiving in this country, and that it is to continue. We do not want fifty-cent labor, even though it might enable us to adopt what the gentleman from New York is pleased to term "political economies purely American."

He then quotes approvingly Mr. Isaac Southerin Bell, member of Parliament, the English judge at the centennial exposition in Philadelphia, on his report upon the iron interest of the United States, in which he declares that "the increased value of labor in the United States has unduly added to the cost of iron and the demands from certain sections of the workman are now acting adversely to the true interests of the trade," which means that labor is too high; that the price of labor in the United States has unduly added to the cost of iron, and is now acting adversely to the true interests of trade.

The distinguished gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT,] in his report on the production of iron and steel in its economic and social relations, as commissioner to the Paris exposition in 1867, puts the case in its true light. This was eleven years ago, but the same principle exists to-day:

We have seen that the cost of making iron in England, Belgium, and France at the present time varies from £6 10s. to £8 per ton, and £1 additional suffices to pay its cost of transportation to the seaboard of the United States. At these parts American iron cannot possibly be delivered at less cost than $60 per ton in gold against $40 in gold for the foreign article, and the entire difference consists in the higher wages and not the larger quantity of labor required for its production in the United States where the physical, mental, and moral condition of the working classes occupy a totally different standard from their European confreres and where the wages cannot be reduced without violating our sense of the just demands of human nature.

Reduce the tariff, and labor is the first to suffer. The difference between the present and the proposed rate of duty must be made up somewhere, must be compensated in some way. As always has been the case, when economy in production is to be studied, the manufacturer looks to his pay-roll of labor and commences there first. In the language of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT,] "the difference is in the higher wages paid," and that difference must be removed; the tariff must be maintained, or the manufacturers must be destroyed.

I cite further authority upon this subject, and I read the following extract from a pamphlet issued by the American Iron and Steel Association on the 12th of February, 1878:

Protection will always be necessary if we would pay our skilled and unskilled workmen higher wages than are paid in the Old World. Protection is largely, although not wholly, a question of wages. Free trade ignores the welfare of the workmen, and therefore does not concern itself with their wages except to reduce them. If our people were content to receive the wages that are paid abroad, if they were willing to accept the scant comforts and squalid surroundings of European workmen and their families, it is possible that protection might be abandoned and our manufactures still live; but they will not be content with such rewards for their labor, nor would it be for the best interests of society and the nation that they should be. * * * A reduction of duties at this time would not only still further reduce the wages of labor, but would cause the stoppage of industrial establishments in every State of the Union, thus increasing the distress and the jealousy of workmen toward employers, which it should be the object of all wise legislation to mitigate.

I have here a comparative table of the price of labor at the ship-yards in Scotland and in America in January, 1878. I take it from a little book published by a very intelligent gentleman, Mr. Codman, which he entitles Free Ships, the Restoration of the American Carrying Trade, issued in 1878. This I am assured will serve as a fair comparison of the prices paid in the United States and in Great Britain in other branches of industry, although not by any means conclusive. The table is as follows:

Mr. Codman is a strong advocate of free ships, and uses this table for the purpose of showing that owing to the difference of the prices of labor ships cannot be built equally cheap and well in this country as abroad. He presents the real arguments of the free-trader honestly and without guile, as will be seen from the following extracts which I now read:

Now, although the figures given in the table ought to be convincing at a glance, it is easy for any one with an ordinary knowledge of arithmetic to make a close calculation of the labor difference in cost of British and American steamships of the same quality.

Naturally in this line of argument, I shall be met by the oft-repeated question: "Do you then advocate the reduction of the wages of our mechanics to the level of 'pauper labor' in Scotland?" * * * I maintain that in the particular industry of ship owning, so long as the necessity for higher wages is imposed upon us, we ought to avail ourselves of any labor 'pauper' or otherwise.

This is the whole doctrine of free trade and of tariff reform. We might as well understand the question now and here. It is a question of the price of labor, or of whether in several branches of industry we shall have any labor at all.

Mr. Chairman, self-preservation is the first law of nature, as it is and should be of nations. The general welfare is of paramount importance, and any measure which does not keep this steadily in view, which does not foster and encourage American labor and American industry, is in opposition to the great law of life, and subversive of the principles upon which governments are established. We want to be independent in that broad and comprehensive sense, strong within ourselves, self-supporting and self-sustaining in all things.

It is our duty and we ought to protect as sacredly and assuredly the labor and the industry of the United States as we would protect her honor from taint or her territory from invasion. We ought to take care of our own nation and her industries first. We ought to produce for ourselves as far as practicable, and then send as much abroad as is possible, the more the better. If our friends abroad think this position illiberal they have only to bring their capital and energy to this country, and then they will share with us equally in all things.

This was the policy of England all through the early years of her history, only tenfold more rigorous. Down to 1842 her tariff amounted to absolute prohibition, and it was only when capital had accumulated, vast industries were built up, and well-established trade was secured, that she sought other markets. With skilled mechanics, with improved machinery, with accumulated capital, and with cheap labor she believed herself able to supply the markets of the world and defy competition. Then free trade was conceived as the true and only policy, and all nations were invited to embrace this new and catholic theory of so-called political reform.

The United States did not embrace this new theory, and England is to-day seriously considering the question of abandoning free trade. The manufacturers and laboring-men of that country are discussing it, willing to flee from that which promised them increased wages and greater comforts, but which has brought them neither.

What possible pretext can there be for such legislation at this time? Not in the interest of consumers surely, for goods were never cheaper as a whole. No one is complaining of exorbitant prices. Do you sigh for a better or cheaper iron than that manufactured in the United States, or is American steel held at an unreasonable and exorbitant price? Never have their cost been lower to the consumer than now, and never their quality so good. The steel rail of American manufacture is sold at half less than what iron rails cost less than six years ago. Prices are generally down and the demand of the times is for better prices. No American interest is appealing for this experiment in legislation. The iron and steel producers do not want it, the wool-grower is not asking for it, the workingman and farmer do not desire it. Who does want it?

I listened attentively to the carefully considered speech of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD,] waiting to hear of some American interest which was demanding this new legislation, and at last I was rewarded for my patience. He sent a letter to the Clerk's desk to be read from Messrs. Worthington & Co., of Jackson, Michigan, manufacturers of agricultural implements, who declared themselves in favor of the bill, and that they were able to import steel to this country, manufacture it into agricultural implements, and send it back again at a profit. This was a strange statement and entirely inexplicable until the distinguished gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] always on the alert, stated to the House that this firm, which was well known to him, did their work with the convict labor of Michigan at thirty-two cents a day. No other statement was needed. This was the only interest in the whole country over, which the gentleman published as satisfied with the proposed change. Comment is unnecessary, for when we commence to employ convict labor I will concede free trade is practicable.

If the oft-repeated argument be true that the duty falls upon the consumer, then I ask the Committee of Ways and Means upon what principle of fairness or equity have they increased the duty on sugar, the necessity of the poor man's table, and decreased it upon silks and satins, which go to make up the elegant apparel of the rich? Or why increase the duty on other staples of the poor man's household and decrease it upon velvets, which are only accessible to the wealthy and which the independent classes alone can buy?

Again, this committee have imposed a duty of 20 cents a bushel upon wheat and they have suffered wheat ground into flour to come into this country free: an unjust discrimination against every flour manufacturer in the land. Again, they have under their bill suffered cloths, manufactured cloths, to come into this country at 50 per cent. ad valorem; and in that same bill they allow the cloths made into clothing for wearing-apparel to come in for 45 per cent. duty; a discrimination against every manufacturer of clothing, every tailor, every sewing-woman the country over.

They have reduced the duty upon scrap-iron, wrought and cast; and what will be the result? Why it will throw thousands of men out of employment and will wholly destroy the profession of the puddlers of the land.

The bill in some cases protects the raw material, while the manufactured article is practically free of duty or largely reduced.

Why should rye, oats, and Indian corn be dutiable, and buckwheat, buckwheat flour, bran, mill-feed, &c., be on the free list?

Is the duty on rye flour for revenue or protection?

During the fiscal year ended June 30, 1877, the duty on rye flour yielded a revenue of 45 cents.

And so with a number of articles to which I might call your attention. They have destroyed the entire classification of wools. They suffer non-competing and competing wools to come in at the same rate of duty. They have broken down the more reasonable classifications which have been approved by the wool-grower and accepted by the trade, and now they are all to come in at the same rate, whether we grow the wool in this country or not.

Mr. Chairman, the proposed bill is a piece of patchwork and abounds in inconsistencies. It is an attempt to conciliate two schools of political science and pleases neither. It has marched out into the broad field of compromise and come back with a few supporters, it is true, who were opposed to the original bill as reported. It is neither free trade, nor tariff reform, nor protective tariff. It has none of the virtues of either, but the glaring faults of all systems. It is an attempt to change a law which does not improve the old one. It is an experiment opposed by all experience. It introduces uncertainty into the business of this country when certainty is essential to its life. I cannot better characterize it than by quoting the language of the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. Wood] in speaking of a tariff bill pending in June, 1864, in this House. Speaking of that bill (and his words seem prophetic as applied to his own) he said: "The committee has given us a bill which I regard as an exceedingly crude and improper measure;" and that is what the country has already said of the pending bill, and it is what I believe will be the verdict of this House when a vote is reached.

What the country wants above all else at this critical period is rest—rest from legislation, safety and security as to its basis of business, certainty as to the resources of the Government, immunity from legislative tinkering. None of these are afforded by the present bill.

Mr. Chairman, much discussion has been had at this session touching the maintenance of the national credit, in all of which I most heartily concur. The national credit is of paramount importance, and nothing should be done to tarnish or impair it, nothing omitted to strengthen and improve it. But will the Congress of the United States be reminded that in no way can you more surely maintain the national credit than by assiduously maintaining the great industries of the country which for the most part constitute the nation's wealth.

There can be no permanent credit which is not based upon the labor, the capital, and the wealth of the nation. Destroy the latter, and at the same moment the former is destroyed. The bill before us impairs the revenues pledged to the Government creditor and endangers the material interests of the country. Beware lest in your effort to pattern after the English policy you do not at the same time sap the foundations and destroy the true source of all national credit. National credit is inseparably associated with national growth and prosperity, and if you touch the latter with an unfriendly hand, you will seriously injure the former.

There probably never was a period in the history of this country when business was more paralyzed and labor so depressed as the present. I need not pause to discuss the cause, (it is not the result of our policy, for free-trade England is no better,) the fact stands forth bidding us see and read that trade is everywhere languishing and willing hands can find nothing to do.

The demands for labor have been decreasing under the pinching times of the last five years, and manufactories, even with the present protection, have been fighting against the business revulsions which have swept over the country since 1873; and now that daylight is gleaming and improvement seems at hand, Congress sounds the alarm that protection is to be withdrawn, that another shock is coming, that the currents of business are to be turned aside and the existing basis of trade destroyed, and the whole business world is alarmed. And we are told that this is wise legislation, based upon sound principle.

Mr. Chairman, there never was a time in the history of this country more inauspicious than the present for the dreamer and the theorist to put into practical operation his impracticable theories of political science. The country does not want them; the business men of the country do not want them. They want quiet to recuperate their wasted forces; and I am sure I utter no sentiment new or original when I say that if this House will promptly pass the appropriation bills and other pressing legislation, following this with an immediate adjournment, the people will applaud such a course as the work of statesmen and the wisdom of men of affairs.

Summary statement by schedules of the amount of duty received from the articles enumerated in House bill No. 4106, reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, March 26, 1878, that entered into consumption in the United States during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1877, and the estimated amount of duty by the proposed bill, with the increase and decrease of each schedule.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. Chairman, it is indeed unfortunate, if not deplorable, that at this time, in view of the distressed condition of the country, we are called upon to discuss one of the most difficult questions and to solve one of the deepest problems ever submitted to an American Congress. It has hitherto strained to the utmost tension the talents of the noblest statesmen that ever graced our legislative halls, whose giant intellects were unable satisfactorily to grapple with the momentous question now presented for our consideration. I mean the American tariff. So diversified are the interests of our people that it has hitherto been impossible, and it will now be utterly impossible to legislate satisfactorily to all; consequently great dissatisfaction and injury to many interests to a very considerable extent will be the result. This is much to be regretted, as every interest should be fairly protected and proper and sufficient safeguards should be thrown around them, and the inventive and manufacturing genius of the country fully protected and amply rewarded. And it is most unfortunate at this time especially, when the country is so completely demoralized, business depressed, and thousands of our people are thrown out of employment and are nearly starving for the want of the common necessities of life, that any attempt should be made to disturb the present tariff, under which our country has hitherto prospered, and would to-day prosper, had it not been recently smitten by the greatest panic ever experienced by the people. It tends to and does unsettle business, locks up capital that would otherwise be employed in some, perhaps, mechanical enterprise, and entails an incalculable loss upon the nation. And who is it that has started this crusade against the present tariff? Not those who have invested their money in building up and sustaining our manufacturing and mechanical interests, not fair-minded and honorable business men, not manufacturers or laboring-men, not our merchant importers of foreign goods, but the greedy agents of British exporters who are striving to monopolize foreign trade, and seeking to undersell our own importers. Especially is it to open a market here for the sale of English iron, for which the English manufacturer has no home market for his surplus production, and to recover the losses sustained in the iron trade during the years 1866 and 1867, which amount to many millions of pounds. And this in the face of the fact of losses having occurred in our own country during the same periods of many millions of dollars. And it is to the iron interest, one of the greatest, if not quite the greatest industry of the country, and one in which my constituents are more particularly interested, that I shall direct the largest portion of my remarks. An interest which sprang up early in Pennsylvania, to which State more than any other one in the Union the country is indebted for the production of an article of indispensable necessity, and which has contributed more than any other one to the greatness and glory of the nation. When iron was wanted, Pennsylvania was looked to for it. And notwithstanding that different changes in tariffs from 1789 to 1873 have variously affected her interests, yet she has kept on in her grand march of benefiting by her productions every portion of the country. By this she has given employment to thousands of laborers and sent contentment and happiness to many a home. And it is a most notable fact, established by the history of the country, that all other interests have invariably been in sympathy with the iron interest, so that when it went down all other interests went down with it. And such has been the employment of so great an army of laborers that, notwithstanding its agricultural wealth and the productiveness of its soil, instead of being an exporting grain State, it now imports a very large portion of the grain now used within its limits.

By this not only her own farmers have been benefited, but others beyond her boundaries. And incalculable have been the benefits resulting from this great industry. And now, in utter disregard of all she has done in more than the last half century for the good and aggrandizement of our country, a hand is raised ready to strike a blow that will lay her quivering in the dust, and perhaps blast her prospects forever. And who is it that has raised this threatening hand? Not the masses of the people, not the laboring-man, not the farmer, not the mechanic, but the heartless speculator who uses other men's productions in the acquisition of wealth. Few are the petitions, if any, that have come up here from the people praying for a revision of the tariff. And as their Representatives we should regard this fact as of great importance; it should guide us in our action here and urge us to resort to all honorable means to defeat the bill. Not only did Pennsylvania do much good for the country in the manufacture of iron by the old charcoal process, but has successfully established the fact that iron can be made with anthracite coal, a problem at one time difficult of solution. And I take pride in saying that the credit of the discovery belongs to the county of Lehigh, where I reside. And what has been the result? A market has been opened in the Lehigh Valley for the consumption of millions of tons of coal taken from the bosom of poor and barren lands, which before were not worth the taxes charged upon them, by which has been opened a mining interest which has given employment to thousands of laboring-men, and built up towns and villages which appear like diamonds in a desert, where without it nothing but the deep silence of nature would prevail. And the wants of these people of the common necessities of life had to be supplied, thereby contributing immensely to the benefit of other sections of the Union. For material for their cotton goods they look to the South, for the material for their woolen goods they look to the West, and for a transition of these materials into fabrics principally to the East. And such is the rapidity of transportation that one day woolen and cotton may be growing in the West and South, the next in the manufactories of New England, the third the fabrics made from them in the shops of the iron and mining districts of Pennsylvania, and the fourth will see in return iron or machinery manufactured there speeding its way back. And this great system of interchange is founded upon national laws, established for the reciprocal benefit of different portions of the country.

By this wise arrangement the privileges and benefits of one section are balanced by the privileges and benefits of another, so that no one section can monopolize and possess all. And by this providential arrangement each section enjoys the privileges and benefits originally intended for it, so that the great machinery of nature shall move on in harmony, scattering its blessings to all within its reach. And in obedience to these laws has not our country grown and prospered far beyond the expectations of our enemies, and in one short century advanced far beyond what no other nation on the face of the earth has ever done before in the same period of time? Does not America now stand at the head of nations after so brief an existence? Can any nation boast of being its superior in the general intelligence and inventive genius of its people and in many of the mechanic arts? Did she not take a proud stand at the recent centennial exposition in Philadelphia in the exhibition of her manufactures, and caused the representatives of old and foreign nations to acknowledge our superiority in many of them? And did not that exposition open the door for the exportation of cutlery and other things to Europe? Why, it is a fact that a small triangular file manufactured in Providence, Rhode Island, took a premium for being the best article of the kind manufactured in the world, and is now sent to England, even to Sheffield, as such. And a foreigner was so much pleased with our cutlery that he alone has shipped in the last year two hundred and fifty tons of it to the same city of Sheffield, put the trade-marks of Sheffield upon it, and sold it for Sheffield cutlery. And wagons for burden exhibited on that occasion, made in my own district, so far attracted the attention of foreigners that they are now made and shipped to Australia. Now, these manufacturers do not to my knowledge ask for a reduction of the tariff on iron and steel. They are satisfied with their profits or they would abandon their business.

Nor do we hear any complaints from those engaged in the manufacture of other articles of which iron and steel form the whole or the component parts thereof. No wall comes up from those quarters. Whence, then, does the cry for a reduced tariff and free trade come? May we not justly suppose that it comes from our commercial cities, the great entrepôts of foreign goods, and particularly from British agents who reside there? But those cities are not the whole of the United States, nor the whole of the forty millions of people embraced within its limits, who have a deep interest in the matter. For the general welfare of these people every member of this House is called upon to legislate. Nothing is so detrimental and ruinous to a State or nation as class or special legislation, by which special privileges are granted to a few to the exclusion of the many. As nothing can be more dangerous to the existence of a free government than centralization of power, so nothing can be more injurious to the great body of a people than centralization of privilege. Universality of privilege and universality of right give permanence and stability to any nation. If they are wanting, that nation will become crippled and fall.

But to come more immediately to the object which I have in view, I will state that when the eloquent and distinguished gentleman from New York commenced his address introductory to the general discussion of the bill which he had introduced, I expected to hear some strong and convincing arguments adduced in its favor. I expected to hear a fair practical statement made of the general relation which the present bill bears to the situation of the country and the country's needs, if any, and the general benefits which would result from its passage. Very probably a want of time and the extensive subject prevented it.

The gentleman's reference to a few articles, the duties upon which he thought might with propriety be reduced, was very proper, but he omitted one important particular, which was to show us where we could get the money to buy them. It will not do, sir, to reduce duties upon the one hand without showing on the other corresponding advantages equal to the advantages which existed prior to the reduction, and that we are as well able to purchase an article after the reduction as before. If that is not done it works a manifest injury to the people. To tell a man that he can purchase an article very cheap, much cheaper than before, because the duty upon it has been reduced, will that be any consolation to him when he can turn around and say "Yes, but I could have made the article myself, but by the reduction of the duty upon it you have ruined my business and I have no money to buy it at any price? Instead of being paid for my labor you have paid foreign laborers, and now I must abandon my business and seek a living in some other way or starve." He goes to his home, closes his place of business where once was light, activity, and thrift, but now shrouded in darkness and gloom. This would be a one-sided and damaging legislation which ought never to be sanctioned by this House. We are not sent here to ruin, but to build up the country by the encouragement of every branch of industry. We are not here to depress labor but to hold it up, and to give it the importance to which it is entitled as the great producing power of wealth. Who has built up our country but the laborer, mechanical or otherwise? Who has built railroads, furnaces, rolling-mills, and machine-shops but the laborer? Yet how little do we legislate for his good. He is literally forgotten, when his welfare should be our first and greatest care.

I have before referred, sir, to the effect which the iron interest in Eastern Pennsylvania, especially in the Lehigh Valley, has had upon the anthracite-coal interest in that section. The following is a report which I have received from the very able superintendent of the Lehigh Valley Railroad, which can be relied upon as authentic. It is a statement of the anthracite-coal tonnage over the road to the furnaces and rolling-mills in the Lehigh for the past six years, to wit:

For the year—	Tons.	For the year—	Tons.
1872	698, 275	1876	402, 080
1873	653, 552	1877	463, 613
1874	530, 823
1875	439, 939	Total	3, 188, 282

But this does not embrace the coal tonnage of another railroad running through the same valley on the eastern side of the Lehigh River. And it will be noticed that the least amount of tonnage was in 1876, when, on account of the great depression in business many furnaces and rolling-mills were closed. Thus we see what amount of coal the iron interest in that section alone has drawn from the bowels of the earth, which otherwise would have remained within it. And from this we can form some estimate of what it has cost to mine it and the thousands of miners who, with their families, have been supported by it. And now shall this mighty business be stopped or in any way checked, and especially upon the dangerous plea that free trade will benefit us?

Why, sir, the doctrine of free trade is an old English doctrine and is fast dying out. France, Spain, Germany, and Russia will not touch it. And what has it done for Ireland? Quoting from the supplement to the Bulletin of the American Iron and Steel Association of Philadelphia, of January 26, 1878, I will let Major O'Gorman, member of Parliament from Waterford, speak. He says:

What has filled our Irish work-houses? I will tell you. Before free trade was passed by an English Parliament how did things stand? Why the four-pound loaf was 3d.; but we were told that if we had free trade we should have a loaf at half the same figure, if we did not get it for nothing. But have you observed as I have done that the four-pound loaf has risen from 3d. to 4d., 5d., yes, even 8d. under free trade? If that is free trade for Ireland, the back of my hand to it. I will tell you. It has turned all our red ground into grass, from which to rear cattle to feed the accursed English fellows who have trampled upon Ireland, and who would do it now, but with the help of God we won't let them. What has free trade done more than this? I'll tell you. It has turned the poor of our country into these horrible, miserable houses. The poor have been driven into the work-houses because there is nothing to be seen but grass, a state of things that has been brought about by the laws of the infernal country which governs us; laws which if carried out would allow our poor Irish people being thrown after death into a hole, just as you would throw a dog into a ditch. But I say if you as Irishmen countenance such a thing it will not be natural, it will not be Irish.

Thus speaks one of England's subjects and a member of her own Parliament, and doubtless speaks from the record. A beautiful picture, indeed, for free-traders to contemplate. But may a merciful Providence protect us from having such a picture drawn in our own land.

Not only this, but from the same paper I quote an extract from Blackwood's English (tory) Magazine:

At this moment, especially more than at any other epoch in our history, it is essential that new markets should be found for our manufactures. With strikes at home, increasing the cost of labor and its products, and competition and protective tariffs abroad even in our colonies, the once unlimited field for our industries is rapidly narrowing to an alarming extent. The United States demand for our goods has diminished nearly 50 per cent. within the last few years. Russia and China both adopt a policy the effect of which is to close Central and Eastern Asia to our trade. India is even giving signs of commencing a race of competition by native looms. Free trade is as abhorrent to Spain as it is to Russia or the United States, and nowhere is in the ascendant to whichever quarter we turn. It maintains a losing fight with protection in France and Germany, while it is repudiated utterly by our own offspring and descendants, with few exceptions of no great importance.

This is corroborative of what I have before said in relation to the countries named, and of the dying out of the obnoxious doctrine of free trade in England.

But the supporters of the present bill will not admit that they are in favor of free trade. But the passage of it will be one step in that direction, and, as I will show before I conclude, the bill itself contains the most undoubted evidence of it. History teaches us that no people are deprived of their liberty and their rights at once. It is by sly and stealthy advances that it is accomplished. Pass the present bill and the next year another one will be introduced to reduce the duties upon foreign imports still lower, and so on from one step to another, until the doctrine of free trade has finally fastened itself upon the country. Now, are the American people prepared for such an event? Are they willing to turn their laboring-men adrift without employment and at last without bread, and support foreign laborers? Are they willing to see their furnaces, rolling-mills, factories, and work-shops closed and the hum of business no longer heard in the land? If so, let us pass this bill, and next year another, and yet another, and their wishes will be fully gratified. No, sir, this must not be. Such a suicidal policy cannot and will not be sanctioned by an intelligent people who have the least regard for their prosperity and welfare. They will not hastily abandon the great sources of wealth which a beneficent Providence has placed in their hands, but will use them for their own benefit and the permanence and stability of the government under which they live.

The gentleman from New York who introduced the bill seems to think that it will do little injury to the iron interests of the country. In reference to pig-iron especially he dwells upon the supposed fact that there has been a slight increase of it in 1877 over 1876 and that our exportations of 1877 have exceeded the exportations of 1876. As to the former he does not seem to consider that since the panic of 1873 the iron interest has been on the decline and sales were checked up to 1876, when many furnaces went out of blast with a heavy stock on hand. In Pennsylvania alone in that year there were but 113 furnaces in blast and 166 out of blast; this embraces both anthracite and charcoal furnaces. In 1877 there were 131 furnaces in blast and 147 out of blast. This increase of the number of furnaces in blast in 1877 over 1876 was the result of necessity, for, while in 1876 it was found necessary to blow out furnaces, from the fact that there were lying upon the banks a large quantity of iron with no market for it, in 1877 it became necessary to start them again to escape the injury that would accrue to them by lying idle, self-protection being the ruling motive for this instead of profit; so that the increased number of working furnaces with their products added to what was manufactured in 1876 and undisposed of would naturally increase the aggregate number of tons in 1877 over the stock of 1876. And I may here add that to do this some furnaces were compelled to borrow large sums of money upon mortgage bonds or preferred stock; and when corporations or companies are forced to resort to loans to carry on their business, in a great many instances the common stock is sunk, and furnaces at this time are making very little if any money; nor will they as long as they are compelled to sell No. 1 iron for $18 to $18.50 a ton, No. 2 for $17 to $17.50, No. 3 for $16 to $16.50, and white-mottled at $15 to $15.50 a ton. At these prices, if they can escape losses at the end of the year, it is all they expect to do. Now, the present bill proposes to reduce the present duty of $7 a ton to $5, making a difference of $2, which, if it could be realized as profit on every ton of iron manufactured, would be at this time a great boon to manufacturers.

Now, in England iron can be made much cheaper than in this country. There an operative can rent a comfortable house for $15 a year and purchase a suit of clothes for $7, while other expenses of living are in the same proportion. With such cheapness of living we cannot compete with England, and in this respect it has greatly the advantage of us.

Now, if the iron interest is crushed, what portions of the country will it affect beyond the parties directly interested in it? The East will suffer in the manufacture of woolen and cotton fabrics, in consequence of a necessarily decreased population in the iron regions. The hum of the spindle and the rattle of the loom will be in a measure stopped. The South will be affected, because the market for its cotton will be lessened. The wool-grower of the West will feel it and the western farmer will suffer by it. Why? Because of a reduced population to need them. Foreign operatives, for want of employment here, are returning to their native countries. Indeed the tide of emigration from is greater than the tide of immigration to our shores, and the number of consumers thereby greatly lessened. Especially does it behoove the western farmer to look well to the future. He will not always have as favorable a foreign market for his grain as he now has, for India is becoming a powerful competitor in the production and shipment of grain to England and other countries. And the time may not be far distant when he will be compelled to depend upon home consumption of his products; and when that time arrives he will wish that his Representative in Congress had opposed the tariff bill of 1878. Not only this, but if the great iron interest of the country is to be stricken down, where will he get his agricultural implements to cultivate his soil? Farmer of the West, you have a mighty interest at stake. The time of your prosperity may soon come to an end. The value of your lands may soon become depreciated and your homes imperiled.

Sir, if we strike down the iron interest we shall strike at the very heart of the nation from which flows its life-blood. Without this interest where should we be? It is this great interest that has given activity and life to our people. Indeed it is the great foundation stone upon which our country rests, and the parent of all enterprises. Without it whence would come our railroads, rolling-mills, our machinery, and everything of which it is the whole or a component part thereof? We might possibly live without it, but we should eke out a miserable existence.

There is another feature in the bill which is particularly objectionable and should especially arrest the attention of the people. It is the incorporation of the ad valorem principle into the bill. It is but another term for free trade, and opens the widest door for the commission of fraud and perjury and the cheating of the Treasury of its revenues.

The gentleman in his address stated that there were free and dutiable articles mentioned in the bill to the number of twenty-one hundred and seventy-two:

The number paying ad valorem rates	223
Number paying specific rates	541
Number paying compound rates	160
Number free of duty	648
Total	2,172

Now, while the gentleman and others who favor the bill will hesitate to admit that they are in favor of free trade, yet the incorporation of the ad valorem principle into the bill is positive evidence that they are. On this question I will let Dr. William Elder, in his "Questions of the Day," speak. He says:

The ad valorem rule, with its universality of range, has no place in the policy of protection. To admit it in the assessment of duties is to sweep away the whole doctrine of protection. Free traders are its consistent advocates. To give it any influence whatever in our reasonings upon protection is to confound and vitiate the whole process. The enemy have sown their tares in our field while we slept, and must not be allowed to reproach us with the faults of the harvest. Previous to 1846 ad valorem were not tolerated in our tariffs wherever they could be avoided, and when protection, true and earnest, was restored in 1861 specific duties were restored, not extensively enough indeed, but with a resolute purpose to avoid the departures from principle in fixing the rates and the ever-absent frauds of the ad valorem system—frauds by which the industry of the country is cheated of its defenses and the Treasury of its revenues, and all honest importers are discounted disastrously by their unscrupulous rivals in trade. They offer a premium to fraud; they falsify invoices; they pay for perjury in the custom-house; they make smuggling a policy of trade, and demoralize the whole merchant class by discouraging and fining truth heavily. They are every way fitted, in purpose and practice, for defeating protection, and are accordingly a prime principle of free trade. England, having respect only to her revenues and fair play among her own importers, counts ad valorem from her list of import duties. When she was deriving £30,000,000 from customs she took but one quarter of a million in ad valorem, and such were these inherent and inseparable frauds that Parliament appointed a committee to rid the customs schedules of every possible vestige of them. This committee indicated its object and intention by charging artificial flowers by the cube feet in the box containing them, overlooking all differences of values to escape the frauds of undervaluation. Not a government on earth that knows what it is about gives them any toleration, and especially those which intend protection repudiate them just as they do free trade in any other disguise.

This is language that cannot be and ought not to be misunderstood. Upon examining the bill I find many articles are to pay duties upon ad valorem principles so decidedly condemned by the foregoing quotation. If specific duties were laid upon all foreign articles except such as may properly be placed on the free list, it would be more advantageous to the Treasury. Opposition to the ad valorem rates is not of recent origin, but had its opposers many years ago among some of the most distinguished men of the nation.

When the law of 1846 was under consideration in the Senate Mr. Buchanan, of Pennsylvania, said:

I am not only opposed to any uniform scale of ad valorem but to any and all ad valorem duties whatever, except where from the nature of the article imported it is not possible to subject it to a specific duty. Our own severe experience has taught us a lesson on this subject which we ought not soon to forget. I cannot refrain from adverting to some of my reasons for this opinion. Our ad valorem system has produced great frauds on the revenue while it has driven the regular American merchant from the business of importing and placed it almost exclusively in the hands of the agents of the British manufacturers. The American importer produces his invoice to the collector, containing the actual price at which the imports were purchased abroad, and he pays the fair and regular duty on this invoice. Not so the British agent. The foreign manufacturer in his invoice reduces the price of the articles which he intends to import into our country to the lowest possible standard which he thinks will enable them to pass through the custom-house without being seized for fraud, and the business has been hitherto managed with so much ingenuity as generally to escape detection. The consequence is that the British agent passes the goods of his employer through the custom-house on the payment of a much lower duty than the fair American merchant is compelled to pay. In this manner he is undersold in the market by the foreigner, and thus driven from the competition while the public revenue is fraudulently reduced.

Mr. Webster also, at the same time and on the same occasion, said:

The principle of this bill is to collect all duties and customs by a universal ad valorem assessment; not an equal assessment, it is true, but still a system of ad valorem duties. Now, that has not been the practice of the Government at any time since its organization. In every administration from that of Washington down a contrary system has prevailed, and the desire of those who have successfully formed and administered the laws in this respect has been uniformly to carry the principles of specific duties as far and as fast as circumstances allowed.

Now, sir, these sentiments apply with peculiar force to us at this time, and indicate clearly the course we should pursue in relation to the present bill. A duty is sternly laid upon us to act like men and do justice to the country. The eyes of over forty millions of people are upon us, and their voices are coming up here in almost tones of thunder praying for relief from the anxieties caused by the introduction of this bill and the prospective troubles its passage will bring upon them, and in the most beseeching manner asking us to pause and let them alone. And shall we not heed their supplications? Shall we persist in a course calculated to do them an injury without any occasion for it? Shall we not rather yield to the tender words which they with such emphasis utter, "Let us alone?" And, sir, we should let them alone.

The gentleman in his address referred to the present tariff laws, and I was much surprised at the statement that showed that the free and dutiable articles amounted to 2,172.

Of these the number paying ad valorem rates were	223
Number paying specific rates	541
Number paying compound rates	160

Total dutiable articles	1,524
Number free of duty	648

Now, is not this a most alarming exhibit? It shows but 541 articles paying specific rates, a little less than one-fourth of the whole number.

To the number free of duty, 648, add the number paying ad valorem rates, 823 virtually on the free list, and we have 1,471, leaving but 701 articles paying specific and compound rates.

Sir, I am amazed at the statement; and how few of the American people are aware that we have already made such advances in adopting the principle of free trade. No wonder we are so often admonished that the revenue is decreasing and money to support the Government must be raised from other sources. This accounts for the project of taxing incomes to replenish the Treasury. And if a law should be passed for that purpose it would be one of the most unjust and iniquitous laws to be found upon our statute-book.

How the number of free and ad valorem articles in the present bill will compare with the foregoing statement I am not now prepared to say, but doubtless will be increased, thus taking another step toward free trade.

There are many objectionable features in the bill which I would like to refer to, but time will not permit.

I will therefore, in conclusion, say, let us send it to a comfortable repose, adjourn and go home, which will be the best thing we can do for the country.

Mr. EVANS, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, as another attack has been made on the industrial interests of the country, by a revision and reduction of the tariff, by the bill recently reported from the Committee of Ways and Means, and as the advocates of free trade throughout the land are endeavoring to impress the public mind with the idea that it is the soundest political economy to buy where we can buy the cheapest in the markets of the world, and that the policy of protection to industry by means of duties on imports is particularly inimical to the prosperity and the best interests of the American people, I think it becomes our duty as legislators to study well the effects of free trade and protection on the prosperity of nations before we consent to the passage of this bill.

When Mr. Chamberlain, at Birmingham, England, in addressing General Grant some two or three months ago, lauded the doctrine of free trade as having contributed to the greatness and glory of England, the general very properly replied that he seemed to remember that England had only arrived at that degree of prosperity by first establishing her manufactures under the principles and benefits of protection. That nation, when her manufacturers were in their infancy, took especial care to impose such duties upon all manufactures that were imported therein as to give to her people the preference in their own markets. She thus stimulated a competition among her own people; this competition awakened the ingenuity of her inventors to discover new methods whereby productions of industry might be cheapened, and she thereby became in time the great workshop of the world. Her statesmen were sagacious and farseeing, they were not troubled with impracticable theories of free trade to compete with her young and growing industries, and she fully realized the great fact that for a nation to be free it must be self-supporting and as independent as possible of other nations in the supply of its daily wants. When a nation is able to supply its own necessities and to sell a surplus of commodities the results of its industry it will become rich; but when it has to purchase more from other nations than it sells it will be getting poor. By the protection given to her manufacturers England thus became the competitor of all other nations. She was enabled to sell her goods to all peoples. To carry those goods it was necessary to have ships, and this demand for ships created a great ship-building industry and made for her a commerce marine greater than that of any other nation. To protect the commerce thus created she has built a navy that has no superior, and consequently her flag is found flying in every port of the civilized world. Indeed, and we ought to be ashamed to say it, three-fourths of the commerce that goes from our ports is carried under foreign flags, of which the greater number is that of Great Britain. By her manufactures and commerce so extensively carried everywhere, the wealth of nations is poured into her lap so extensively that her manufacturers and merchants have become princes in affluence, and the aggregation of capital has become so great that all reasonable undertakings can command the means of development at a far more limited rate of interest than with us. From her longer experience than ours, from her more abundant capital and lower rates of interest, combined with her low wages for labor, she still remains a formidable competitor. Therefore, with more slender resources than she possesses, it becomes necessary that our Congress should provide such countervailing legislation for our people as will at least place us on an equal footing with her and all other nations that may be more favored than we are.

England early understood the value of foreign markets for her manufactured articles, and was especially eager to increase them. Upon her colonies she bore a heavy hand, preventing them as long as she could from manufacturing for themselves and forcing upon them, as far as possible, the products of her industry. Under our colonial system, she restricted the establishment of manufactories. Iron mills for making iron plate and mills for slitting and rolling iron, and for other kinds of industry, now so common in our country, were prohibited by acts of Parliament, and Lord Chatham in parliamentary debate said "he would not have the Americans make a hobnail," while another lord added "that he would not allow them to make a razor to shave their beards." It was this kind of restrictive and oppressive legislation, with other grievances of government, that led to the Revolution and the establishment of our Independence; and it is our true policy to maintain unimpaired that Independence in all things, commercial and political, that we have achieved. The men who created an independent nation out of a series of dependent colonies well understood the principles necessary to be crystallized by legislation in order to maintain that Independence; and it is worthy of note that the second act of the First Congress of the United States was enacted in the interest of protection. It is entitled "An act laying a duty on goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States." The object of the act is stated in the preamble of the first section, as follows:

Whereas it is necessary for the support of Government, for the discharge of the debts of the United States, and the encouragement and protection of manufactures, that duties be laid on goods, wares, and merchandise imported: Be it enacted, &c.

This act was approved by President Washington July 4, 1789; and in it was distinctly enunciated the doctrine of protection. For the benefit of the southern planter it imposed duties on sugars, molasses, snuff, and tobacco; to protect manufactures it placed duties on boots, shoes, leather, iron, wood, paper, clothing, and gold and silver ware; for the farmer, it charged duties on cider, malt, candles, cheese, soap, &c. And to encourage ship-building, it allowed a discount of 10 per cent. on such goods, wares, and merchandise as should be imported in vessels built in the United States, and which should be wholly the property of a citizen or citizens thereof. Here at the very beginning of our Government were the germs of that system of "encouragement and protection" to our infant manufactures and commerce which through successive administrations and until recently have been recognized, adopted, and maintained as what may be properly called the American system.

In reviewing the writings of revolutionary patriots and utterances of the earlier Presidents we cannot fail to be struck with the uniformity of their sentiments on this subject, and I desire here very briefly to call the attention of the House to a few extracts therefrom. They may not be new, but will serve to refresh our memories once more with the views of the founders of the Government.

Dr. Franklin, in writing to Humphrey Marshall, said:

Every manufacturer encouraged in our country makes part of a market for provisions within ourselves and saves so much money to the country, as must otherwise be exported to pay for the manufactures he supplies. Here in England it is well known and understood that wherever a manufacture is established which employs a number of hands it raises the value of land in the neighboring country all around it; partly by the greater demand near at hand for the produce of the land and partly from the plenty of money drawn by the manufacturers to that part of the country. It seems, therefore, the interest of all our farmers and owners of lands to encourage our young manufactures in preference to foreign ones imported among us from distant countries.

In his first annual message Washington says:

The advancement of agriculture, commerce, and manufacture by all proper means will not, I trust, need recommendation; but I cannot forbear intimating to you the expediency of giving effectual encouragement as well to the introduction of new and useful inventions from abroad as to the exertions of skill and science in producing them at home.

In his eighth annual message he again calls the attention of Congress to it, and says:

Congress have repeatedly, and not without success, directed their attention to the encouragement of manufactures. The object is of too much importance not to insure a continuance of their efforts in every way which shall appear eligible.

Following up the principles and policy of Washington, Jefferson in his second inaugural message says:

To cultivate peace and maintain commerce and navigation in all their lawful enterprises, to foster our fisheries as nurseries of navigation and for the nurture of man, and to protect the manufactures adapted to our circumstances, these, fellow-citizens, are the landmarks by which we are to guide ourselves in all our proceedings. By continuing to make these the rule of our action, we shall endeavor to our country the true principles of our Constitution and promote a union of sentiment and of action equally auspicious to our happiness and safety.

In these days of modern democracy, when free-traders denounce protective tariffs as unconstitutional, it is well to call their attention to the declaration of the author of the great Declaration and the father of the democratic party that the encouragement of protection to manufactures is one of the true principles of the Constitution, auspicious to our happiness and safety. Our experience has proved the wisdom of this declaration. President Madison, who had exerted such a conspicuous influence in the formation of the Constitution, in his special message to Congress in May, 1800, called the attention of Congress to the subject in the following words:

The revision of our commercial laws proper to adapt them to the arrangement which has taken place with Great Britain will doubtless engage the early attention of Congress. It will be worthy at the same time of their just and provident care to make such alterations in the laws as will more especially protect and foster the several branches of manufacture which has been recently instituted or extended by the laudable exertions of our citizens.

Madison seems to have been deeply impressed with the idea of the importance of protection, for he continues the subject in his special message of February, 1815, saying:

There is no subject that can enter with greater force and merit into the deliberations of Congress than a consideration of the means to preserve and promote the manufactures which have sprung into existence and attained an unparalleled maturity throughout the United States during the period of the European wars. This source of national independence and wealth I anxiously recommend, therefore, to the prompt and constant guardianship of Congress.

The principles of the revolutionary fathers as expressed in the foregoing sentiments of Washington, Jefferson, and Madison were indorsed and fully adopted by Monroe. In his inaugural address he says:

Our manufactures will likewise require the systematic and fostering care of the Government. Possessing as we do all the raw materials, the fruit of our own soil and industry, we ought not to depend in the degree we have done on supplies from other countries.

In his sixth annual message he strikes at free trade in the following vigorous remarks:

Satisfied am I, whatever may be the abstract doctrine in favor of unrestricted commerce provided all other nations would concur in it and it was not liable to be interrupted by war, which has never occurred and cannot be expected, that there are other strong reasons applicable to our situation and relations with other countries which impose on us the obligation to cherish and sustain our manufactures.

Following in the same line of thought, the same principles were enunciated by John Quincy Adams in his fourth annual message, wherein he says:

The great interests of an agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing nation are so linked in union together that no permanent cause of prosperity to one of them can operate without extending its influence to the other. All these are alike under the protecting power of legislative authority, and the duties of the representative bodies are to conciliate them in harmony together.

In those days, as at the present time, the constitutionality of a protective tariff had been a matter of discussion and dispute, and General Jackson, in his second annual message in 1830, following up the doctrines which he had enunciated in his celebrated Coleman letter of 1824, upheld its constitutionality in the following words:

The object of the tariff is objected to by some as unconstitutional; and it is considered by almost all as defective in many of its parts. The power to impose duties on imports originally belonged to the several States. The right to adjust those duties with a view to the encouragement of domestic branches of industry is so completely incidental to that power that it is difficult to suppose the existence of the one without the other. The States have delegated their whole authority over imports to the General Government, without limitation or restriction, saving the very inconsiderable reservation relative to their inspection laws. This authority having passed thus entirely from the States, the right to exercise it for the purpose of protection does not exist in them; and consequently if it be not possessed by the General Government it must be extinct. Our political system would thus present the anomaly of a people stripped of the right to foster their own industry and to counteract the most selfish and destructive policy which might be adopted by foreign nations. This surely cannot be the case. This indispensable power thus surrendered by the States must be within the scope of the authority on the subject expressly delegated to Congress.

These extracts are important and valuable as showing the opinions of men who assisted in making the Constitution and of others who accepted the interpretation put upon it by its authors, and all of whom saw and felt the necessity of fostering, encouraging, and protecting the industry of our own people in preference to that of the people of other countries. The constitutionality of a protective tariff was scarcely ever thought of in the time of the first three Presidents, but when the question came up in the time of Jackson he most emphatically affirmed its constitutionality in the message of which I have just read a part. Indeed, when we come to think of the duties of a government, it is difficult to understand why there should be any question on the subject.

Governments are instituted by men for their own care and protection. They are formed to protect citizens in their rights, and to aid and encourage them in their industries and to guard and shield them from the adverse legislation of other nations. A government that should fail to perform this high duty and should permit the industry of its citizens to be at the mercy of the manufacturers of other nations, more favored by an abundance of cheap capital and low wages, is false to the great obligation imposed upon it of encouraging, protecting, and defending the industries of its people.

When the free-trader is driven from his argument that the tariff is unconstitutional by the testimony given by Jackson and earlier leaders of the democracy he appeals to the prejudices rather than the judgment of the people and endeavors to induce them to believe that all duties levied on goods imported are a tax, and necessarily enhance the price of the article imported. This argument is unsupported by the experience of the country. On the contrary, it has been conclusively shown that whenever our mechanics and manufacturers are placed upon an equal footing with the labor and capital of other nations, so as to give them an equal chance, by their ingenuity and skill they readily become capable of competing on equal terms in our own markets; nay, even in the markets of the world. This has been made manifest in so many ways that it is almost useless to repeat them. Most notably has this result occurred in our iron, cotton, and woolen manufactures. Under our protective tariffs, so called, the inventive genius of our people has been greatly stimulated, and new and improved machinery in those and all other branches of manufacture have cheapened the cost of production so much that almost every article that we can manufacture and which we used to purchase abroad can now be made and sold at home at cheaper rates than foreign countries imposed upon us when they had control of the markets.

Most prominently is this the case with the products of our iron manufactures. When Great Britain had the control of our market for railroad iron, she imposed what prices she pleased upon us, and sold us very indifferent rails at high figures. Before Bessemer steel was made in this country she charged us $174 per ton for steel rails, equal to $225 in currency; but after our manufacturers were sufficiently protected they went into the steel-rail manufacture, and are to-day manufacturing steel rails of excellent quality at $43 per ton. It is true that the falling off of the demand and the reduction of wages, caused by the hard times, have had something to do with the present low prices; but even before the panic, and while our Bessemer-steel manufacture was in its infancy, the price had fallen to $95 per ton in 1871. If it were true that a duty upon railroad iron is a tax, as the free-traders declare, there is no class of persons who would feel the burden sooner or who would be more likely to resist it than the managers of railroads, as a very large proportion of their expenditures is for rails. Yet it is a well-known fact that the presidents of a very large number of railroads petitioned Congress, a year ago last month, not to take off the duty on railroad iron, but to increase it. They knew full well that protection had encouraged the railroad-iron industry here, that its encouragement had caused the creation and erection of rail mills, and that competition had reduced prices. They also knew that if the duties were taken off the country would be flooded with a cheaper and inferior iron that would tempt railroad companies to buy and thus drive the better American article out of the market, and that as soon as foreign manufacturers obtained the control of our market they would raise their prices and impose heavier burdens on the purchasers of iron and steel rails than they had ever borne before under a protective policy.

There are other branches of iron and steel industry that have wonderfully prospered under congressional encouragement. We formerly imported large numbers of saws from English manufacturers, but to-day Diston's manufactory at Philadelphia competes in the English market, with the best productions of the English artisans. The Rowlands of Cheltenham, Pennsylvania, send their shovels; and Myers & Ervien, of the same place, send their highly finished and superior steel forks and rakes to compete with the British shovel, fork, and rake in the markets of Brazil. I am informed by Mr. Ervien, of the firm of Myers & Ervien, that they have shipped since January 1, 1878, large quantities to England and Ireland, France, Germany, Prussia, and some to Russia. Mr. Ervien says we do not need protection on our manufactured goods, for home competition has brought the price down so low that we do not fear foreign competition; "but I am satisfied," says he, "that the protection to our steel manufacturers has enabled us to buy our steel 40 per cent. less than we ever could before the war, and before steel manufacture was protected in this country."

We manufacture fine cutlery and send it to Sheffield, the great seat of their cutlery manufacture. And Beatty & Douglas send their axes to Great Britain's Australian colonies to compete with the productions of the mother country there. In the matter of iron bridges we compete with English manufacturers in Canada; a firm of bridge-builders in Phenixville, in a district adjoining mine, after open competition with the world has obtained the contract for building one of the largest iron bridges in that Dominion. Until recently we have been importing Russia or polished sheet-iron, but now we have the establishments of Alan Wood & Co., at Pittsburgh and Conshohocken, in my district, where by the protection afforded and great skill in the mechanism, they manufacture polished iron, even superior to the Russian; and the Baldwin locomotive-works, at Philadelphia, send numbers of locomotives to foreign countries. All this was impossible when duties were low and our manufacturers were unprotected, for the reason that foreign manufacturers controlled our market at home, and thereby the markets of the world.

Mr. WARD. I would like to ask my colleague a question for information at this point in his remarks if he will yield.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to his colleague?

Mr. EVANS, of Pennsylvania. I have no objection.

Mr. WARD. It is stated with frequency and considerable publicity that the proposed tariff bill now before the House has the approval of the iron and steel manufacturers of Pennsylvania. I would like to have the information of my colleague upon this point.

Mr. EVANS, of Pennsylvania. I know that such an assertion has been made. In reply I will send to the Clerk's desk a communication of the American Iron and Steel Association, which I desire to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE AMERICAN IRON AND STEEL ASSOCIATION.
No. 265 SOUTH FOURTH STREET,
Philadelphia, April 2, 1878.

The executive committee of the American Iron and Steel Association met to-day at the office in Philadelphia to consider the revised tariff bill, as reported to the House by Mr. Wood. Letters were read from a number of members, representing the manufacturers of Bessemer steel, crucible steel, pig-iron, and bar-iron, all of which, without exception, disapproved of the bill as a whole, although admitting that some of its details were not particularly objectionable. The writers of the letters strongly urged the association to take such action as would assist in defeating the bill.

After a free interchange of opinions by the members of the executive committee, it was unanimously

Resolved, That the association disapprove of the bill as a whole, and strenuously urge that all attempts to change the tariff laws at this session of Congress be at once abandoned.

The secretary was directed to inform all members of the association of this decision and to invite them to call upon their Representatives in Congress to use every proper means to secure the prompt suppression of unnecessary tariff agitation.

SAMUEL J. REEVES, President.

JAMES M. SWANK, Secretary.

Mr. EVANS, of Pennsylvania. Now, I desire to ask my colleague a question: Does he believe that if the tariff bill were altered to suit Pennsylvania interests it would be perfect, or that it would then command the support of the people of Pennsylvania?

Mr. WARD. I will endeavor to answer the questions of my colleague, and in a manner that I believe will have his indorsement and that of every other of my colleagues from Pennsylvania. I do not believe that the proposed measure can be perfected by molding its provisions to suit any one branch. I believe the "Wood tariff bill," if it shall become a law, will prove the cross upon which every manufacturing and mechanical productive industry of America will be crucified.

Again, I believe the principle of protection to American industry is innate and deep-rooted in the breasts of the people of Pennsylvania. They are not to be seduced from their principle by any bribe, however glittering or rich. They will be found in solid rank, not to be diverted by any selfish consideration presented to themselves. Should they to shoulder they will stand with the other States in the battle for the common defense, marching on to victory, I hope and believe; but if disaster should overtake us, Pennsylvania will be found hand in hand with her sisters wounded on the battle-field, overpowered, it may be, by superior numbers, but faithful to the last to her principle of protection. I ask my colleague whether this is not his sentiment also.

Mr. EVANS, of Pennsylvania. I agree with my colleague on that subject.

Mr. SAYLER. As a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, I would like to suggest to the two gentlemen from Pennsylvania that the iron schedule of this tariff bill is not objected to by the representative tariff men of their State, but, on the contrary, is in the bill upon representations made by a delegation of quite as intelligent gentlemen as any who could possibly represent the iron interest of that State.

Mr. WARD. I will only say, in reply to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SAYLER,] that the Iron and Steel Association is certainly the best-informed representative of those peculiar interests that we know in the State of Pennsylvania—probably better informed than any other association in the country.

Mr. SAYLER. I would like to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I represent probably as much iron as anybody; and when he makes the broad statement that the schedule proposed in this bill is destructive of the iron interests of the country he makes a statement that is not justified by the opinion of the most intelligent men engaged in that business.

Mr. WARD. The position of my colleague and myself is sustained by the leading association of that business, as exemplified in the statement which my colleague has had read by the Clerk.

Mr. EVANS, of Pennsylvania. In reply to the gentleman from Ohio, I will say that the schedule referred to is certainly objectionable to the laboring interests, at least so far as the associations have been heard from; and it is likewise objected to by all the iron manufacturers with whom I have conversed.

As it is in the iron so it is in the cotton and woolen industries. The consul-general at London has recently given our Government information that quite a trade in American cotton goods has been started in England, and that millions of dollars' worth are annually sold there despite the cheap manufactures of Manchester. Agricultural implements also are extensively sold in England and her colonies. We sent within the last year, of agricultural implements, to England the value of $406,595, and to all the world $1,997,998. England is our great rival in cotton-goods manufacture, and until lately flooded our markets with her cheap cotton fabrics, but in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, we furnished her with 18,789,299 yards of manufactured cottons worth $1,884,145, and selling them at the very doors of her great factories. The whole amount of our cotton fabrics exported in 1877 was worth $8,921,354. England prides herself on her edge-tools and cutlery, yet we sent her one hundred and eighty-six thousand eight hundred and forty-nine dollars' worth of those. She boasts of her splendid farms and rich pastures, yet we supplied her with cheese to the value of $12,403,284, and sent cheese to all the world valued at $12,729,615.

The ingenuity of our inventors supplied her with Yankee clocks worth $516,643 and to all countries to the value of $1,025,586. I mention these matters to show that under our present protective policy we have been able by the ingenuity of our workmen and manufacturers to compete to a certain extent in the markets of the world with our great rival and also to sell within her own borders the same kinds of goods with which she formerly furnished us. Whoever has the curiosity to turn to the reports of the Bureau of Statistics on our "commercial relations" can see in detail the wonderful progress of our manufactures, and that they are obtaining a market gradually in every corner of the habitable globe. With such a showing and with American products offered for sale in the streets of Liverpool, Birmingham, Sheffield, and Manchester it is not to be wondered at that British statesmen begin to inquire, how it is that such results are produced. They are beginning to open their eyes to the fallacies of free-trade doctrine and to see that there is some virtue in the doctrine of protection to home industry.

Lord Bateman, a member of the house of lords, has had a glimpse of the truth and has written a letter to the London Times on the subject. He speaks of the distress in all branches of trade in his country, and while declaring that a free and unrestricted commerce with all the world is bold and magnanimous, yet that after many years' trial the efforts of British statesmen have not been able to induce many nations to engage in it, and that they prefer as far as possible to encourage their own industries, Lord Bateman has the sagacity to see that while England professedly and in most things opens her ports to the nations of the world but few of them follow her example, and he makes the inquiry whether "a return to a limited protection so far from being impossible or undesirable is not the true and simple solution of our present difficulties, which will tend in a more simple and natural way than any other to retrieve our losses, increase our revenue, lighten our burdens, bring peace, contentment, and employment to our working classes, and teach them and us to bless the day which restored the old policy and the old watchword of 'Protection to native British industry.'" Here is an abandonment of the doctrine of the free-trade British political economists and an acknowledgment of the beneficial influence of a protective policy. It is an acknowledgment that in his opinion the encouragement of home industry so repeatedly urged by our great statesmen of the past is the true pathway to the prosperity of the masses of the people, and refutes the allegation that protective duties on articles that a community can make or produce raises the prices of such productions.

It is a favorite argument among free-traders that a protective tariff tends to prevent exports. This is another fallacy that is refuted by all our experience. It matters not to other nations whether our tariff be high or low; if we have commodities that they want they will buy them, and as practical economists they will not buy more than they want. When they are under the necessity of going abroad for any commodities they will go where they can get them the cheapest, and if by the skill of our manufacturers and workmen we can afford them on better terms than other nations they will purchase of us, notwithstanding our duties upon their productions may be higher than is agreeable to them. Under our present policy the balance of trade is steadily increasing in our favor.

Our total imports in 1875 were	$533,906,000
Our total exports, gold values, 1875	685,574,000

Balance in favor of the United States	51,668,000
---	------------

Deducting specie exported, the balance was against us	19,583,000

For the fiscal year 1877 I find the Secretary of the Treasury reports as follows:

The coin values for the last fiscal year, as appear from returns made to and compiled by the Bureau of Statistics, are as follows:

Exports of domestic merchandise	$589,670,234
Exports of foreign merchandise	13,804,996

Imports	602,475,230
Balance	451,321,136

Balance	151,152,094

For the fiscal year 1877 the imports of merchandise, coin, and bullion were	461,818,499
The exports of merchandise, coin, and bullion were	647,021,104

Leaving the balance of trade in our favor	185,202,605
---	-------------

Thus showing very conclusively, under the present protective policy of the nation, a steadily increasing balance of trade in our favor.

The foreign trade of the United States during the past ten years has increased in a greater ratio than that of Great Britain under the policy of free trade. The increase of exports of the United States in that time is 72 per cent. The increase of exports of Great Britain for the same length of time is 25 per cent.

While it is desirable to increase our export trade by the development of our internal resources, we must not attempt to increase it at the expense of our home demand; and we must guard with a jealous eye every effort made to wrest any part of the home market from us. We must not forget the important fact that over 90 per cent. in value of our manufactured and agricultural productions are consumed in our own country.

An effort has been made to induce the farmer to believe that a protective tariff is a tax on his industry. Nothing is more absurd than this; probably there is no industry more benefited by protection than that of agriculture. The prosperity of a nation is most rapidly advanced when beneficial laws encourage the greatest variety of industry. A country that is devoted to a single article of production must buy all other commodities elsewhere, and is consequently very much at the mercy of those from whom she is obliged to purchase; but where a nation has within itself all, or the greater part, of those things which it needs, it gives employment to a greater variety of minds, and affords the enjoyments of life to a greater number of people.

ple. Therefore a varied industry is the most profitable for a nation. By the encouragement of iron, woolen, cotton, leather, glass, paper, and other manufactures, these industries put in motion all others from which they must draw the raw materials for their manufacture, and they in addition set to work all those who furnish them with food and raiment.

Each furnace, forge, rolling-mill, and cotton or woolen or other manufactory affords a market for the products of the labor of the tailor, the shoemaker, the butcher, the baker, and other mechanical trades. It raises up around it a little town, whose inhabitants furnish to the adjacent farmer a market for his products which he did not find before. Without protection to the manufacturer thousands and thousands of men who are now engaged in mechanical pursuits and are consumers of agricultural products would be driven into the ranks of producers and would thereby come in direct competition with the farmer. Wherever the factory and the mill are in active operation the agriculturist is especially benefited. Within my memory the towns of Norristown, Pottstown, and Conshohocken, Pennsylvania, were but villages. Protection to the iron, woolen, and other industries has raised them to flourishing towns, with good markets for the neighboring farmer. Lands contiguous to them within a comparatively recent period could have been bought for from seventy-five to one hundred dollars per acre. They can now be sold for from two to three hundred dollars per acre, according to their proximity to these towns. In addition to the home market afforded the farmer, the ingenuity of our mechanics, encouraged by protection, has given him such increased facilities of planting and gathering his crops at a cheap rate by improved agricultural machinery that he is now enabled to compete in foreign markets with the cheap breadstuffs of Europe.

The evidence of this is to be found in the fact that in 1875, after our people had been fed, we were enabled to sell to foreign consumers one hundred and eleven million dollars' worth of breadstuffs; in 1876 the amount of breadstuffs exported was one hundred and thirty million dollars' worth, and for the year ending December 31, 1877, we sold of the same one hundred and forty million dollars' worth. The southern agriculturist also found a good market for his products; his cotton exported in 1875 was worth $190,000,000; and in 1876, $192,000,000—a rich harvest for his industry. All these facts go to show that the free traders' theory, that protective tariffs tend to discourage exports, is a fallacy; for in our whole history, if I remember aright, we have not been able to show such an extensive range of exports as we have been able to make within the last few years.

But of all classes of citizens the operatives and mechanics of our mills and various manufactures are most interested in a policy that will give their labor a preference over the labor of similar classes of workmen abroad. None, therefore, are more interested in the policy of protection than the workingmen.

If we compare the wages of the operatives in leading industries in free-trade England with similar industries in protectionist America we will find the result greatly in favor of the latter, and it will also show at the same time what competition we have to encounter.

In Dr. Edward Young's valuable and interesting work entitled "Labor in Europe and America," I find the following schedules of wages paid to similar operatives in England and the United States:

The same difference will be found to exist in other classes of mechanical labor. I regret that we have no later table, as there have been considerable reductions made since 1874 in both countries, but from what I can learn the relative proportion is much the same as the above. From this it will be seen that the American mechanic receives nearly 100 per cent. more for his industry than the English mechanic.

With the higher rates of wages and double the rate of interest for capital paid by the American manufacturer, it is not difficult to comprehend that we cannot compete with foreign manufacturers without adequate protection.

If, then, a policy should be inaugurated that would admit foreign productions made under the cheap capital of foreign manufacturers and the starvation wages of their operatives, it would have a powerful tendency to close almost entirely our industrial establishments and the workmen therein would be required to work at less wages in other employments. To work for lower wages would curtail their home comforts; to be driven from their employment would require them to seek new and unfamiliar employments elsewhere. Mechanical industry by such erroneous policy would be crippled or prostrate and would be driven into agriculture, where it would have to contend with an occupation thus already crippled by the loss of the home market that the great industrial works afforded, and its workmen would become competitors in a business that they did not understand; the result of which, of course, would be want and suffering.

On the other hand, however, protection to the manufacturer secures the home market to him and good wages to the operative and mechanic; it means a comfortable home for himself and family, well furnished with all the comforts and conveniences of life; it provides good clothing and books and newspapers for his wife and children, with schools and churches and lectures and all other necessities and enjoyments that render their situation in life pleasant, agreeable, and happy. In short, it secures general prosperity, while free trade brings poverty and adversity.

But this comfortable condition of things always existing under protection when our country is in its normal, healthy condition, now, however, greatly disturbed by the hard times following the late rebellion which involved us in such a heavy debt, is to be still further disturbed by this infamous tariff bill reported by the Ways and Means Committee. If this bill should become a law, it would have a most depressing effect on all the industries of the nation, and change the whole business relations of our people with one another and with foreign powers. It reduces the duties on imports at least 25 per cent. on a large number of articles, and admits at low rates those commodities with which we have the sharpest competition. It would act most injuriously on prominent industries of the State which I have the honor in part to represent, and would greatly cripple the operations of some of my immediate constituents. The interests of Pennsylvania demand that she should be allowed a fair opportunity to compete with the cheaper labor and capital of other nations, and to give employment again to hundreds of her now idle operatives; but the bill would defer that opportunity for an indefinite time. A severe blow is struck at her great, but already depressed, iron interests.

The duty on pig-iron is reduced from $7 to $5, a reduction of nearly 29 per cent., on wrought scrap from $8 to $6, and on cast scrap from $6 to $4 per ton, a reduction of from 25 to 33 per cent. This would let in all the old rails and castings of foreign countries at almost a nominal duty, which would operate disastrously on the manufacturer of pig-iron.

The duty on common sheet-iron is reduced from 1½ cents to 1¼ cents per pound, a reduction of over 23 per cent.

In reference to this particular branch of the iron industry, Hon. John Wood, a former member of this House, from my district, who is a manufacturer and a gentleman of large experience, says:

Any greater reduction than ½ cent per pound would certainly ruin the business in this country. There has been much difficulty in keeping the mills running the past year, and the most favorably located, with the best management, have only run at serious losses. The passage of this bill, I fear, will cause the utter destruction of this branch of the iron trade, and throw out of employment thousands of deserving workmen whose wages are now down to the lowest living point.

Polished sheet-iron which under a duty of 3 cents per pound had become the rival of the best Russia iron, is to be compelled to compete with the Russian under a duty of 2½ cents per pound. This together with the allowances claimed as damages from rust which does not occur will be sufficient perhaps to drive the American manufacture out of the market.

Under the present duty of a cent and a quarter per pound, our steel rail manufacturers reduced the price of rails more than 50 per cent. Now their efforts are to be crippled by a 40 per cent. reduction of the present duty.

Bar-iron, boiler, plate, and other manufactures of iron will suffer a reduction of 15 to 30 per cent. on the present protection.

Our country is studded with woolen manufactories on which hundreds of thousands of operatives depend for their subsistence. They make all kinds of fabrics into which wool enters as a component part. Our cloths, shawls, blankets, flannels, and dress-goods vie with foreign manufactures in their neatness of finish and durability, brought to their present perfection by the preference afforded by the present tariff.

Hon. George Bullock, of the Conshohocken and Norristown Mills, Pennsylvania, says:

The rate proposed on wool is 35 per cent. ad valorem, and on woolen cloths and on all manufactures of wool of every description 50 per cent. ad valorem. This I cannot complain of, and might be made worse, but on page 26, line 631, clothing ready made and wearing apparel of every description, 45 per cent. ad valorem. This section is all wrong, and if it should pass will close up every woolen mill in this country. Under the present tariff it pays 45 cents per pound and 36 per cent. ad valorem. No one will import woolen goods to pay 50 per cent. when clothing can be imported at 45 per cent. All the clothing business of this country will be carried on in Canada, along the line where they can get all material free and then make it up into clothing and undervalue the same, and ship it to New York. Thousands and tens of thousands of poor seamstresses will be thrown out of employment in America. Again, on page 35, lines 847, 848, 849: Hatters' wool, solely for hatters' use, 30 per cent., which is 15 per cent. below duty proposed on clothing wool. All manufacturers can use hatter's wool, and why legislate for one particular branch against another? The bill is a fraud, and the woolen interests of this country would prefer free trade to this tariff.

Our carpets, rivaling the best Saxony, Brussels, Axminster, and others, have the protection of specific duties with an additional ad valorem, but the present bill abolishes the specific duties and only imposes ad valorem; so the manufacturer knows not what competition he may have to meet. New England from her sterile soil and bleak climate cannot draw sufficient supplies to maintain her population. She relies upon her manufactures for her prosperity, much of it arising from her cotton productions. A severe blow is struck at her interests in the bill. On her finer cottons, whether bleached or unbleached, she must operate under a reduction of duty of 20 to 25 per cent., and a still greater reduction on her jeans, denims, drillings, tickings, ginghams, and goods of like description. Her manufacturers are suffering for want of a greater market sufficiently now, but when the reduced duty shall flood us with the cheap productions of England their works may be closed altogether. The Northern and Northwestern States that are engaged in the lumber trade are also struck at in the committee's bill.

On sawed boards, planks, deals, and other lumber, &c., fifty cents per thousand feet, reduced from $1 per thousand feet. All other varieties of sawed lumber $1 per thousand feet, reduced from $2 per thousand feet. These reductions are 50 per cent. from the former duties, while on hubs, wagon-blocks, stove-pickets, pailing-laths, shingles, clap-boards, &c., the duty is cut down 33 per cent. This reduction will give to the Canadian lumbermen an additional opportunity to compete with our hardy sons of toil engaged in lumbering, and enable them to further fill our markets with the products of their industry in exclusion to our own. Leather and its productions form a most important item of our home industry; yet on the band and belting leather, sole-leather, calf-skins, and upper leather of all kinds there is a reduction of duty ranging from 20 to 50 per cent., according to kind, and a heavy reduction on the manufacture of Morocco.

It has been the policy of this Government to build up a prosperous commercial marine. With this view we have jealously protected the coasting trade and have not permitted foreigners to enter into competition with our citizens. It has been the nursery of our seamen, whose fearless daring in times of foreign war and domestic rebellion has been highly efficient toward maintaining the honor of the flag abroad and securing peace at home.

In connection with the preservation of the coasting trade, as well as trade with foreign countries, we have secured to our own ship-builders the construction of our naval vessels and our merchant ships until under the genius and skill of our shipwrights we are able to launch from our ship-yards as swift and well-proportioned vessels as are afloat in any sea. The object of the free-traders, as is shown by the bill as first introduced into the House, was evidently to destroy our ship-building interests for the purpose of promoting free trade. It proposed to permit foreign-built vessels, when bought by American citizens, to be "entitled to registry, enrollment and license, or license, and to all the benefits and privileges of vessels of the United States." Or, in other words, to close our ship-yards, throw our ship-carpenters out of employment, and transfer our ship-building to the Clyde. Had Mr. Wood been able to retain this section in the bill, it would have crippled and most probably destroyed the magnificent ship-yards of John Roach and the Cramps on the Delaware, where some of the finest vessels of our Navy and our commercial marine have been built, and throw on the world unemployed the thousands of workmen now dependent on those great establishments for their bread. The value of such an establishment as that of John Roach is visible in the fact that from 1872 to 1877, inclusive, it paid $7,000,000 for ship-building materials and $7,269,000 for the wages of labor. By the operation of this section of the bill we would make ourselves dependent on foreign countries for our ships, and if war should ensue with the power that constructed our vessels, we would have no ship-yards in which to build vessels of offense and defense, or commerce, nor in which they could even go for repair.

It is true this section has been stricken from the original bill, but let me warn my friends that it has not been abandoned. The Nation, a New York weekly of acknowledged authority, says:

The clause admitting foreign-built vessels to the privileges of the American flag has been stricken out, but the question is sure to come up again, and deserves to be treated by itself, while the tariff is too pressing a matter to be exposed to the danger of failure by connecting it with a measure not clearly within its scope.

We are told by the friends of the bill that the reductions are merely nominal and cannot materially affect the manufacturing and business interests of the country. If this be true, why have the British free-trade journals expressed such a lively interest in the bill? A correspondent of the Birmingham Post, writing from New York, says:

On a careful comparison of the two tariffs it will probably be found that the new bill will allow the revival of export of several articles against which the present rates have for some years closed this market.

The Iron and Coal Traders' Review, of Middleborough, says:

The new tariff bill introduced into the United States Legislature has set the manufacturers in arms, and for a very good reason, and they are leaving no stone unturned to defeat the proposals of the committee.

The London Iron-Monger says Sheffield is again picking up its trade with the United States, and if that market be not entirely closed to us with the heavy tariff which now prevails there will assuredly be a good prospect opened if the new tariff be accepted.

In another number, speaking of the bill, the same paper says:

The effect which it would have upon some of the Sheffield trades, for instance, would be nothing short of a metamorphosis from depression to extreme activity. Not only will houses be able to send their best brands—for these up to the present time cannot be equalled, and American manufacturers must have them—but they would be able to compete with the Pennsylvania makers in the second and inferior qualities. English makers too, of railway rails, who for some time past have been altogether excluded from American contracts, in consequence of the impossibility of tendering at sufficiently low rates, would once more prove formidable rivals. Tools, cutlery, grates, machines, in fact almost all kinds of hardware, could be sent across the Atlantic at prices which while they would prove remunerative to the manufacturer, would tempt dealers to purchase them in preference to the productions to American and inferior makers. A reduction of only 10 per cent., and this is the least that can be expected, will indeed create such a change in the condition of the English hardware trade as only the most sanguine can realize. It is just the bridge which would lead from the gloomy banks of depression and short hours on the one side, to those of good trade and activity on the other. The trade of Birmingham would be speedily influenced. Wolverhampton would soon put on its old appearance of bustling and prosperous activity, and the whole of the Black Country would feel the effects.

It is an old but true adage that "straws show which way the wind blows." Let us then not be deceived by the sophistries and allurements of the free-trade advocates. When we come to reflect and consider, it is more protection instead of less that this country needs, for the duties are already so low that even at the low wages now existing there is a very small margin left for the manufacturer. We may take as an example the manufacture of pig-iron. I am informed by the manufacturers in my district, in the great Schuylkill Valley, where the facilities and advantages for manufacturing iron are as great perhaps as anywhere else in the whole country, that at present prices there is not a manufacturer realizing more than fifty cents per ton clear of all expenses, and in most instances they are running their furnaces at an actual loss. This is evident from the fact that out of fifteen furnaces in Montgomery County, Pennsylvania, capable of producing 125,000 tons of pig iron annually only four are in operation.

The reduction of the duty on pig-iron in the bill is $2 per ton or nearly 30 per cent. less than the present duty. To say that such a reduction is merely nominal and will not affect the manufacturing and industrial interests of the country is simply absurd and preposterous. This is but one example I have given, but as a corresponding reduction has been made in many others it will suffice to show the great danger in the passage of the bill. Another very objectionable feature of the bill is the ad valorem instead of specific duties. These in many instances open a wide door to fraud. In almost every instance the goods will be undervalued, and thereby the importer will be enabled to undersell the manufacturer in our markets.

When we come to consider that we only export about 8 per cent. of the whole value of our manufactured, mechanical, and agricultural productions, we cannot fail to see how important it is to hold and control our own markets. We annually import about two hundred million dollars' worth of goods that ought to be manufactured in our own country. These consist of cotton goods, glass, iron and steel, leather, tobacco, cigars, lumber, wool and woollen manufactures. It requires no great foresight to understand, that we should manufacture these goods ourselves. First, because it would give employment to our own people; and, secondly, it would keep our gold and silver at home and in our own country. We would thus be enabled to accumulate in a short time sufficient to return to specie payments without any future fear on the part of the National Government. Protection, protection, is what this country wants; a diversified industry is the wealth of a nation. Nothing is so conducive to that end as a "protective tariff;" it benefits all classes of citizens and builds up our villages, towns, and cities.

And now right here let me make this prediction: if free trade ever prevails in this country there will be but one resort left us, and that will be a reduction of wages corresponding to those of European countries. Without this the result will be that every cotton and woollen factory, every furnace, rolling-mill, and forge, will stand idle, and poverty and starvation will be its sequel. Our public-school system, which is destined to exercise and control the future destinies of the American people will die out, and the twin sisters ignorance and crime will stalk broadcast throughout the land. And instead of one pauper in every three hundred and thirty-two persons, as shown by the last census, we will be like England and Wales, which have one pauper for every twenty-one persons. Ever since the establishment of free trade in England pauperism has been on the increase. This must necessarily be the case where wages are low.

In a general survey of the bill it seems to me that its uncalled-for reduction of duties will cause a lasting detriment to our great leading industries, and transfer our manufactures to other lands and for the benefit of other people who have no especial claims on our sympathies. To recapitulate, its provisions will enrich the merchants of great commercial cities, for low duties will stimulate and increase imports, and the greater the influx of foreign commodities the greater the harvest of the importer; but while it may for a time thus enrich the few through whose hands the foreign productions may pass it will work disastrous results on all the great industries of the nation. It will close, in a measure, our iron, and woollen, and cotton manufactures; it will turn out of their regular employments hundreds of thousands of artisans, and make them seek occupations in which they have no training; it will flood our country with the products of foreign industry; it will involve us in debt to other nations, and it will drain us of our currency, the life-blood of the nation, and render us the poor dependents of other peoples.

With industries already paralyzed by the late commercial panics, and thousands denied that employment which is necessary to give them bread, with a currency somewhat debased by recent legislation, it would be an act of the greatest legislative cruelty if we should add to the general distress now existing by opening our ports for the admission of those articles which we can so well make at home, and thus transfer the wages of labor from our people to foreign lands. We are, indeed, slowly recovering from a long financial depression, and are awaiting the healing effects of time, patience, and favorable legislation to spring forward once more on the road to a more solid prosperity. Even the agitation of the revision of duties at this time is a great mistake, but the passage of the bill would be a fatal step backward that would retard, if not destroy, for long years a return to our normal condition of industry, comfort, and happiness.

An American Congress ought therefore to reflect well and hesitate long before by changes in its tariff laws it should unsettle all our great national industries, cripple some and destroy others, and produce poverty and want, confusion and distress throughout the land; which evil results in my judgment will surely follow sooner or later the passage of this bill. In conclusion let me say that it is not in the interest of the rich nor for the benefit of those who have a competency (for they can live under the most adverse circumstances) that we stand here as advocates of protection; but we ask and demand it for the millions who live by toil, whose dependence is on their skill and the labor of their hands, and whose labor creates the wealth of a nation. For these people, and for our future security, prosperity, and greatness as a nation, I earnestly hope the bill will be defeated.

Mr. BREWER. Mr. Chairman, on the 1st day of November last the honorable gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HUNTER] stated "that the condition of our country was like that of a sick man suffering from a severe attack of congestion," and since that time nearly every member on this floor has felt himself fully competent to prescribe a remedy. Some have thought the coinage of the silver dollar and its restoration as a part of the currency of our country would be a relief for all our woes. Others have prescribed as an infallible relief for our sick country the repeal of the resumption act and an unlimited supply of irredeemable paper money. Some have asserted with much warmth that gold and silver coin was an expensive and unsuitable currency in a country like ours, and was only suitable in the despotisms of Europe; that no relief could be had for this distressed country of ours save by the creation by law of a currency made from some inexpensive sub-
